Employment Standards Act, 2000
Policy and Interpretation Manual

VERSION: 2022 Release 1

Last updated:January 11, 2022

Disclaimer

The Employment Standards Act, 2000 Policy & Interpretation Manual content is subject to change without notice. The Ministry of Labour makes no warranty, express or implied, about the currency, accuracy or completeness of the Manual. It cannot be reproduced. It is not intended to replace the ESA 2000, the Employment Protection for Foreign Nationals Act, 2009, or regulations made pursuant to those acts. Reference should always be made to the official version of the legislation. For complete and current information, please refer to the ESA 2000, EPFNA and regulations thereto found on the Government of Ontario's e-Laws website.

About

The Manual

Welcome to the Employment Standards Act, 2000 Policy and Interpretation Manual ("the Manual"). This Manual is the primary reference source of the policies of the Director of Employment Standards respecting the interpretation, administration and enforcement of the Employment Standards Act, 2000, SO 2000, c 41 ("ESA 2000") as well as the Employment Protection for Foreign Nationals Act, 2009, SO 2009, c 32 ("EPFNA"). The EPFNA incorporates by cross-reference many provisions of the ESA 2000 and, like the ESA 2000, is administered and enforced by the Employment Standards Program of the Ministry of Labour.

The ESA 2000 was established by Bill 147 and proclaimed into force as of September 4, 2001. The ESA 2000 repeals and replaces the former *Employment Standards Act, RSO 1990, c E.14 ("the former Act") and several other related employment law statutes. This is the first comprehensive overhaul of Ontario's employment standards legislation in more than two decades. While most of the employment standards under the former Act are contained in the ESA 2000, the wording of most of the provisions has been revised, and numerous administrative and housekeeping alterations have also been made. Further, there are several significant, substantive changes as between the former Act and the ESA 2000.

The EPFNA applies to foreign nationals who are employed or attempting to find employment in Ontario pursuant to an immigration or foreign temporary employee program. Among other rights and protections afforded under the EPFNA, the EPFNA prohibits recruiters from charging fees for any goods, services or benefits provided in connection with finding employment for these foreign nationals. Employers are also prohibited from recovering any costs from such foreign nationals that were incurred in connection with arranging to employ the individual, unless permitted by regulation.

The policies contained in this Manual are intended primarily for the use of employment standards officers and persons within the Ministry of Labour administering the ESA 2000 as well as the EPFNA. The policies contained in the Manual have been developed with the input of Employment Standards Program staff. We are interested in ensuring that both the ESA 2000 and the EPFNA are applied in a consistent manner throughout the province and the Manual is designed to facilitate that objective. These policies may be revised as case law develops and interpretations evolve. Policy revisions are included in the Manual updates.

The Manual is organized by legislation and regulation: firstly, the ESA 2000 and regulations thereto, and then EPFNA and regulations thereto. The ESA 2000 is broken down by part and then by section. The EPFNA is broken down by section.

The Manual contains numerous references to decisions under the ESA 2000 of the Ontario Labour Relations Board ("the Board"). There are also references to the decisions of referees and adjudicators who had jurisdiction to hear reviews under the former Act prior to the jurisdiction being transferred to the Board on June 29, 1998. While these decisions were issued under the former Act, they are included in the Manual because the principles enunciated in the decisions remain relevant under the Employment Standards Act, 2000. The Board also has jurisdiction to hear reviews under the EPFNA and as decisions are issued under the EPFNA, these will also be cited when the Program considers it appropriate to do so.

It is important to note that these decisions may not necessarily reflect Program policy on a particular point. Where a decision in the Manual is not in accordance with our policy, this is usually noted in the Manual. Employment standards officers are required to follow the policies established by the Director of Employment Standards.

Employment Standards Program

The ESA 2000 and the EPFNA are both administered by the Ontario Ministry of Labour's Employment Standards Program.

This decentralized Program consists of the Employment Practices Branch (“EPB”), located in the Ministry's main office, and five regional operating areas. The directors of the five regions and the EPB report to the Assistant Deputy Minister of the Operations Division.

Each region has several Managers who are responsible for planning and giving direction for program delivery. The regions also have Regional Program Coordinators who provide program support.

The EPB has a Provincial Coordinator who is responsible for overall program coordination, and several Provincial Specialists who provide information, support and advice to the field operations; liaise with and provide support to the field and the Ontario Labour Relations Board with respect to the review process; and are responsible for the writing and updating of this Manual.

The Employment Standards Program Advisory Committee, which comprises individuals from each of the regions and the EPB, provides advice and recommendations to the Director of Employment Standards, who sets Program policy direction.

In this decentralized model, many of the statutory powers and duties of the Director of Employment Standards have been delegated to the regional operations. Note that a listing of these powers and the persons to whom they have been delegated under the ESA 2000 is contained in the Delegation of Powers section.

Delegation of Powers

Delegation of Powers – Employment Standards Act, 2000

The following lists the powers and duties of the Director of Employment Standards in the sequence that they appear in the Employment Standards Act, 2000 and indicates to whom the powers or duties have been delegated.

Abbreviations Used

- DES – Director of Employment Standards
- RD – Regional Director
- D/PM – District or Program Manager
- RPC – Regional Program Coordinator
- ESO – Employment Standards Officer
- PC – Provincial Coordinator
- PS – Provincial Specialist (*by name)
- MTFSU – Manager, Trust Fund Services Unit
- MSPPA – Manager, Strategic Planning & Program Administration Unit
- CP – Claims Processor, Provincial Claims Centre (“PCC”)
- CPCC – Coordinator, PCC
- PMPCC – Program Manager, PCC
- ASMPCC – Administrative Services Manager, PCC
- MOF – Collector

Delegated Powers

- Section 8(2) Approval of Notice of Civil Proceeding form: Not delegated
- Section 17.1(7) Issuance of approval for hours of work: PC, PS, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Sections 17.1(16) and (19) Revocation or refusal of approval for hours of work: PC, PS, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Sections 21.1(1) and (2) Prepare and publish documents re rights and obligations under hours of work and overtime provisions: Not delegated
- Section 22.1(6) Issuance of approval for overtime averaging: PC, PS, MTSFU, MSPPA
- Section 22.1(13) Impose conditions on an overtime averaging approval: PC, PS, MTSFU, MSPPA
- Sections 22.1(14) and (17) Revocation or refusal of approval for overtime averaging: PC, PS, MTSFU, MSPPA
- Section 41(1) Approval of request to forgo vacation time: RD, D/PM
- Section 56(2)(b)(v) Approval to set the time of a temporary lay-off: RD
- Section 58(2) Approval of Form 1: Not delegated
- Section 66(1) Approval of an installment plan to pay severance pay: PC, MTFSU

- Sections 74.7(1) and (2) Prepare and publish document re rights and obligations of temporary help agencies, clients and assignment employees: Not delegated
- Section 88(2) Establishment of policies regarding the ESA 2000: Not delegated
- Section 88(5) Establishment of interest rate: Not delegated
- Section 88(8) Use of surplus interest to pay financial institution charges: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Sections 88.1(1) and (3) Reassign investigation or inspection: RD
- Section 88.2(1) Give recognition to an employer: Not delegated
- Section 88.2(3) Require an employer who is seeking recognition to provide information: Not delegated
- Section 88.2(4) Publish or make available to the public information about employers given recognition: Not delegated
- Section 88(6) Revoke or amend a recognition: Not delegated
- Section 95(7) Direct Board to consider manner of service: PC, MSPPA
- Section 96(1) Approval of claim form: Not delegated
- Section 99(6) Permit claim from employee covered by collective agreement: Not delegated
- Section 105(3) Pay out vested monies to an entitled person: Not delegated
- Section 106(6) Requirement to pay amount ordered under director's order to pay issued under s. 106 to the Director of Employment Standards in trust: RD, D/PM, ESO
- Section 107(2) Requirement to pay amount ordered under director's order to pay issued under s. 107 to the Director of Employment Standards in trust: RD, D/PM, ESO
- Section 108(5) Contravention of a compliance order may be restrained upon an application to a judge: RD
- Section 109(2) Distribute money rateably: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Section 112(5) Distribute monies received from an ESO, based on a settlement to the employee: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Sections 116(1)(b) and (c) Accept irrevocable letter of credit for review: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Section 120(3) Approval of settlement of a compliance order through a labour relations officer: RD, PC
- Section 120(6)(a) Distribute monies in accordance with settlement through a labour relations officer: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Section 121(1) Referral of a benefit plan matter (Part XIII of the ESA 2000) to the Board: Not delegated
- Section 125(1) Make a third party demand: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF
- Section 125(3) Service of the notice of a third party demand: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF
- Section 125.1 Accept security for amounts owing: Not delegated
- Section 125.2 Issue a warrant, directed to the sheriff, to enforce payment of an order: Not delegated
- Section 125.3(1) Register a lien and charge on real property: Not delegated
- Section 125.3(2) Register a lien and charge on personal property: Not delegated
- Section 125.3(6) Register a renewal of a lien and charge on personal property: Not delegated

- Section 126(1) and (4) Certifying a copy of an order or notice of contravention: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF
- Sections 126(2) and (4) Service of a notice of the filing of order or notice of contravention: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF
- Sections 126(3) and (4) May enforce an order or notice of contravention as a judgment or order of the court: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF
- Sections 127(1) – (4) Authorization of collector to exercise specified powers, collect a fee and impose conditions: Not delegated
- Section 128(3)(a)(ii) Written consent to permit collector to pay directly to person entitled to the wages, fees or compensation: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Section 129(1)(b) Written approval to permit collector to settle a notice of contravention: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Section 129(2) Written consent to permit collector to settle for less than 75% of monies owed: RD, D/PM
- Section 130(5) Filing of an order from a reciprocating state in court: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA, MOF
- Section 130(6) Recovery of costs in collecting order from reciprocating state: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA, MOF
- Section 135(2) Director to collect amounts ordered by court regarding certain convictions: RD, PC, MTFSU, MSPPA, Section 135(3) Director may file court order for enforcement purposes: RD, PC, MTFSU, MSPPA, MOF
- Section 137(5) Director to collect amounts ordered by court where a director, officer or agent of a corporation is guilty of offence of permitting offence: RD, PC, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Section 137(6) Director must consent to prosecution of a director, officer or agency of a corporation for permitting corporation to commit an office: RD
- O Reg 285/01, s. 32 Approve daily excess hours agreement at time of hire: Not delegated

Delegation of Powers – Employment Protection for Foreign Nationals Act, 2009

The following lists the powers and duties of the Director of Employment Standards in the sequence that they appear in the Employment Protection for Foreign Nationals Act, 2009 (“EPFNA”) and indicates to whom the powers or duties have been delegated. Note that most of the powers and duties of the DES under the EPFNA are incorporated by reference to provisions in the ESA 2000, which appear in square brackets below where applicable.

Abbreviations Used

- DES – Director of Employment Standards
- RD – Regional Director
- D/PM – District or Program Manager
- RPC – Regional Program Coordinator
- ESO – Employment Standards Officer
- PC – Provincial Coordinator
- MTFSU – Manager, Trust Fund Services Unit

- MSPPA – Manager, Strategic Planning & Program Administration Unit
- MOF – Collector

Delegated Powers

- Section 6(2) Approval of notice of civil proceeding form: Not delegated
- Sections 12(1) – (4) Prepare and publish documents regarding EPFNA and ESA 2000: Not delegated
- Section 13(1) Authority to publish names of convicted offenders: Not delegated
- Section 20(1) Approval of claim form: Not delegated
- Section 23 Distribute monies received from an ESO, based on a settlement, to the employee: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA [ESA 2000 s. 112(5)]
- Section 24(2) Pay out vested monies (fees) to an entitled person: Not delegated [ESA 2000 s. 105(3)]
- Section 24(3) Pay out vested monies (costs) to an entitled person: Not delegated [ESA 2000 s. 105(3)]
- Section 24(6) Contravention of a compliance order may be restrained upon an application to a judge: RD [ESA 2000 s. 108(5)]
- Section 24(7) Requirement to pay amount ordered under director's order to pay issued as per s. 106 of ESA 2000 to the Director of Employment Standards in trust: RD, D/PM, ESO [ESA 2000 s. 106(6)]
- Section 24(7) Requirement to pay amount ordered under director's order to pay issued as per s. 107 of ESA 2000 to the Director of Employment Standards in Trust: RD, D/PM, ESO [ESA 2000 s. 107(2)]
- Section 24(8) Distribute money rateably: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA [ESA 2000 s. 109(2)]
- Section 29(1) Accept an irrevocable letter of credit for review of an order to pay fees or an order to pay wages: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA [ESA 2000 s. 116(1)(b)]
- Section 29(1) Accept an irrevocable letter of credit for review of a compensation order issued to a temporary help agency or a client of a temporary help agency under ESA 2000 s. 74.14 or a compensation order under ESA 2000 s. 104: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA [ESA 2000 s. 116 (1)(c)]
- Section 29(6) Approval of a settlement of a compliance order through a labour relations officer: RD, PC [ESA 2000 s. 120(3)]
- Section 29(6) Distribute monies in accordance with a settlement through a labour relations officer: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA [ESA 2000 s. 120(6)(a)]
- Section 33(2) Establishment of polices regarding EPFNA: Not delegated [ESA 2000 s. 88(2)]
- Section 33(2) Establishment of interest rate: Not delegated [ESA 2000 s. 88(5)]
- Section 33(2) Use of surplus interest to pay financial institution charges: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA [ESA 2000 s. 88(8)]
- Section 33(2) Termination and reassignment of investigation or inspection: RD (ESA 2000 ss. 88(1) and (3)]
- Section 39 Direct Board to consider manner of service: PC, MSPPA [ESA 2000 s. 95(7)]
- Section 40 Make a third party demand: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF [ESA 2000 s. 125(1)]

- Section 40 Accept security for amounts owing: Not delegated [ESA 2000 s.125.1]
- Section 40 Issue a warrant, directed to the sheriff, to enforce payment of an order: Not delegated [ESA 2000 s. 125.2]
- Section 40 Register a lien and charge on real property: Not delegated [ESA 2000 s. 125.3(1)]
- Section 40 Register a lien and charge on personal property: Not delegated [ESA 2000 s. 125.3(2)]
- Section 40 Service of the notice of a third party demand: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF [ESA 2000 s. 125(3)]
- Section 40 Certify a copy of an order and file in court: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF [ESA 2000 s. 126(1)]
- Section 40 Service of a notice of the filing of an order in court: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF [ESA 2000 s. 126(2)]
- Section 40 Enforce an order filed in court as a judgment or order of the court: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF [ESA 2000 s. 126 (3)]
- Section 40 Apply ss. 126(1) – (3) with necessary modification to a notice of contravention: RD, D/PM, RPC, ESO, MOF [ESA 2000 s. 126(4)]
- Section 40 Written consent to permit collector to pay directly to person entitled to wages, fees or compensation: PC, MTFSU, MSPPA [ESA 2000 s. 128(3(1)(ii)]
- Section 40 Written approval of settlement by collector regarding notice of contravention: PC, MTSFU, MSPPA [ESA 2000 s. 129(1)(b)]
- Section 40 Written approval of settlement by collector for less than 75% of amount entitled to by the person: RD, D/PM [ESA 2000 s. 129(2)]
- Section 45(2) Director of Employment Standards to collect amounts ordered by court for certain contraventions: RD, PC, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Section 45(3) Director of Employment Standards may file court order for enforcement purposes: RD, PC, MTFSU, MSPPA
- Section 47(4) Director of Employment Standards to collect amounts ordered by court where a director, officer or agency of a corporation is guilty of offence of permitting offence: RD, PC, MTSFU, MSPPA
- Section 47(5) Director of Employment Standards must consent to prosecution of director, officer or agent of a corporation for permitting corporation to commit an offence: RD

Exercise of Discretion

The discussion of the various provisions under which the Director or their delegate has authority to exercise discretion frequently contains a list of factors that may be relevant when the discretion is being exercised, and may set out general principles that are usually followed. Please note that the lists are not intended to be exhaustive of all factors that may be relevant. Please also note that Program policy is that the Director (or delegate) will consider any submissions from a party as to why a listed factor should or should not be relevant, or why a general policy should or should not be departed from.

ESA Part I Section 1 – Definitions

A

Agent

"Agent" includes a trade union that represents an employee in collective bargaining;

The definition provides that "agent" includes trade unions that represent employees in collective bargaining. Trade union is also defined in s. 1. Because the definition of agent is inclusive, rather than exhaustive, agent can include people or entities other than a trade union. For example, it can include lawyers or other representatives.

Alternative Vacation Entitlement Year

"Alternative vacation entitlement year" means, with respect to an employee, a recurring 12-month period that begins on a date chosen by the employer, other than the first day of the employee's employment;

This definition was introduced by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18, effective November 26, 2002.

The definition provides that "alternative vacation entitlement year" is a recurring 12-month period that begins on a date that is not the date of an employee's first day of employment.

For further details see ESA Part XI - Vacation with Pay.

Arbitrator

"Arbitrator" includes,

(a) a board of arbitration, and

(b) the Board, when it is acting under section 133 of the Labour Relations Act, 1995;

This definition provides that "arbitrator" includes both a board of arbitration and the Ontario Labour Relations Board when it is acting under s. 133 of the Labour Relations Act, 1995, SO 1995, c 1, Sch A - that is, when it sits as a board of arbitration hearing construction industry grievances. See the definition of “board” in this section.

Assignment Employee

"assignment employee" means an employee employed by a temporary help agency for the purpose of being assigned to perform work on a temporary basis for clients of the agency;

An assignment employee is defined as an employee who is employed by a temporary help agency for the purpose of being assigned to perform work on a temporary basis for clients of the agency. Note that ESA Part I, s. 1 also provides a definition of employee that is discussed below. The Program's position is that "work on a temporary basis" would obviously include a short term assignment but would also include long term or open ended placements with a client. The work is considered to be temporary because there is no permanent placement with the client; the assignment employee continues to be the employee of the agency and not the client throughout the period of the assignment.

Further, an assignment employee continues to be employed by the agency during both periods of assignment and non-assignment unless the relationship is ended by either party or by a lay-off that exceeds a certain number of weeks. See the related discussions in ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.3 and ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.4 regarding the employment relationship between assignment employees and temporary help agencies and work assignments as well as ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.11 regarding termination and severance of employment.

It should also be noted that pursuant to s. 74.8(4) and s. 74.9(4), references to assignment employee within ss. 74.8 and 74.9 are interpreted as including a "prospective assignment employee". See the discussion at ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.8(4).

B

Benefit Plan

"Benefit plan" means a benefit plan provided for an employee by or through his or her employer;

This definition provides that "benefit plan" means a benefit plan that is provided for an employee by or through the employee's employer. Thus, both employer-sponsored plans and plans that are provided through an employer by a third-party insurer fall within the definition of benefit plan.

Board

"Board" means the Ontario Labour Relations Board;

This defines the Ontario Labour Relations Board as the Board referred to in the Act. The definition was originally added to the former Employment Standards Act by the Economic Development and Workplace Democracy Act, 1998, SO 1998, c 8, effective June 29, 1998, at the same time the Board was given jurisdiction to deal with applications for review.

Building Services

"Building services" means services for a building with respect to food, security and cleaning and any prescribed services for a building;

This definition identifies the kinds of services included in the term "building services". The term building services appears in ESA Part IV Continuity of Employment and ESA Part XIX Building Services Providers.

The definition of building services in the ESA 2000 is exhaustive, which means that the defined term is limited to services related to food, security and cleaning and those services prescribed by O Reg 287/01. Building services cannot include other services even if they are analogous to the ones that are specifically mentioned, nor does it include construction, maintenance (other than maintenance activities related to cleaning the premises) and the production of goods (other than goods related to the provision of food services at the premises for consumption on the premises).

Food Services

The definition of building services in ESA Part I, s. 1(1) includes "food services". This is typically a food services operation that is intended to be exclusively for the use of the employees of a particular company located on the premises, and/or exclusively for the use of persons visiting the premises, but not for persons visiting the premises solely for the purpose of using the food services. It could be a cafeteria-style operation, vending machines or a full-service operation.

The operator of a food court in a shopping mall would not be considered to be providing service for a building with respect to food because, although many users of the food court services may be people who have business within the building (i.e., shoppers), it is likely that some people, such as those working in neighbouring office buildings, will come to the food court just for the food.

Likewise, operators of fast food restaurants in a food court in an office tower would not be considered to fall within the definition of building services. Such food courts are typically located in the public area of a large office building. The owner or manager of the building will typically lease space in the food court area to operators of fast food restaurants that do most of their business at lunchtime. Sometimes the owner will receive a percentage of sales in addition to the base rent. Like the food court in a shopping mall, the food court in an office tower can reasonably be expected to be used by persons who work in other buildings and only come to the food court to have a meal.

Generally, restaurants in food courts are intended for the use of persons other than just those who work or have business in the building in which the food court is located. The food court services the public at large, whether they work or have business in the building or not. Thus a food court cannot generally be said to be services for a building in accordance with the definition in ESA Part I, s. 1(1). This is in contrast to the typical 'company cafeteria' in an office tower, which is designed principally for the use of the persons who work in the building. However, see UFCW, Local 1000A v Cara Operations Ltd., 2001 CanLII 18382 (ON LRB) in which the food court in an airport was determined to fall within the definition of building services under the provisions of the former Employment Standards Act because the food court was considered to be for the exclusive use of persons having business at the airport. Similarly, where a restaurant or food court within an art gallery or museum is virtually exclusively used by patrons of the art gallery or museum patrons, the restaurant could be considered to be services for a building with respect to food within the meaning of the definition of building services in ESA Part I, s. 1(1).

Security Services

The definition of building services in ESA Part I, s. 1(1) includes "security services". These could be performed through patrols, either on foot or in a vehicle, through a guard sitting at a front desk, through video surveillance or any combination of the above.

Cleaning Services

The definition of building services in ESA Part I, s. 1(1) includes "cleaning services". This includes cleaning the inside of the building as well as cleaning the outside of the building, e.g., window cleaning services. Cleaning is usually for cosmetic, hygienic or safety reasons. Sometimes cleaning will be referred to as maintenance - see Federated Building Maintenance Co. Ltd. (September 23, 1988), ESC 2377 (Franks). For example, the employees who dust, vacuum and empty the garbage in office buildings are often referred to as providing maintenance services. Although they may be called maintenance, these cleaning activities are building cleaning services. However, maintenance that is of a non-cleaning nature, e.g., repair, preventative work, etc., will not be covered.

There may be some activities that fall into a grey area between cleaning and maintenance. For example, the removal of salty road slush from an indoor parking garage in the winter could be characterized as cleaning, or it could be characterized as preventative maintenance intended to avoid erosion of the concrete. It is Program policy that if the work can be characterized as cleaning, whether or not it can also be characterized in some regard as maintenance, it will fall under the definition of building services.

Other Prescribed Services

Under s. 1 of O Reg 287/01, the following are prescribed as building services:

- Services that are intended to relate only to the building and its occupants and visitors with respect to a parking garage or parking lot and a concession stand; and
- Property management services intended to relate only to the building.

These services may or may not be provided through a comprehensive operations and maintenance contract for such things as janitorial services, landscaping services, driveway, parking lot and sidewalk snow removal, fire alarm services, elevator services, parking lot supervision, heating and air conditioning and plumbing maintenance, and repair and pest control.

For a more detailed discussion of the definition of building services see O Reg 287/01, s. 1.

Building Services Provider or Provider

"Building services provider" or "provider" means a person who provides building services for a premises and includes the owner or manager of a premises if the owner or manager provides building services for premises the person owns or manages;

This definition identifies who is a "building services provider" or "provider". The terms building services provider or provider appears in ESA Part IV Continuity of Employment and ESA Part XIX Building Services Providers.

Building services providers include cleaning, security and food companies that provide building services for a premises - see the discussion of the definition of building services above and in O Reg 287/01, s. 1.

This definition is inclusive, applying to any person, which includes a natural person as well as a corporation, who provides building services for a premises, including the owner or manager of the premises. As a result, the definition will include managers and property management companies who enter into sub-contracts with cleaning, security and food service operations, or use their own in-house staff to provide such services. It will also include owners that contract with cleaning security and food service operations or use their own in-house staff to provide building services at the premises it owns.

There may also be situations in which a major tenant of an office building, for example, contracts with a company to provide for cleaning or security services which are included in the definition of building services in ESA Part I, s. 1. Under the former Employment Standards Act, the application of the building services provisions was limited to an owner of a building or a manager. However, Program policy was that the term owner included lessees or tenants, where the lessee or tenant had control over the premises and was in a position to enter into agreements with contractors or other parties for the provision of building services. This policy was also supported by the courts, which took a broad view of the term owner where it appeared in the former Employment Standards Act, holding that it could include lessees and tenants where the context was appropriate. In this regard, see Ritchie and Dobbie v. Stanstead and Sherbrooke Fire Insurance Company (1940), 1 DLR 241 (ON CA). As noted above, the ESA 2000 definition of building services provider is inclusive, referring to building services being provided by any person who provides building services for a premises, including an owner or manager. It is therefore Program policy that lessees or tenants who provide building services for a building fall within the definition of building services provider whether as any person or as an owner.

Business

"Business" includes an activity, trade or undertaking;

This definition provides that a "business" will include an activity, trade or undertaking.

C

Client

"client", in relation to a temporary help agency, means a person or entity that enters into an arrangement with the agency under which the agency agrees to assign or attempt to assign one or more of its assignment employees to perform work for the person or entity on a temporary basis;

"Client" is defined in relation to a temporary help agency and means a person or entity that enters into an arrangement with the agency under which the agency agrees to assign or attempt to assign one or more of its assignment employees to perform work on a temporary basis for the person or entity. A "person or entity" includes an individual person, a sole proprietor, corporation, or a partnership.

The arrangement with the agency may or may not be in writing.

Collector

"Collector" means a person, other than an employment standards officer, who is authorized by the Director to collect an amount owing under this Act;

This provision defines "collector" as a person, other than an employment standards officer, who is authorized by the Director of Employment Standards to collect amounts owing under the Act. The term collector appears in ESA Part XXIV, ss. 127-129. These sections permit the Director to appoint collectors to collect amounts owing under the Act, whether for employees, for the Minister of Finance for amounts owed with respect to monetary penalties associated with notices of contravention or amounts owed to the former Employee Wage Protection Program or for amounts owed to the Director in the form of administrative costs.

Continuous Operation

"Continuous operation" means an operation or that part of an operation that normally continues 24 hours a day without cessation in each seven-day period until it is concluded for that period;

The term "continuous operation" appears in the public holiday provisions in ESA Part X, s. 28. Section 28 allows an employer in such an operation to require an employee to work on a public holiday if the holiday is on a day that is ordinarily a working day for the employee and the employee is not on vacation.

A continuous operation is an operation (i.e., an activity or service) or that portion of the operation that normally operates 24 hours a day until completion of the regularly scheduled operations for that period.

This may involve, for example, certain portions of, or routes on, a municipal public transportation network, a 24-hour security service, or that portion of an employer's operation requiring stationary engineers, maintenance mechanics, millwrights or production workers to run machinery, furnaces, or heat-treating baths, etc. on a continual basis until a process is completed.

The operation need not run continuously seven days per week to fall within the definition of continuous operation. However, if the operation were to stop and start more than once in a seven-day period, it would not be considered by the Program to be a continuous operation.

In this regard, the Program disagrees with the arbitrator's decision in Collins & Aikman Plastics Ltd. v United Steelworkers, 9042. In that case, the employer's operation ran 24 hours a day for five, six or seven days a week and there was never more than one shutdown within any week. However, the arbitrator concluded that it was not a continuous operation because in his view, a continuous operation included only those employers who "cannot stop operations midstream in order to observe a public holiday" or those employers who ran a 24/7 operation.

Only that part of an operation that operates on a 24-hour basis is a continuous operation. For example, in a casino that operates 24 hours a day, seven days a week, the games part of the casino will be a continuous operation, but the office part of the casino, if it operates only during regular business hours, will not be.

Businesses that are open seven days a week but not 24 hours a day are not continuous operations.

D

Difference in Employment Status

The definition of the phrase "difference in employment status" was repealed pursuant to the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018, S.O. 2018, c. 14 effective January 1, 2019. The phrase appeared in section 42.1 of the ESA, 2000 – which generally prohibited employers from paying different pay rates to employees because of a difference in their employment status – and which was also repealed as a result of the same legislation. Since employees may still have a complaint relating to section 42.1 that arose during the period of time when that section was in force – from April 1, 2018 to December 31, 2018 – the discussion of this definition remains as part of this publication. The text appears in red to highlight that the definition has been repealed.

"difference in employment status", in respect of one or more employees, means,

(a) a difference in the number of hours regularly worked by the employees; or

(b) a difference in the term of their employment, including a difference in permanent, temporary, seasonal or casual status;

This term appears in section 42.1 of the ESA 2000, under Part XII (Equal Pay for Equal Work). Under that section, subject to certain exceptions, employers are prohibited from paying an employee a rate of pay less than the rate paid to another employee of the employer because of a difference in employment status, when certain criteria are met.

A difference in employment status means:

- A difference in the number of hours regularly worked by an employee and one or more other employees; or
- A difference in the term of employment of an employee and one or more other employees.

Difference in number of hours regularly worked

A difference in the number of hours regularly worked by employees constitutes a difference in employment status. “Hours regularly worked” refers to the number of hours that the employees actually work (including hours that they are deemed to have worked pursuant to section 1.1 of O Reg 285/01). A contract of employment or job description may set out the number, or a range, of hours the employee is expected to work, and may be relevant when determining whether there is a difference in the number of hours regularly worked by employees. However, if there is a conflict between the contract / job description and the number of hours actually worked, the number actually worked will be used to determine if there is a difference in the number of hours worked.

Two or more employees may be considered to regularly work a different number of hours even if they sometimes work the same number. Conversely two employees may be considered to regularly work the same number of hours even if they sometimes work a different number.

It may not always be readily apparent how many hours employees regularly work. For example, their hours may vary from day to day, week to week or month to month, in a predictable or unpredictable pattern. In these situations, the period of time over which the number of hours worked that is to be reviewed to determine the number of hours an employee regularly works will depend on the circumstances. In general, as the aim is to determine the character of the employee’s employment status, a longer period is to be reviewed when determining the number of hours an employee regularly works (i.e. a review of the number of hours worked over a period of months, rather than days or weeks, is generally the preferred approach; one exception to that approach would be, of course, where it is not possible due to the length of the employment relationship).

There is no “minimum difference” or threshold that must be met in order for a difference in the number of hours regularly worked to constitute a difference in employment status. For example, a one-hour difference or a 20-hour difference in the number of hours regularly worked by employees would both constitute a difference in employment status.

Difference in the term of employment

A difference in the term of employees’ employment constitutes a difference in employment status.

A difference in the term of employees’ employment is defined to include a difference in:

- “Permanent” status. This generally means that the employment relationship has no fixed end date.
- “Temporary” status. This generally means that the employment relationship is not permanent but has a fixed end date or will end upon the completion of a project, task etc..
- “Seasonal” status. This generally means that the employment relationship is seasonal in nature and will end when the season for which the employee was hired comes to an end.

- "Casual" status. This generally refers to an arrangement where an employee is called to work on an as-needed basis.

The list of types of difference in the term of employees' employment above is not exhaustive, and there could be other differences not listed.

Note that there could be overlap between the types of differences in the term of employee's employment listed above. But, as long as there is a difference in the term of employment as between two or more employees, they will be considered to have a "difference in employment status" for the purposes of the "equal pay" provision in s. 42.1. For example, a permanent casual employee and a temporary casual employee are considered to have a difference in employment status even though both are casual.

Director

"Director" means the Director of Employment Standards;

This defines the "Director" referred to in the Act as the Director of Employment Standards, who is appointed by the Minister of Labour, Training and Skills Development for Ontario. The Director of Employment Standards may exercise powers and is required to perform duties imposed on them under the Act. Many of the powers of the Director have been delegated. For a complete listing of the powers of the Director, and to whom those powers have been delegated, please see Delegation of Powers.

Domestic or Sexual Violence Leave Pay

"domestic or sexual violence leave pay" means pay for any paid days of leave taken under section 49.7;

This definition was added by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 SO 2017, c 22.

Domestic or sexual violence leave pay is defined as pay for any paid days of leave taken under ESA Part XIV, s. 49.7. ESA Part XIV, s. 49.7(5) requires that an eligible employee be paid for the first five days of domestic or sexual violence leave taken within a calendar year. The amount of domestic or sexual violence leave pay an employee may be entitled to is determined by ESA Part XIV, ss. 49.7(6), (7) and (8).

E

Employee

"Employee" includes,

(a) a person, including an officer of a corporation, who performs work for an employer for wages,

(b) a person who supplies services to an employer for wages,

(c) a person who receives training from a person who is an employer, if the skill in which the person is being trained is a skill used by the employer's employees, or

(d) a person who is a homeworker,

and includes a person who was an employee;

The definition of employee specifically includes those persons described in (a) to (d) above. Each description also either explicitly or implicitly refers to a relationship between the person described therein and an employer - see the definition discussed below. It is the existence of the relationship between the employer and the employee that defines an employee for the purposes of the Act. See 1022239 Ontario Inc. (Seventy-Five Hundred Taxi Inc.) v Director of Employment Standards, 2011 CanLII 44478 (ON LRB) and Professional Recovery Equipment Inc. v Mootoo, 2014 CanLII 69932 (ON LRB) in which the Board referred to the factors considered in determining whether an employment relationship exists. In the first case, the issue was whether taxi drivers were employees of the taxi company or independent contractors. In the second case, the issue was whether a tow truck driver was an employee or an independent contractor. Likewise, the definition of employer states that the employer "has control or direction of, or is directly or indirectly responsible for, the employment of a person . . ." Therefore, the Act only applies to the employer within the context of the employee-employer relationship.

There is an abundance of case law referring to this relationship, as the roots of the employee-employer relationship date back to the common law notion of master-servant. Because the Act also defines employee in reference to the employee-employer relationship, the common law definitions, with some modification and expansion in light of the intent of the Act, are used to determine whether a person is or is not an employee. See the discussion of the common law tests for employer-employee relationships below.

In addition, this relationship of employee and employer is the subject of other statutes and has been the subject of determinations by administrative tribunals and the courts under those other statutes. However, those determinations have limited application in the context of the ESA 2000 because the purposes of those other statutes are different than the purpose of the ESA 2000.

Therefore, for the purposes of the ESA 2000, the fact that a person is, or is not, considered an employee for the purposes of income tax, employment insurance, workers' compensation, the Labour Relations Act, 1995 or the Canada Pension Plan is not of great relevance. See Deluxe Taxi (Barrie) Ltd. v Employees (April 18, 1973), ESC 125 (McNish), decided under the former Employment Standards Act, and also see 1022239 Ontario Inc. (Seventy-Five Hundred Taxi Inc.) v Director of Employment Standards, a decision of the Board under the current Act.

In Homelife G.M. Ewins Limited v Chiu (September 22, 1987), ESC 2269 (Baum), the referee dealt with a claimant who was not an employee according to a by-law of the Toronto Real Estate Board ("TREB"). The by-law stated that a person who worked full-time elsewhere would not be considered to be employed as a real estate salesperson by an agency such as the applicant. The referee, in finding the claimant to be an employee under the former Employment Standards Act, noted that employment standards legislation "takes its own measure" and was not controlled by the private law of such domestic bodies as TREB.

Note that as of November 27, 2017, ESA Part III, s. 5.1 prohibits an employer from treating an employee as if they were not an employee under the Act.

Statutory Provisions

Work or Service for Wages

"Employee" includes,

(a) a person, including an officer of a corporation, who performs work for an employer for wages, or

(b) a person who supplies services to an employer for wages.

These two sections include as employees those persons who perform work or supply services for wages. The Program position is that the Act does not apply to volunteers.

Employee vs. Volunteer

Since volunteers are not considered to be employees under the Act, it is important to determine whether a person is a true volunteer or an employee. The fact that no wages were paid is not determinative of volunteer status - see Robinson o/a Station Street Café v Ramsay and Ramsay (December 30, 1988), ESC 2434 (Adamson), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act; nor is the fact that there was some form of payment made necessarily determinative of employee status (e.g., a payment may have been made in the form of an honorarium as opposed to wages).

Referee Davis in Consumer Liability Discharge Corporation v Molica (July 24, 1981), ESC 1032 (Davis), a case under the former Employment Standards Act, suggested that:

One of the key factors in determining whether there has been a true volunteering of services . . . is the extent to which the person performing the services views the arrangement as being pursuant to his pursuit of a livelihood on one hand, and the extent to which the person receiving the services is conferred a benefit on the other hand. Another factor will be the circumstances of how the arrangement was initiated: and again, whether an economic imbalance between the two parties was a factor in structuring the arrangement.
Applying the first factor in the context of family-run businesses, the question will often be whether the individual is providing their services in pursuit of a livelihood or in service of the family.

Officers of a Corporation

Officers of a corporation who perform work or supply services for wages are specifically included in the definition of employee. It codifies previous Program policy that although a person may be a corporate officer, they will nonetheless be considered an employee insofar as they perform work or supplies service for wages.

A Person Receiving Training

"Employee" includes,

(c) a person who receives training from a person who is an employer, if the skill in which the person is being trained is a skill used by the employer's employees,

Clause (c) of the definition of employee defines persons receiving training from an employer as employees if the skill in which the person being trained is a skill used by the employer's employees.

This provision was amended by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 SO 2017, c 22. Prior to this amendment, the former s. 1(2) held that trainees who met certain conditions were not considered to be employees under the Act. However, this amendment now states that any person who receives training from a person who is an employer is an employee if the skill in which the person being trained is a skill used by the employer's employees.

Trainees

The effect of clause (c) is to define some people who receive training from an employer as employees, thereby bringing them under the Act. Note that the fact that an individual did not negotiate for or expect to receive monetary compensation while they were being trained does not preclude a finding that they were an employee, nor will the fact that an individual has agreed to take training in an employer's business on an unpaid basis in preparation for taking on a job with that employer preclude a finding that their employment began when the training commenced. See 1153800 Ontario Inc. o/a Baker's Dozen Donuts v Sherren, 2000 CanLII 4482 (ON LRB), decided under the former Employment Standards Act.

In order for an individual who receives training from an employer to be an employee, the individual must be trained in a skill that is used by the employer's employees. It is the Program position that if the person receiving training is being trained in a skill that could be used by other employees of the employer, even though the employer has no other employees, that person is considered an employee.

However, it should also be noted that ESA Part III, s. 3(5) excludes certain categories of trainees who might otherwise be considered employees:

3(5) This Act does not apply with respect to the following individuals and any person for whom such an individual performs work or from whom such an individual receives compensation:

1. A secondary school student who performs work under a work experience program authorized by the school board that operates the school in which the student is enrolled;
2. An individual who performs work under a program approved by a college of applied arts and technology or, a university;

2.1 An individual who performs work under a program that is approved by a private career college registered under the Private Career Colleges Act, 2005 and that meets such criteria as may be prescribed.

3. A participant in community participation under the Ontario Works Act, 1997;
4. An inmate of a correctional institution within the meaning of the Ministry of Correctional Services Act, an inmate of a penitentiary, an individual being held in a detention facility within the meaning of the Police Services Act or someone being held in a place of temporary detention or youth custody facility under the Youth Criminal Justice Act (Canada), if the individual participates inside or outside the institution, penitentiary, place or facility in a work project or rehabilitation program;
5. An individual who performs work under an order or sentence of a court or as part of an extrajudicial measure under the Youth Criminal Justice Act (Canada).
6. An individual who performs work in a simulated job or working environment if the primary purpose in placing the individual in the job or environment is his or her rehabilitation.

This exclusion had been scheduled to be repealed as of January 1, 2019, pursuant to the Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017. However, under the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018 amendments, the repeal was delayed and it will now be repealed on a day to be named by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor.

For further discussion of the exclusions in s. 3(5), see ESA Part III, s. 3.

Pre-Employment Selection

Activities engaged in as part of the pre-employment selection process must be distinguished from training. Persons who are engaged in some form of pre-employment activity are generally not considered employees under the Act, provided that the amount of time spent in the program is reasonably limited in duration and the activities involved do not displace the substantive training, instruction and orientation needed once an employee is hired.

Apprentices

Apprentices are generally considered to be employees for the purposes of the ESA 2000. Even though a worker may be defined as an apprentice under the Apprenticeship and Certification Act, 1998, SO 1998, c 22 or the Trades Qualifications and Apprenticeship Act, RSO 1990, c T.17 and may even have signed an agreement stating that they are to be considered a volunteer, they may still be an employee for the purposes of the ESA 2000.

In Northland White Truck Sales Limited v Laframboise (March 17, 1983), ESC 1380 (Barnett), a case under the former Employment Standards Act, the referee rejected the applicant's argument that the claimant was not an employee since his employment was regulated by the apprenticeship legislation. The referee found that although the claimant was indeed an apprentice for the purposes of that legislation, he was also an employee for the purposes of the former Employment Standards Act by virtue of s. 1(c) in the definition of employee.

Note, however, that there may be cases where paragraph 2 or 2.1 of ESA Part III, s. 3(5) applies, thereby excluding an apprentice from the application of the Act.

3(5) This Act does not apply with respect to the following individuals and any person for whom such an individual performs work or from whom such an individual receives compensation:

2. An individual who performs work under a program approved by a college of applied arts and technology or a university.

2.1 An individual who performs work under a program that is approved by a private career college registered under the Private Career Colleges Act, 2005 and that meets such criteria as may be prescribed.

Work performed under an apprenticeship program may be covered by one of these exclusions, since such programs can include classroom training and, as such, form part of a program approved by a college or university or private career college. See ESA Part III, s. 3 for more details on these exclusions.

Sheltered Workshops

The ESA 2000 does not apply with respect to participants in a simulated job environment such as a sheltered workshop although such individuals might otherwise be considered trainees, and consequently employees under the ESA 2000. This exclusion had been scheduled to be repealed on January 1, 2019, pursuant to the Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017. However, under the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018 amendments, the repeal was delayed and it will now be repealed on a day to be named by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor.

Participants in a simulated job environment are specifically excluded from the application of the ESA 2000 – see paragraph 6 of ESA Part III, s. 3(5). For a more detailed discussion of this exemption, see "Individual performing work in a simulated job or working environment" under "Other exceptions – s. 3(5)".

Homeworkers

"Employee" includes,

(d) a person who is a homeworker

This paragraph clearly establishes that homeworkers are to be considered employees for the purposes of the Act, even though some of the circumstances under which homework is performed might suggest that a homeworker more closely resembles an independent contractor than an employee.

A more detailed discussion of the status of homeworkers as employees under the Act can be found in the s. 1 definition of homeworker.

Person Who Was an Employee

"Employee" includes a person who was an employee

The definition of employee also includes "a person who was an employee". This provision ensures that the recovery of entitlements that should have been given to an employee under the Act is not precluded merely because the individual concerned is no longer in the employee-employer relationship.

The Employee-Employer Relationship: Common Law Tests

The Act only applies where there is an employment relationship. The central question is whether an employee-employer relationship exists between the two parties. The determination of whether someone is an employee or an independent contractor is complex and the courts have created a number of common law tests for determining whether an employee-employer relationship exists. As noted above in the discussion of employee, the Board, referees adjudicators and the courts have referred to other sources, notably the common law tests, to determine if an employee-employer relationship exists.

The definition of employee in s. 1 is not exhaustive and has traditionally been interpreted in an expansive fashion. However, it is not always clear whether a person performing work for an employer is an employee as defined in s. 1 of the ESA 2000 or an independent contractor. An independent contractor is in business on their own account and is therefore not entitled to the same protections as employees under the ESA. Although the ESA does not contain a test for determining whether a person is an employee or an independent contractor, it is Program policy that the determination of whether or not an individual is an employee or independent contractor should be considered broadly utilizing the various tests and any other relevant factors.

Note that as of November 27, 2017, ESA Part III, s. 5.1 prohibits employers from treating employees as if they are not employees under the Act. It is important to note that parties cannot decide employee status merely by mutual agreement or by the signing of a written document, such as an employment contract or independent contractor agreement. Nor does the method of remuneration and whether statutory deductions are made greatly impact the determination of whether there is an employment relationship. Rather, it is the overall relationship that determines whether an employer-employee relationship exists. See for example Econome Inc. v Champagne, 2017 CanLII 14543 (ON LRB), in which the employer tried to rely on an unsigned employment agreement to indicate that the employee was not an employee. The Board disagreed and noted that the existence or form of a written contract does not impact an employee's status, particularly where the individual in question works full time and exclusively for the employer.

The Supreme Court of Canada in 671122 Ontario Ltd. v Sagaz Industries Canada Inc., [2001] 2 SCR 983, 2001 SCC 59 (CanLII) distinguished between the relationship of an employee and an employer and the relationship of an employer and an independent contractor, who is in business on their own account.

Major J., writing for the majority, reviewed the various tests developed by the case law and held that "there is no one conclusive test which can be universally applied to determine whether a person is an employee or an independent contractor" (at paragraph 46). In making the determination, "what must always occur is a search for the total relationship of the parties" (at paragraph 46). Major J. provided further guidance by stating in paragraphs 47-48:

Although there is no universal test to determine whether a person is an employee or an independent contractor . . . [t]he central question is whether the person who has been engaged to perform the services is performing them as a person in business on his own account. In making this determination, the level of control the employer has over the activities will always be a factor. However, other factors to consider include whether the worker provides his or her own equipment, whether the worker hires his or her own helpers, the degree of financial risk taken by the worker, the degree of responsibility for investment and management held by the worker, and the worker's opportunity for profit in the performance of his or her tasks...

It bears repeating that the above factors constitute a non-exhaustive list, and there is no set formula as to their application. The relative weight of each will depend on the particular facts and circumstances of the case.

The Supreme Court of Canada's decision in 671122 Ontario Ltd. v Sagaz is essentially a restatement of the Federal Court of Canada's decision in Wiebe Door Services Ltd. v M.N.R., [1986] 3 FC 533 (CA). The non-exhaustive list of factors above does not replace the factors in the traditional common law tests, since no single test can answer the question of whether a person is an employee or an independent contractor in all situations. As Major J. noted, the key question is "whether the person who has been engaged to perform the services is performing them as a person in business on their own account."

The classic common law tests, and the analysis given them by the Supreme Court of Canada in 671122 Ontario Ltd. v Sagaz are discussed below.

Control Test

The Supreme Court in 671122 Ontario Ltd. v Sagaz first reviewed the control test. Under this test, an individual is characterized as an employee if there is an employer who can control, or has the right to control the employee: "the essential criterion of employer-employee relations is the right to give orders and instructions to the employee regarding the manner in which to carry out his work" - see Hôpital Notre-Dame de l'Espérance and Théoret v Laurent, [1978] 1 SCR 605, 1977 CanLII 8 (SCC) at 613. Major J., writing for the Court, notes that the control test is problematic and has been criticized as having an air of deceptive simplicity. The indicia of control is thus no longer a sole determining factor of whether there is an employment relationship.

Although the control test has been rejected as the sole determining factor of whether there is an employment relationship, the element of control is one of the factors in other common law tests, notably the four-fold test, discussed below. Major J. in 671122 Ontario Ltd. v Sagaz indicated that the level of control the employer has over the worker's activities will always be a factor in determining whether there is an employment relationship.

What is meant by the term control has expanded from the initial focus on the manner in which work was done. As workers became more specialized and skilled relative to their employers, there was less need for the workers to be told how each facet of their work was to be done. Other aspects in which employers have control of the activities of their workers fall within the element of control:

1. The right to control the method of doing the work;

2. The power to hire and to control the method of hiring;
3. The right to suspend or dismiss the alleged employee:
    - An employer has a greater degree of control over their employees than they would over an independent contractor. The employer's rights over the independent contractor are limited to terminating the contract for services where the work is not performed satisfactorily, whereas the employer has the right to suspend, dismiss or otherwise discipline employees.
4. The payment of wages or other remuneration;
    - The manner of payment may indicate whether a sufficient degree of control is present in order for there to be an employment relationship. If a person is paid proportionate to the amount of work done rather than the time occupied or for a lump sum, this may indicate that such a person is being employed as an independent contractor. - See Becker Milk Co. Ltd. v Hajjar et al (January 31, 1973), ESC (Carter).
5. The right of the employer to demand exclusive service from its worker;
6. The right of the employer to determine the place of work;
7. Freedom of action in performing the task, including the degree of supervision and the ability to designate;
8. Retention of the right to prescribe the exact work to be done; and
9. The degree of accountability on the part of the person performing the work.

Four-Fold Test

Major J. in 671122 Ontario Ltd. v Sagaz also reviewed the classic four-fold test of Montreal (City) v Montreal Locomotive Works Ltd. [1944] UKPC 44, which was an attempt to deal with the problems of the control test. The four-fold test retains the element of control as a key indicator of the employment relationship, but examines additional factors to provide a means of distinguishing between an employee and an independent contractor. The test involved four elements, as follows:

1. Control: This may be defined as the power to control the method of doing the work. In other words, does the employer have the right to tell the employee not only what to do, but how to do it? Direct or immediate supervision is not essential. It is the power of control, rather than the day-to-day exercise of supervisory control that is significant.
2. Ownership of tools: "Tools" does not refer only to such items as hammers, lathes and cleaning mops, but can include any item used at the workplace, such as forms, manuals, promotional literature and a telephone. A person who owns all the equipment necessary for the work they do is more likely to be an independent contractor than an employee. Likewise, if the tools are supplied by the purported employer, it is more likely indicative of an employee-employer relationship.
3. Chance of profit.
4. Risk of loss: Elements three and four are usually linked together. Typically, an independent contractor is in business for himself or herself. This suggests that there is a financial investment in their undertaking, so that there are variables (other than their own labour) subject to their influence that provide a chance of profit and risk of loss.

Organization Test

The Supreme Court of Canada in 671122 Ontario Ltd. v Sagaz also considered the organization test or integration test, which was approved by that Court in Co-operators Insurance Association v. Kearney, [1965] SCR 106, 1964 CanLII 21 (SCC) and followed in Mayer v J. Conrad Lavigne Ltd., 1979 CanLII 2088 (ON CA). This test examines whether the alleged employee is an integral part of the employer's organization, in which case the individual is an employee, or a mere accessory to it, in which case they are an independent contractor. The test was initially proposed by Lord Denning in Stevenson, Jordan & Harrison Ltd v MacDonald & Evans [1952] 1 TLR 101 as follows:

One feature which seems to run through the instances is that under a contract of service, a man is employed as a part of the business, and his work is done as an integral part of the business; whereas, under a contract for services, his work, although done for the business, is not integrated into it but is only accessory to it.

Major J. in 671122 Ontario Ltd. v Sagaz stressed the difficulties with the organization test: it can be a difficult test to apply, because if the question is whether the activity or worker is integral to the employer's business, the question can usually be answered in the affirmative. If the test is applied to demonstrate that, without the work of the alleged employees the employer would be out of business, a factual relationship of mutual dependency would always meet the test. Nonetheless, Major J. acknowledged that the organization test can be useful if properly applied, looking at the question of integration from the perspective of the employee and not that of the employer. If the test is applied from the employer's perspective, it is too easy to assume that every contributing cause is arranged purely for the convenience of the larger enterprise.

In Pinnacle Roofing Systems Inc. v Thompson, 2009 CanLII 9251, the Board summarized the organizational test as two main questions: (1) is the alleged employee an integral part of the business or ancillary [to it]?; and (2) is the employee's work subject to coordinated control as to where and when rather than the how? In applying the test, the OLRB found that a sheet metal worker was an employee because his work was an integral part of the employer's business within the meaning of the organizational test.

Statutory Purpose Test and Economic Dependence

The definition of employee in ESA PI, s. 1 is inclusive, which means that it is not a closed set of characteristics. The statutory purpose test, like the definition of employee, is meant to be expansive and inclusive. The test was first formulated in Majestic Maintenance Services Limited (February 8, 1977), ESC 479A (Burkett), in which Referee Burkett held that the traditional common law tests were not appropriate for interpreting the scope of the Act when the Act was clearly designed to expand upon or enhance the protections of the common law. Referee Burkett concluded that the existence of an employment relationship should be assessed by reference to the purpose of the statute, which he characterized as "intended to provide certain benefits to persons who by reason of their economic dependence or lack of bargaining power in the market place, might otherwise have to work on terms below the basic minima established in the Act." Referee Burkett further observed that "Whereas the Act is not designed to protect or underwrite the independent businessman… it must be said (and indeed it follows from the Becker decision) that it is designed to protect those who are dependent in their employment."

The statutory interpretation test was further parsed out by the OLRB in Andrew Beyers Carpentry Inc. v Mohammed, 2010 CanLII 23842 (ON LRB). The Board noted that the purpose of the ESA 2000 is to address the potential negative effects of unequal bargaining power between employees and employers. The Board stated that although the statutory purpose of the Act is easy to state, its application to a variety of "ever-changing" contractual agreements designed to obtain skills and services in a cost-effective way is challenging, and requires nuanced analyses to determine if there is economic dependence even where those agreements were specifically designed to include features that are commonly associated with independent contractors.

In applying the statutory interpretation test, the Board considered the claimant's work in the context of the construction industry. The Board noted that in the context of the construction industry, workers had more economic power in providing skills and services than in industrial settings, but there was no fundamental change to the underlying inequality between worker and employer. Furthermore, the Board stated that the fact that construction work is often done in multiple relationships of short duration and little day-to-day supervision was merely a function of the industry itself (e.g., duration of projects and the highly skilled nature of the worker), and not necessarily evidence of an independent contractor arrangement. The Board found that a relationship of economic dependence characteristic of the construction industry existed between the employer and the claimant. It was clear that the claimant agreed to provide her work regularly without any specified hour limit and with the expectation that she would be paid on a weekly basis. The Board found that the fact that the claimant agreed to use her cell phone and car was more indicative of her weak negotiating position than of her being an independent contractor. The fact that the employer did not take statutory deductions off of her pay and that the claimant was happy with that arrangement was not determinative, because the ESA 2000 is not applied in accordance with the preferences persons may have with respect to other statutes.

Application of the Common Law Tests

Following the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in 671122 Ontario Ltd. v Sagaz, the Board has generally not applied one singular test for determining whether an employee-employer relationship exists. Rather, the Board has broadly utilized the various tests and any other relevant factors. Similarly, it is Program policy that the various common law tests and any other relevant factors should be applied and considered when determining when an individual is an employee or an independent contractor. The following Board decisions are some good examples of how the common law tests and other factors have been utilized.

In Warren v 2006515 Ontario Inc., 2005 CanLII 1757 (ON LRB), the OLRB looked at several factors in determining that the claimant, a manager of a health food store, was in fact an employee and not an independent contractor. There were several facts that suggested the claimant was an independent contractor: she invested in one product for sale to her own profit; for a period, she financed the balance of the inventory; she used the terms "Nutritional Services" and "Managerial Services" on documents to describe the work she did for the employer; and no statutory deductions were made from gross amounts owing to her for work performed. However, the OLRB found that there was substantial evidence to determine that the claimant was in fact an employee: the employer had control over her activities; the employer provided the premises and the equipment used; the employer had ultimate control to determine what product would be stocked; and the claimant had essentially no opportunity for profit or risk of loss. The Board has followed the approach articulated in Warren v 2006515 Ontario Inc. in other decisions, for example: Big Picture Home Entertainment Limited v MacDonald, 2016 CanLII 82670 (ON LRB); Iris Blu Staffing Limited v Irwin, 2016 CanLII 56987 (ON LRB); and Bining v 1391165 Ontario Inc. (Wallace Transport), 2009 CanLII 33872 (ON LRB).

In Teneva v 946900 Ontario Limited o/a Idlewood Inn/Cloverleaf Motel, 2016 CanLII 2422 (ON LRB), the OLRB considered whether a housekeeper for a motel was an employee or an independent contractor. The employer relied on a document signed by the claimant that stated she agreed to be an independent contractor. The employer also argued that the claimant could set her own schedule, refuse work and increase her profits by cleaning more rooms.

The OLRB found that the "independent contractor agreement" was not determinative. The OLRB stated that whether or not an individual is an employee is a question of fact and law to be determined after consideration of all of the relevant factors. The OLRB noted that the intention of the parties is relevant only to the extent that it is reflected in the actual structure and circumstances of their relationship, that is, parties cannot by their "agreement" make their relationship as one of independent contractor if the facts show that there is an employee-employer relationship.

The OLRB found that the claimant was an employee based on the following facts: the employer exercised substantial control over the claimant's schedule; the claimant was expected to answer the employer's call to work, regardless of the time of day, which meant that the claimant was unable to work for any other employer or attend job interviews to find alternate employment; the employer provided the claimant with all the cleaning products and equipment she required; and the claimant had limited ability to profit from cleaning rooms, as the employer decided the number and type of rooms she was to clean.

In Ilaris Corporation v Gadzevych, 2007 CanLII 19192 (ON LRB), the OLRB considered whether a claimant who performed repair and renovation services for a fixed amount on a per project basis was an employee or an independent contractor. The OLRB concluded that he was in fact an employee because he was an integral part of the employer's business. Although he was hired for a fixed amount per project, he was not free to substitute someone else to perform the work and there was no sense in which he could be described as being in business for himself.

In Appleseed Snow Blowing Service Inc. v Bourguignon, 2005 CanLII 38056 (ON LRB), the OLRB found that the claimant, a snow shoveler, was an independent contractor whose snow shoveling activities were more akin to being engaged in business on his own account. There was no ongoing working relationship between the snow shovelers and the employer, and snow shovelers were free to engage in other activities or employment in between snowfalls. The employer exercised little control over the activities of the snow shovelers as it did not require them to work following every snowfall and did not dictate hours of work, how or in what order the work was to be done. The snow shovelers also arranged their own transportation between work sites and provided their own equipment.

Miscellaneous

There are other persons who may or may not be considered employees for the purposes of the ESA 2000, some of whom are discussed in greater detail below. For information regarding the exclusions in s. 3(5), see ESA Part III, s. 3.

Directors

Paragraph 11 of s. 3(5) and s. 3(6) of the Act read:

3(5) This Act does not apply with respect to the following individuals and any person for whom such an individual performs work or from whom such an individual receives compensation:

11. A director of a corporation, except as provided in Part XX (Liability of Directors), Part XXI (Who Enforces This Act and What They Can Do), Part XXII (Complaints and Enforcement), Part XXIII

(Reviews by the Board), Part XXIV (Collection), Part XXV (Offences and Prosecutions), Part XXVI (Miscellaneous Evidentiary Provisions), Part XXVII (Regulations) and Part XXVIII (Transition, Amendment, Repeals, Commencement and Short Title).

3(6) Where an individual who performs work or occupies a position described in subsection (5) also performs some other work or occupies some other position and does so as an employee, nothing in subsection (5) precludes the application of this Act to that individual and his or her employer insofar as that other work or position is concerned.

These sections provide that the Act does not apply with respect to directors of a corporation, in their role as directors, except as provided in ESA Parts XX-XXVIII. However, the Act does apply to an individual who is a director but who also performs work or occupies a position as an employee. In order to determine whether ESA Part III, s. 3(6) applies, however, it is Program policy that directors, who constitute the controlling mind of a corporation, are not, in the absence of clear evidence of an employment contract, to be considered employees for the purposes of the Act. See Re D.J.'s Family Centre Ltd., 1977 CanLII 1331 (ON SC) and Satellite Computer and Communication Systems Ltd. v Dryla (May 8, 1980), ESC 784 (Adamson), decisions under the former Employment Standards Act.

For cases under the former Employment Standards Act where a director of a corporation was also found to be an employee, see Algoma Rubber Services Ltd v Johnston (April 19, 1982), ESC 1205 (Eaton), where the Referee held that although the claimant was a director of the company, a minority shareholder and held the position of Vice-President and General Manager, his directorship did not preclude a finding that he was an employee for the purposes of the former Employment Standards Act. The referee found that there was a contract of employment and that the claimant was receiving wages within the meaning of the Act, and not being paid a consulting fee for his services. In addition, he was a Director in name only and his minority shareholder position was such that he had no effective say in the control of the company. See also Munro v Cord King International (August 24, 1998), 2086-97-ES (ON LRB), where the adjudicator found on an application for review of an employment standards officer's decision that the applicant, who was both a president and director of a company, was an employee under the former Employment Standards Act and therefore entitled to receive unpaid wages. While the applicant did have the title of president, he had no control over the decisions of the company, no control over its finances, and no substantial ability to hire, terminate, discipline or set salaries for the employees. As for his directorship, the employer had designated him as a director without the applicant's knowledge or consent.

Partners

A partnership is the relationship that exists between parties carrying on business in common with a view to profit. In the same way that a person cannot be their own employee, a partner cannot be employed by the partnership. See Berini o/a Noront Printing v Purificati (September 9, 1975), ESC 286 (Soubliere), a case decided under the former Employment Standards Act. The fact that a claimant is registered as a partner is not conclusive of partnership status, as there may be factors that will lead to a conclusion that the so-called partner is actually an employee for the purposes of the Act. To be partners, parties must have an agreement to carry on business in common and share profits. Some of the other indicia of partnership status include the contribution by the parties of money, property, effort, knowledge, skill or other assets to the common business, a joint ownership interest in the business, a mutual right of control or management of the enterprise, and authority to contract liabilities in respect of the business that is being carried on. Therefore, it is essential to look closely at the relationship between the parties to determine if the facts are more indicative of a partnership or an employer-employee relationship.

Corporate Shareholders

Corporate shareholders may be employed by the company in which they own shares. Even a major shareholder with a controlling interest in the company may be an employee, though they would have to occupy an employee position - shareholder status obviously does not make an individual an employee.

Agent

An agent is someone who can make a contract or dispose of property on their principal's behalf. This authority may be held by an independent contractor or by an employee. Therefore, the fact that a claimant is an agent is not determinative. The common law tests must be applied when examining the relationship to determine whether the claimant is an independent contractor/agent or an employee/agent.

Franchisees

Bona fide franchisees are generally not considered to be employees. In Groulx v Loeb Inc. (November 26, 1992), ES 203/92 (Novick), a case under the former Employment Standards Act, the claimant argued that he was a glorified store manager, not a franchisee, due to the high degree of control exercised by the franchisor: the franchisor held the head lease for the store premises, Loeb management was generally involved in the demotion and termination of employees in the franchisee's store, the franchisor suggested retail prices for the store's products, and the franchisee store was generally required to order its stock from Loeb. The adjudicator found, however, that the franchisee was not an employee because of the following: the claimant was the sole shareholder of the franchisee operation; he invested a substantial amount of money into the store at various stages, running the risk of significant financial loss or gain; and the claimant's company owned all of the equipment and inventory in the store. The claimant also made all key decisions with respect to the purchasing of products and the prices at which they were sold, albeit in accordance with dictated norms or industry practice; decided hours the store would be open; and had authority to hire and fire employees.

Lessees

Where a claimant is party to a lease agreement, leasing the business premises from a third party, they will not generally be considered an employee.

However, there are exceptions to this. For example, in Anderson et al v Neil operating as Gerry Neil Texaco Service (September 13, 1973), ESC 181 (McNish), the claimant was found to be an employee under the former Employment Standards Act even though he had a lease agreement with the Texaco Oil Company. The referee found Mr. Neil (the claimant) to be in the same position as a foreperson in a normal employee-employer arrangement. Most significant was the fact that Texaco maintained financial control on a daily basis and that Mr. Neil was paid a flat salary, not a share in the profits of the business.

Strikers

Persons on strike are employees under common law and are also considered to be employees under the inclusive definition in the ESA 2000. For example, see Re Domtar Chemicals Limited (August 17, 1973), ESC 139 (Fram), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act.

Personal Service Corporations

When a person has incorporated and provides services through the corporation, the assumption is often made that the person is, therefore, an independent contractor as opposed to an employee. However, where the person themselves is providing services through the corporation, the fact of the incorporation does not preclude a finding that they are an employee for the purposes of the ESA 2000. The common law tests should be applied to determine if the relationship is in fact one of employee-employer.

For example, in Queensbury Enterprises Inc. v J.R. Corporate Planning Associates Inc., the Ontario High Court held that there was an employee-employer relationship where a personal services corporation was retained to provide the defendant with financial consulting services. The sole and principal shareholder of the corporation was found to be an employee of the defendant, and therefore entitled to reasonable notice of termination.

Temporary Help Agencies

Temporary help agencies provide personnel to clients who require temporary or short-term help. A common example is the agency that supplies its clients with secretaries, data entry clerks, etc. during peak periods or when a replacement is required due to illness or pregnancy or parental leave. Although the personnel are subject to the host business' control with regard to the work they do for the client, they are not employed by the client. Generally speaking they are regarded as employees of the temporary help agency, for the purposes of the ESA 2000. See Occasional Office Help c.o.b. Data Capture v Tinney et al (July 28, 1977), ESC 444 (Picher) and Taylored Drivers Inc. v Beck et al (March 3, 1980), ESC 720 (Adamson), decisions under the former Employment Standards Act which discussed the issue of "Elect to Work" status of temporary help agency employees.

It should be noted, however, that just as one must always look to substance and not be misled by form when determining whether an employment relationship exists, one must also look to substance and not be misled by form when considering whether the host business is in fact the employer, or at least an employer (along with the agency, under the joint unrelated employers rule) for purposes of the Act. This is particularly likely to be the case where an individual spends many years working in the same job for the same host business without interruption while having ostensibly been employed by a succession of unrelated temporary help agencies, each of whom supposedly provided the individual's services to the host and where the individual's situation throughout was not distinguishable, as a practical matter, from that of an employee of the host. However, one should not be quick to draw the conclusion that an individual supposedly employed by a temporary help agency is in fact an employee of a host business; temporary help agencies fulfill an important and legitimate function, and where someone's services are apparently being provided to a host through the medium of an agency it should not lightly be assumed that form does not in fact reflect substance.

Employer

"Employer" includes,

(a) an owner, proprietor, manager, superintendent, overseer, receiver or trustee of an activity, business, work, trade, occupation, profession, project or undertaking who has control or direction of, or is directly or indirectly responsible for, the employment of a person in it, and

(b) any persons treated as one employer under section 4, and includes a person who was an employer;

The definition of “employer” includes the persons described in (a) and (b) above. It is the existence of a relationship between the employer and the employee (in the form of employment) that imposes the statutory obligations upon the person(s) defined as employer for the purposes of the Act.

An inquiry as to whether an employment relationship exists is resolved by applying the common law tests described in the preceding discussion on the employee definition. Essentially, the common law tests may be applied to determine whether a claimant is an employee, thereby imputing the position of employer to the other party to the employment relationship.

It should be noted, however, that the term employer as defined in the Act is given a broader meaning than its ordinary common law meaning. The term employer in the Act includes persons who may not be considered employers at common law. The Act also allows for the possibility of more than one person having employer status in relation to the same employee, either as persons having control or direction of an employee or having responsibility, directly or indirectly for the employment of a person, or entities carrying on associated or related activities or businesses with such persons. Therefore, it is necessary to determine which of these possible employers owes the statutory obligations set out in the ESA 2000 to the employee.

Statutory Provisions

Owner, Proprietor, etc.

"Employer" includes,

(a) an owner, proprietor, manager, superintendent, overseer, receiver or trustee of an activity, business, work, trade, occupation, profession, project or undertaking who has control or direction of, or is directly or indirectly responsible for, the employment of a person in it,

This part of the definition states that any owner, proprietor, manager, superintendent, overseer, receiver or trustee who has control or direction of, or is directly or indirectly responsible for, the employment of a person is an employer.

In Re National Bank of Canada et al. and McArthur et al., 1986 CanLII 2837 (ON SC), a receiver-manager had refused service of an order to pay under the former Employment Standards Act in respect of employee vacation pay entitlements, arguing that it was not an employer under the Act. On judicial review of the case, the Divisional Court ruled that the Ministry had acted properly in serving the receiver-manager with the order, as a means of ensuring that the employee entitlements were dealt with properly from the proceeds of realization. In affirming the referee's decision, the Court stated:

[The receiver-manager] clearly took control of and was directly or indirectly responsible for the employment of the employees of Windsor Packing. Nothing could have demonstrated that control or responsibility more clearly than the exercise by Price Waterhouse of the right to terminate employment in the case of many of the employees. In doing so as agent of the owner, it did so as owner, as a matter of law. This brought it squarely within the statutory definition of "employer".
Amendments to the former Employment Standards Act in 1987 specifically included receivers and trustees within the definition of employer to codify the principle that the definition was intended to include such persons who have control of, or direct or indirect responsibility for, the employment of a person.

It should be noted that it has not been and is not the policy of the Program to consider the receiver or trustee personally liable for ESA 2000 obligations incurred by an insolvent employer where the receiver or trustee continues to operate the employer's business for some period of time following insolvency, for the purpose of carrying out his/her obligations respecting distribution among creditors. However, if the receiver or trustee was carrying on business for a lengthy period of time with no apparent view to distribution, the Program might consider imputing personal liability on the trustee or receiver.

Joint Unrelated Employers

In Baldeo et al v Regent Park Community Improvement Association (May 26, 1980), ESC 790 (Ellis) the Referee held that the former Employment Standards Act's definition contemplated the possibility of each employee having a number of different employers at any one time. Although he acknowledged that this concept might not accord with other substantive aspects of the Act, he felt that the definition was workable if it was interpreted as referring to a particular person as an employer as determined "by the aspect of the employment for which that person is or was in fact responsible directly or indirectly, or over which he did indeed have control or direction."

In that case, the issue was which of two entities, the Association or the Ontario Housing Commission ("OHC"), was the employer of the claimant laundry attendants with regard to their claims for unpaid wages and vacation pay. The laundry attendants had been hired by the Association and were paid by the Association, pursuant to a contract between the Association and the OHC. Under the contract, the OHC provided funds, including those paid out to the laundry attendants by the Association as wages, for the building management services supplied by the Association.

The Association took the position that the OHC was the true employer and that the Association's status as employer was nominal only.

The Referee examined the contract and the relationship between the Association and the OHC and noted (among other things) that the Association was in a legal position, pursuant to its contract with the OHC, to control the way the agreed-upon arrangements concerning the employment of the claimants were administered. The Association thereby assumed a responsibility to the persons employed, pursuant to that arrangement, to see that their rights with respect to wages and like matters would not be jeopardized by the nature of that arrangement, or the way in which it was administered.

As a consequence, the Referee held that the Association was a person who, as a "manager, superintendent or overseer", was "directly or indirectly responsible" for the compensation aspects of the complainants' employment. Therefore, the Association was an employer for the purposes of the complaints in question.

However, he also noted that the laundry rooms were the property of the OHC and, in fact, were facilities that the OHC was obligated to provide to its tenants. The supervision of the staff of those facilities (the laundry attendants) was, as a practical matter, largely assumed by the OHC senior project manager. In addition, the laundry attendants were required to attend training sessions run by OHC staff. Finally, the OHC strictly controlled the Association's funding, thereby indirectly controlling the payment of wages to the laundry attendants. The Referee therefore held:

It is also self-evident, in my opinion, that OHC clearly falls within the Act's definition of "employer" with respect to the complaining employees. OHC is the "owner or proprietor" and probably also the "manager" of the laundry services activity and while its "control or direction" of the "employment" of the claimants may be a matter for argument it is at the very least "indirectly responsible" for that employment….
Although the Referee was unable to attach any liability for the unpaid wages and vacation pay to OHC by reason of its status as a Crown agency, he did make it clear that both the OHC and the Association fell within the definition of employer under the former Employment Standards Act as regards the laundry attendants' claims. See ESA Part III, s. 3.1 for more information on Crown agencies and employees.

It should be noted that the referee did not suggest that every person who could be seen as falling within the broad definition of employer under the former Employment Standards Act would necessarily incur every liability that could possibly befall an employer under that Act. He recognized, for example, that in light of the definition a foreperson might be considered an employer for some purposes, but that a foreperson should not be considered to be personally liable for unpaid wages. In the referee's view, the key to applying the definition in s. 1 where more than one person fell within the definition was that a person or persons could be held responsible only for those aspects of the employment relationship in respect of which it could be said that they had control or direction of, or were directly or indirectly responsible for the person's employment. This principle enunciated in Baldeo et al v Regent Park Community Improvement Association continues to be the Program's policy under the ESA 2000.

It is also important to note that the joint liability of OHC and the Association in the above case was not based on the provision in the Act that provides for one or more entities to be treated as one employer, often called the related employers' provision. That provision is referred to in clause (b) of the definition of employer of the ESA 2000 and defined in ESA Part IV, s. 4 - see the discussion below under Related Employers.

Related Employers

"Employer" includes,

(b) any persons treated as one employer under section 4, and includes a person who was an employer.

Section 4 of the Act is reproduced below:

4(1) Subsection (2) applies if (a) associated or related activities or businesses are or were carried on by or through an employer and one or more other persons; and

(b) the intent or effect of their doing so is or has been to directly or indirectly defeat the intent and purpose of this Act.

(2) The employer and the other person or persons described in subsection (1) shall all be treated as one employer for the purposes of this Act.

(3) Subsection (2) applies even if the activities or businesses are not carried on at the same time.

(4) Subsection (2) does not apply with respect to a corporation and an individual who is a shareholder of the corporation unless the individual is a member of a partnership and the shares are held for the purposes of the partnership.

(4.1) Subsection (2) does not apply to the Crown, a Crown agency or an authority, board, commission or corporation all of whose members are appointed by the Crown.

(5) Persons who are treated as one employer under this section are jointly and severally liable for any contravention of this Act and the regulations under it and for any wages owing to an employee of any of them.

This section expands the definition of employer to include persons who carry on or have carried on associated or related activities or businesses with the principal employer, and aims to hold them accountable as one employer. Such persons are commonly referred to as "related employers".

While each joint unrelated employer must have direct or indirect control or responsibility for the employee in order to be found to be a joint unrelated employer, related employers do not have to have such control or responsibility, though obviously the principal employer must in order for there to be a related employer finding. It is the relationship of the related employer to the principal employer, rather than its relationship, if any, to the employee, that is the source of the liability under the Act.

For further discussion, refer to ESA Part III, s. 4.

Employment Contract

"Employment contract" includes a collective agreement;

This defines "employment contract" as including a collective agreement. The term collective agreement is not itself defined in the ESA 2000, but would presumably include any agreement between an employer and a trade union, as defined in ESA Part I, s. 1, that contains the terms and conditions of employment for employees in a bargaining unit represented by that trade union.

The definition of employment contract in ESA Part I, s. 1 is inclusive, not exhaustive. This means that, under the definition, a collective agreement is just one particular example of what constitutes an employment contract. Other examples that are not specifically mentioned in the definition but that fall under the definition include a written employment contract between an employer and a non-unionized employee, an oral contract between an employer and a non-unionized employee, and an implied contract between an employer and a non-unionized employee.

Employment Standard

"Employment standard" means a requirement or prohibition under this Act that applies to an employer for the benefit of an employee;

This defines an “employment standard” as being an employer's obligation for the benefit of an employee under the Act.

As reflected by the name of this Act, the concept of employment standards is the core of this legislation. The Act both establishes and provides for the enforcement of minimum rights, both monetary and non-monetary, with respect to the terms and conditions of employment.

Establishment

"Establishment", with respect to an employer, means a location at which the employer carries on business but, if the employer carries on business at more than one location, separate locations constitute one establishment if,

(a) the separate locations are located within the same municipality, or

(b) one or more employees at a location have seniority rights that extend to the other location under a written employment contract whereby the employee or employees may displace another employee of the same employer;

An establishment is defined as a location where the employer carries on business. Separate locations will be considered one establishment if they are in the same municipality. Locations in separate municipalities will also be considered one establishment if an employee in one location has contractual bumping rights that extend to the other location. Bumping rights are typically found in collective agreements, but they can also sometimes be found in employment contracts that are not collective agreements.

It is the policy of the Program that it is the largest area of municipal organization that will constitute the municipality for purposes of the definition of establishment in the Act.

In some cases, the largest area of municipal organization will be an upper tier municipality, e.g., the Regional Municipality of Peel; in such a case, the area of a lower tier municipality within the upper tier municipality (e.g., the City of Brampton) would not be treated as the municipality for the purposes of the establishment definition.

In other cases, there may not be any upper tier or lower tier municipality, but simply a single tier municipality, e.g., the City of Toronto.

To determine whether a particular location is within an upper tier municipality, reference might be made to the Ontario Municipal Directory, which is published by the Association of Municipal Managers, Clerks and Treasurers of Ontario, or to the list of All Ontario Municipalities link on the website of the Association of Municipalities of Ontario.

F

G

H

Homeworker

"Homeworker" means an individual who performs work for compensation in premises occupied by the individual primarily as residential quarters but does not include an independent contractor;

A "homeworker" is a person who performs work for compensation in a place that is primarily used as the person's home. The definition of homeworker does not include persons employed to perform work in premises that are not their residence, such as domestic workers, housekeepers, and homecare workers of social service agencies.

If an individual performs any type of work in premises that are occupied by them primarily as residential quarters for compensation, that individual will fall within the definition of homeworker. The definition in the ESA 2000 is expansive in that it includes all types of work, including sewing operations, assembly and packaging operations (e.g., of small parts, toys or games), addressing envelopes (e.g., for direct mail advertisers), typing (e.g., of insurance policies), design of computer programs, and editing on a word processor, and other types of work that do not involve the manufacture, preparation, improvement, etc., of goods such as telemarketing.

Special rules regarding homeworkers apply in the case of recordkeeping, minimum wage and the provisions regarding advising homeworkers of the calculation of homeworkers' wages and the deadlines for completing their work. See ESA Part VI, s. 15(2), O Reg 285/01, s. 5(1) para. 4, ss. 5(2) and 5(3) and O Reg 285/01, s. 12, respectively.

Employment Relationship

A homeworker is an employee by virtue of paragraph (d) of the definition of employee in ESA Part I, s. 1(1):

"Employee" includes a person who is a homeworker

The specific exclusion of independent contractors in the homeworker definition was added in the ESA, 2000 to clarify that just because homeworkers are listed under the definition of employee does not mean that all homeworkers are employees.

Whether a particular homeworker is an employee, or an independent contractor not subject to the Act, may sometimes be difficult to decide.

In one decision under the former Employment Standards Act, Sparta Mercantile Ltd. v Hulst (June 21, 1984), ESC 1657 (Brown), the referee applied the standard common law tests (the four-fold test and the organization test - see the definition of employee in ESA Part I, s. 1) and and concluded that the of home-sewers was more clearly equivalent to that of an independent contractor, and that accordingly they were not employees. This decision was contrary to the Program's policy under the former Employment Standards Act. Consequently, Sparta Mercantile Ltd. v Hulst should not be relied upon for assistance in determining whether an individual who performs work for compensation out of premises that is primarily their residential quarters is an employee.

In C.N. Shoes Ltd. v Vanin (Feburary 4, 1985), ESC 1780 (Davis), another decision under the former Employment Standards Act, the claimant made leather uppers for shoes and owned most of the hand tools, while the company supplied the jack, leather, thread and beeswax. Every Friday, the claimant took to the company factory the work completed during the preceding week, and received a further supply of work for the next week. At that time he signed a standard work order for the completed items, which described the claimant as a sub-contractor, and the claimant was paid accordingly.

The employer in C.N. Shoes Ltd. v Vanin did not exercise the kind of control over the home-cobbler that was common to employer-employee relationships. However, the referee held that homeworkers are not required by the Act to conform to the typical employer-employee relationship and questioned the usefulness of the common law tests applied in Sparta Mercantile Ltd. v Hulst. After all, one of the inherent characteristics of homework is that the employee works at home with little supervision, deciding when and how to work. If a common law test is required, the referee considered the organization test to be the appropriate one in the circumstances. The claimant was a necessary and integral part of the company's business: without his work on the uppers, no shoe could be completed.

Hospital

"Hospital" means a hospital as defined in the Hospital Labour Disputes Arbitration Act;

This definition provides that the term "hospital" under the ESA 2000 has the same meaning as under the Hospital Labour Disputes Arbitration Act, RSO 1990, c H-14 ("HLDAA").

The HLDAA defines hospital as:

Any hospital, sanitarium, sanatorium, long-term care home or other institution operated for the observation, care or treatment of persons afflicted with or suffering from any physical or mental illness, disease or injury or for the observation, care or treatment of convalescent or chronically ill persons, whether or not it is granted aid out of moneys appropriated by the Legislature and whether or not it is operated for private gain.

This definition in HLDAA was amended in 2010, by replacing the terms "nursing home" and "home for the aged" with the term "long-term care home". This amendment did not alter the substance of the definition, as long-term care home includes what was previously referred to as nursing homes and homes for the aged.

The term hospital appears in ESA Part X Public Holidays.

I

Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay

“infectious disease emergency leave pay” means pay for any paid days of leave taken under subsection 50.1(1.2);

This definition was added by the COVID-19 Putting Workers First Act, 2021, effective April 29, 2021.

Infectious disease emergency leave pay is defined as pay for any paid days of leave taken under ss. 50.1(1.2). That subsection provides eligible employees with an entitlement of up to three paid days of infectious disease emergency leave in certain circumstances related to a designated infectious disease.

The manner for calculating the infectious disease emergency leave pay an employee may be entitled to receive is established by ss. 50.1(1.11).

J

K

L

Labour Relations Officer

"Labour relations officer" means a labour relations officer appointed under the Labour Relations Act, 1995;

This defines labour relations officers referred to in the Act as officers appointed under the Labour Relations Act, 1995.

M

Minister

"Minister" means the Minister of Labour;

This definition provides that references in the Act to "Minister" are references to the Minister of Labour.

However, under the authority of the Executive Council Act, an order in council that was approved on November 28, 2019 assigned responsibility for the ESA 2000 to the Minister of Labour, Training and Skills Development. Accordingly, this definition and references in the ESA 2000 and this Manual to the Minister of Labour are to be read as if they said the Minister of Labour, Training and Skills Development.

Ministry

"Ministry" means the Ministry of Labour;

This definition provides that references to "Ministry" in the Act are references to the Ministry of Labour.

However, under the authority of the Executive Council Act, an order in council that was approved on November 28, 2019 assigned responsibility for the ESA 2000 (and EPFNA) to the Ministry of Labour, Training and Skills Development. Accordingly, this definition and references in the ESA 2000 (and EPFNA) and this Manual to the Ministry of Labour are to be read as if they said the Ministry of Labour, Training and Skills Development.

N

O

Overtime Hour

“Overtime hour", with respect to an employee, means,

a) if one or more provisions in the employee's employment contract or in another Act that applies to the employee's employment provides a greater benefit for overtime than Part VIII (Overtime Pay), an hour of work in excess of the overtime threshold set out in that provision, and

b) otherwise, an hour of work in excess of the overtime threshold under this Act that applies to the employee's employment;

This provision defines "overtime hour" as:

If the employee's employment contract (which includes a collective agreement) provides a greater benefit than that provided by Part VIII of the ESA 2000 (Overtime Pay), an hour of work that exceeds the threshold in the employment contract.

The term overtime hour appears in the definitions of regular rate and regular work week, and in ESA Part VIII Overtime Pay and ESA Part X Public Holidays.

P

Person

"Person" includes a trade union;

The purpose of this provision is to avoid having to add a reference to union where the Act was making a reference to "person". In law, a trade union is not normally considered to be a person. The definition is inclusive, and so should not be taken to exclude other persons, such as individuals and corporations. In law, a corporation is a person.

Personal Emergency Leave Pay

The definition of the phrase "personal emergency leave pay" was repealed pursuant to the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018 effective January 1, 2019. The phrase appeared in section 50 (Personal Emergency Leave), which was also repealed as a result of the same legislation. Since employees may still have a complaint relating to personal emergency leave pay that arose during the period of time when personal emergency leave pay was in force – from January 1 to December 31, 2018 – the discussion of this definition remains as part of this publication. The text appears in red to highlight that the definition has been repealed.

"Personal emergency leave pay" means pay for any paid days of leave taken under section 50;

This definition was added by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 SO 2017, c 22.

Personal emergency leave pay is defined as pay for any paid days of leave taken under ESA Part XIV, s. 50. Section 50(5) provides an entitlement to two paid days of personal emergency leave per year if an employee has been employed for at least a week. The amount of personal emergency leave pay that an employee is entitled to is determined by ESA Part XIV, ss. 50(9), (10) and (11).

Premium Pay

"Premium pay" means an employee's entitlement for working on a public holiday as described in subsection 24(2);

Under ESA Part X Public Holidays, employees may have the right to receive, among other entitlements, premium pay if they work on a public holiday. Section 24(2) states that the amount of premium pay must be at least one and one half times the employee's regular rate.

For further discussion, please refer to ESA Part X Public Holidays.

Prescribed

"Prescribed" means prescribed by the regulations;

This definition provides that the word "prescribed" means as set out in the regulations under the ESA 2000.

Public Holiday

"Public holiday" means any of the following:

1. New Year's Day.
1.1 Family Day, being the third Monday in February.
2. Good Friday.
3. Victoria Day.
4. Canada Day.
5. Labour Day.

6. Thanksgiving Day.
7. Christmas Day.
8. December 26.
9. Any day prescribed as a public holiday.

This provision defines public holidays for the purposes of the Act. Note that where a substitution is made, as provided for in ESA Part X, that substitute day is to be treated as if it were the named public holiday. This means that the substitute holiday takes the place of the public holiday. Therefore, the formula to be used for calculating public holiday pay for the substitute holiday would be the formula that is in effect on the date of the substitute holiday.

In each year:

- New Year's Day is January 1;
- Family Day is the third Monday in February (the first Family Day fell on February 18, 2008);
- Good Friday is the Friday before Easter Sunday. Easter Sunday (which is not named as one of the days that are public holidays for the purposes of the Act) varies from year to year, but is always between March 22 and April 25. It falls on the first Sunday following the paschal full moon, which is determined from algorithmic tables and can differ from the date of the actual full moon by up to two days;
- Victoria Day is the Monday preceding May 25;
- Canada Day is July 1, unless July 1 falls on a Sunday, in which case the public holiday is July 2 by virtue of the federal Holidays Act, RSC 1985, c H-5 (see subsection 88(4) of the Legislation Act, 2006, SO 2006, c 21, Sch F);
- Labour Day is the first Monday in September;
- Thanksgiving Day is the second Monday in October;
- Christmas Day is December 25; and
- December 26 (also known as Boxing Day) is December 26.

For the purposes of the public holiday provisions, the Program considers a day to be a calendar day running from 0001 hours to 2400 hours. It is Program policy that where a shift spans two calendar days, the entire shift is, unless the employer has adopted a different policy that is reasonable and that it consistently applies, considered to have been worked on the calendar day on which the shift began. For example, where an eight-hour shift commenced at 11 p.m. on the Thursday evening before Good Friday, the seven hours actually falling on Good Friday will not be considered to have been hours worked on a public holiday. Similarly, where an eight-hour shift commenced at 11 p.m. on the evening of Good Friday, all eight hours are considered to have been worked on the public holiday, notwithstanding that seven of them actually fell on the next calendar day.

Public Holiday Pay

"Public holiday pay" means an employee's entitlement with respect to a public holiday as determined under subsection 24(1);

Under the circumstances set out in ESA Part X Public Holidays, employers must pay employees public holiday pay for a public holiday. Section 24(1) states that the amount of public holiday pay must be equal to:

1. The total amount of regular wages earned in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday, divided by the number of days the employee worked in that pay period; or
2. If some other manner of calculation is prescribed, the amount determined using that manner of calculation.

For further discussion, please refer to ESA Part X.

Q

R

Regular Rate

"Regular rate" means, subject to any regulation made under paragraph 10 of subsection 141 (1),

- a. for an employee who is paid by the hour, the amount earned for an hour of work in the employee's usual work week, not counting overtime hours,
- b. otherwise, the amount earned in a given work week divided by the number of non-overtime hours actually worked in that week;

This definition establishes that the "regular rate", which serves as the basis for many calculations (e.g., overtime pay and public holiday entitlements, and what constitutes a week of lay-off for termination and severance purposes) under the Act, is the rate of pay for each non-overtime hour of work. In a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, the referee held that an agreement that incorporates a component for overtime premiums into the regular rate of pay is of no effect since it is inconsistent with the provisions of the Act and does not excuse an employer from calculating and paying overtime in accordance with the number of hours worked in excess of the statutory overtime threshold of 44 hours - see Wen-Hal Limited v Hansen (August 22, 1979), ESC 660 (MacDowell).

Under this definition, an employee's regular rate will be:

1. Where an hourly wage rate is set, it is the regular rate.
2. Where wages are not based on an hourly rate, regular rate will be the average hourly rate calculated by dividing the total wages earned in the week by the number of non-overtime hours worked. Overtime hour is defined in ESA Part I s. 1. This method of calculation applies to a person who, for example, is paid a fixed salary, or commission or on a piecework basis. For further information on the calculation of regular rate in the context of determining overtime pay, see ESA Part VIII, s. 22(1)
3. If a regulation made under paragraph 10 of ESA Part XXVII, s. 141(1) applies to an employee, the calculation contained in the regulation will prevail over 1) and 2) above. Paragraph 10 allows the Lieutenant Governor in Council to make a regulation setting out a formula for the determination of an employee's regular rate that would apply instead of the formula that applies under the definition of regular rate in ESA Part I, s. 1.

Regular Wages

The definition of "regular wages" was amended pursuant to the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018 effective January 1, 2019 to remove the reference to personal emergency leave pay and to section 50 of the Act. (Personal emergency leave was repealed as a result of the same legislation.) Since issues may arise with respect to the period of time when this version of the definition was in force – from January 1 to December 31, 2018 – the discussion remains as part of this publication.

"Regular wages" means wages other than overtime pay, public holiday pay, premium pay, vacation pay, domestic or sexual violence leave pay, personal emergency leave pay, termination pay, severance pay and termination of assignment pay and entitlements under a provision of an employee's contract of employment that under subsection 5(2) prevail over Part VIII, Part X, Part XI, section 49.7, section 50, Part XV or section 74.10.1;

This definition was amended by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 SO 2017, c 22, when "domestic or sexual violence leave pay", "personal emergency leave pay" and "termination of assignment pay" were introduced into the Act.

This definition establishes that regular wages, which serves as the basis for the calculations of public holiday pay in ESA Part X, s. 24(1) and termination pay and severance pay entitlements in ESA Part XV, ss. 60(1), (2) and ss. 65(1),(5), (6), includes all wages except:

- Overtime pay;
- Public holiday pay;
- Premium pay;
- Vacation pay;
- Domestic or sexual violence leave pay
- Personal emergency leave pay;
- Termination pay;
- Severance pay;
- Termination of assignment pay; and
- Entitlements under an employment contract (which includes a collective agreement) that provide a greater right or benefit with respect to the standards of overtime pay, public holidays, vacation with pay, domestic or sexual violence leave, personal emergency leave, termination and severance of employment and termination of an assignment.

Note that premium pay is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1 to mean an employee's entitlement for working on a public holiday as described in ESA Part X, s. 24(2). It does not mean, for example, a premium rate of pay of an extra 50 cents an hour that an employee earns under an employment contract for working the weekend shift. Such monies owing would be included in the definition of regular wages.

Regular Wages

Regular wages" means wages other than overtime pay, public holiday pay, premium pay, vacation pay, domestic or sexual violence leave pay, infectious disease emergency leave pay, termination pay, severance pay and termination of assignment pay and entitlements under a provision of an employee's contract of employment that under subsection 5(2) prevail over Part VIII, Part X, Part XI, section 49.7, subsection 50.1(1.2), Part XV or section 74.10.1;

This definition establishes that regular wages, which serves as the basis for the calculations of public holiday pay in ESA Part X, s. 24(1) and termination pay and severance pay entitlements in ESA Part XV, ss. 60(1), (2) and ss. 65(1),(5), (6), includes all wages except:

- Overtime pay;
- Public holiday pay;
- Premium pay;
- Vacation pay;
- Domestic or sexual violence leave pay;
- Infectious disease emergency leave pay;
- Termination pay;
- Severance pay;
- Termination of assignment pay; and
- Entitlements under an employment contract (which includes a collective agreement) that provide a greater right or benefit with respect to the standards of overtime pay, public holidays, vacation with pay, domestic or sexual violence leave, paid infectious disease emergency leave, termination and severance of employment and termination of an assignment.

Note that premium pay is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1 to mean an employee's entitlement for working on a public holiday as described in ESA Part X, s. 24(2). It does not mean, for example, a premium rate of pay of an extra 50 cents an hour that an employee earns under an employment contract for working the weekend shift. Such monies owing would be included in the definition of regular wages.

Regular Work Day

"Regular work day", with respect to an employee who usually works the same number of hours each day, means a day of that many hours;

This provision provides that where an employee usually works the same numbers of hours each day, that number of hours is the employee's "regular work day". An employee does not have to work the same number of hours every work day for there to be a regular work day, just so long as they regularly and ordinarily work that number of hours.

The term regular work day appears in ESA Part VI, s. 15(3) with respect to an exception to the requirement for employers to record the number of hours worked by each employee in each day and week, and in ESA Part VII, s. 17(1) with respect to the daily limits on hours of work. If an employee does not usually work the same number of hours each day, they will not have a regular work day for the purposes of s. 15(3) or s. 17(1).

Regular Work Week

"Regular work week", with respect to an employee who usually works the same number of hours each week, means a week of that many hours but not including overtime hours;

It provides that where an employee usually works the same number of hours each week, the "regular work week" for that employee will be that number of hours, excluding overtime hours.

For further information see the overtime hour definition in ESA Part I, s. 1.

The term regular work week appears in ESA Part VI, s. 15(3) with respect to an exception to the requirement for employers to record the number of hours worked by each employee in each day and each week, in ESA Part XI, s. 33(3) with respect to the calculation of the number of single vacation days to which an employee is entitled, and in ESA Part XI, s. 34(2) with respect to the calculation of the number of vacation days earned during a stub period. In addition, it appears in the provisions that specify what constitutes a week of lay-off for termination and severance purposes in ESA Part XV, ss. 56(3)-(3.6) and ss. 63(2)-(2.4), as well as the provisions for the calculation of termination pay and severance pay entitlements in ESA Part XV, ss. 60(1), (2) and ss. 65(1), (5), (6). In this regard, also see the discussion of the work week in this section.

In Stewart Warner Corporation of Canada Limited v Employees (April 25, 1983), ESC 1406 (Egan), Referee Egan distinguished work week from a regular work week as referred to in s. 57(13)(b)(i) (then s. 40(6)(b)(i) of the former Employment Standards Act, which is substantially the same as s. 60(1)(b) of the ESA 2000). In that case, the employer had temporarily cut the shifts from five per week to three per week just prior to terminating the employees.

In calculating termination pay owing to the employees, the employer had claimed that the regular work week consisted of three shifts. The referee disagreed, stating that the reduction in shifts was anticipated to be a temporary measure only and that the regular work week still consisted of five shifts in each work week. As a consequence, termination pay in lieu of notice had to be the pay the employee would have received had he been working five shifts per week.

Regulations

"Regulations" means the regulations made under this Act;

This definition states that "regulations" as referred to in the Act refers to regulations made under the ESA 2000.

The authority to make regulations generally originates from the Legislation Act, 2006, SO 2006, c 21, Sch F. Section 17 of the Legislation Act, 2006 states:

"Regulation" means a regulation, rule, order or by-law of a legislative nature made or approved under an Act of the Legislature by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, a minister of the Crown, an official of the government or a board or commission all the members of which are appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, but does not include,

- a) a by-law of a municipality or local board as defined in the Municipal Affairs Act, or
- b) an order of the Ontario Municipal Board.

The authority to make regulations under the ESA 2000 is found in ESA Part XXVII, s. 141.

In accordance with s. 22(2) of the Legislation Act, 2006, regulations come into force on the day on which the regulation is filed unless otherwise stated in the regulation or in the Act under which the regulation is made.

Section 25(1) of the Legislation Act, 2006 further provides that regulations must be published on the e-Laws website promptly after their filing and in The Ontario Gazette within one month of filing or in accordance with another timeline that may be specified a regulation made by the Attorney General. A regulation that is not published is not effective against a person who has not had actual notice of it.

Reservist

"Reservist" means a member of the reserve force of the Canadian Forces referred to in subsection 15 (3) of the National Defence Act (Canada);

This definition was introduced by the Fairness for Military Families Act (Employment Standards and Health Insurance), 2007, SO 2007, c 16, in the creation of Reservist Leave.

A reservist is defined to mean a member of the reserve force of the Canadian Forces referred to in s. 15(3) of the federal National Defence Act, RSC 1985, c N-5, which states:

There shall be a component of the Canadian Forces, called the reserve force, that consists of officers and non-commissioned members who are enrolled for other than continuing, full-time military service when not on active service.

For further details, refer to ESA Part XIV, s. 50.2.

S

Standard Vacation Entitlement Year

"Standard vacation entitlement year" means, with respect to an employee, a recurring 12-month period that begins on the first day of the employee's employment;

This definition was introduced by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, effective November 26, 2002. The definition provides that "standard vacation entitlement year" is a recurring 12-month period that begins on a date that is the date of an employee's first day of employment.

For further details, refer to ESA Part XI.

Statutory Notice Period

"Statutory notice period" means,

a) the period of notice of termination required to be given by an employer under Part XV, or

b) where the employer provides a greater amount of notice than is required under Part XV, that part of the notice period ending with the termination date specified in the notice which equals the period of notice required under Part XV;

"Statutory notice period" is the period equal to the length of notice to which the employee is entitled under the Act. Where more notice is given than is required by the Act, the statutory notice period is the last part of the longer notice that is given. For example, if an employee was entitled under the Act to eight weeks' notice but was given 12 weeks' notice, it is the last eight weeks of the 12-week period, not the first eight weeks, that constitute the statutory notice period.

The definition becomes relevant for determining the timing of employees' statutory entitlements in situations where an employer has given a longer period of notice than it is required to give under the Act. For example, employees are to receive their full pay during the statutory notice period, even if no work is available. If an employee entitled to eight weeks' notice of termination was given 10 weeks' notice and was sent home in the ninth week due to lack of work, the employee would entitled to be paid during the ninth and tenth week, notwithstanding that they did not work, because the statutory notice period was the last eight weeks of the 10 weeks' notice.

Another example comes from ESA Part XV, s. 63(1)(e) and s. 63(3). Under those sections, an employee who receives notice of termination and then subsequently resigns is entitled to severance pay if they gives their employer at least two weeks' notice of the resignation and the notice of resignation takes effect during the statutory notice period, assuming that the other qualifying criteria for severance pay are met. If an employee was entitled under the Act to eight weeks' notice but was given 12 weeks' notice by the employer, the employee's resignation must take effect some time during the last eight weeks of the 12-week notice period in order for the employee to be entitled to severance pay. If the employee's resignation takes effect some time during the first four weeks of the 12-week notice period, the employee will not be entitled to severance pay.

Stub Period

"Stub period" means, with respect to an employee for whom the employer establishes an alternative vacation entitlement year,

- a) if the employee's first alternative vacation entitlement year begins before the completion of his or her first 12 months of employment, the period that begins on the first day of employment and ends on the day before the start of the alternative vacation entitlement year,
- b) if the employee's first alternative vacation entitlement year begins after the completion of his or her first 12 months of employment, the period that begins on the day after the day on which his or her most recent standard vacation entitlement year ended and ends on the day before the start of the alternative vacation entitlement year;

This definition was introduced by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, effective November 26, 2002.

The definition sets out what a "stub period", as referred to in ESA Part XI Vacation with Pay, means.

For details, refer to ESA Part XI.

T

Temporary Help Agency

"temporary help agency" means an employer that employs persons for the purpose of assigning them to perform work on a temporary basis for clients of the employer;

A "temporary help agency" is defined as an employer (also see the definition of "employer" in s. 1 of the Act) that employs persons for the purposes of assigning them to perform work on a temporary basis for clients of the employer. In other words, a temporary help agency is defined by the fact that it employs "assignment employees" for the purposes of assigning them to perform work for its clients.

One question that has arisen is whether employers such as management consulting firms or security companies whose employees perform work for clients of the employer are operating a temporary help agency.

The definition of temporary help agency provides that the agency must employ persons for the "purpose of assigning them to perform work on a temporary basis for clients". The client is defined in relation to a temporary help agency as an "entity that enters into an arrangement with the agency under which the agency agrees to assign or attempt to assign one or more of its employees to perform work" on a temporary basis for that entity.

Determinations as to whether a particular employer is a temporary help agency or not would of course depend on all the facts in any given situation.

As an example, although a security company's employees may work on a client's premises, it is possible that company is not operating as a temporary help agency as that term is defined in s. 1.

One consideration would be whether the company can be said to be hiring employees to provide the company's services to clients rather than for the purposes of performing work for a client. A related consideration would be whether the contract or agreement with the client is to provide certain services for the client rather than an agreement to assign one or more of its assignment employees to perform work for the client. Such an arrangement may be indicated where the work done by the employees is under the control and direction of the company rather than the client. Again, a determination as to whether an employer is, or is not, a temporary help agency would depend on all of the facts.

Termination of Assignment Pay

"termination of assignment pay" means pay provided to an assignment employee when the employee's assignment is terminated before the end of its estimated term under section 74.10.1;

This section, subject to certain exceptions, requires temporary help agencies to provide an assignment employee with one week's notice or pay in lieu if an assignment that was estimated to last for three months or more is terminated before the end of its estimated term unless another assignment lasting at least one week is offered to the employee.

For further discussion, please refer to ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.10.1.

Tip or Other Gratuity

"tip or other gratuity" means,

(a) a payment voluntarily made to or left for an employee by a customer of the employee's employer in such circumstances that a reasonable person would be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be kept by the employee or shared by the employee with other employees,

(b) a payment voluntarily made to an employer by a customer in such circumstances that a reasonable person would be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be redistributed to an employee or employees,

(c) a payment of a service charge or similar charge imposed by an employer on a customer in such circumstances that a reasonable person would be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be redistributed to an employee or employees, and

(d) such other payments as may be prescribed,

but does not include,

(e) such payments as may be prescribed, and

f) such charges as may be prescribed relating to the method of payment used, or a prescribed portion of those charges.

This definition establishes the meaning of “tip or other gratuity”. This phrase is used in Part V.1 (“Employee Tips and Other Gratuities”). It also appears in the s. 1(1) definition of “wages” (which explicitly excludes tips and other gratuities from the definition).

(a) Voluntary Payments Made to Employees

Clause (a) of the definition provides that “tip or other gratuity” means, “ a payment voluntarily made to or left for an employee by a customer of the employee's employer in such circumstances that a reasonable person would be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be kept by the employee or shared by the employee with other employees”.

Payments voluntarily made to or left for an employee by a customer include, but are not limited to: money left on a table or bar for a server; money given to a receptionist as a tip for a hair stylist; money left in a hotel room for cleaning staff; and money left in a tip jar.

The test for determining whether a voluntary payment is a tip or other gratuity under this clause is: would a reasonable person be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be kept by the employee or shared by the employee with other employees (i.e., as part of a tip pool)?

It is generally understood that the reasonable person standard is to be determined on an objective, rational and informed basis. Whether the circumstances are such that a reasonable person would be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be kept by the employee or shared by the employees with other employees will depend on the facts.

(b) Voluntary Payments Made to Employers

Clause (b) of the definition provides that “tip or other gratuity” means, “a payment voluntarily made to an employer by a customer in such circumstances that a reasonable person would be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be redistributed to an employee or employees”.

Payments voluntarily made to an employer by a customer include, but are not limited to: a tip added by a customer onto a debit or credit card payment, and cash given to an employer that the customer says is for the employee.

The test for determining whether a payment made voluntarily to an employer by a customer is a tip or other gratuity is: would a reasonable person be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be redistributed to an employee or employees (i.e., as part of a tip pool)?

It is generally understood that the reasonable person standard is to be determined on an objective, rational and informed basis. Whether the circumstances are such that a reasonable person would be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be redistributed to an employee(s) will depend on the facts.

(c) Service Charges, etc., Imposed by Employers

Clause (c) of the definition provides that “tip or other gratuity” means, ““a payment of a service charge or similar charge imposed by an employer on a customer in such circumstances that a reasonable person would be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be redistributed to an employee or employees”

Service charges or similar charges imposed by an employer on a customer include, but are not limited to: gratuity or service fees charged by caterers, banquet halls, reception halls and convention halls; and automatic service charges imposed upon groups of certain sizes in restaurants.

The test for determining whether a service charge or similar charge imposed by an employer on a customer is a tip or other gratuity is: would a reasonable person be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be redistributed to an employee or employees (i.e., as part of a tip pool)?

It is generally understood that the reasonable person standard is to be determined on an objective, rational and informed basis. Whether the circumstances are such that a reasonable person would be likely to infer that the customer intended or assumed that the payment would be redistributed to an employee or employees will depend on the facts.

For example, if a banquet hall service contract or catering bill explicitly specifies a certain amount as a "gratuity" and another amount as an "administrative fee", a reasonable person would likely infer that the customer intended or assumed that only the amount specified as a "gratuity" would be redistributed to the employee(s). Conversely, a reasonable person would likely infer that the customer did not intend or assume that the administrative fee would be redistributed by the banquet hall or catering company to the employee(s).

The Ontario High Court in Shabinsky v Horwitz et al, 1971 CanLII 729 (ON SC) held that where an employer charged the hotel customer an additional 15 percent for gratuities, it was understood by the customer, employee and employer that this charge amounted to a tip for the employees because the customers were deliberately given the impression they were paying into a fund for gratuities in lieu of individual tips.

(d) Other Payments as Prescribed

Clause (d) of the definition provides that “tip or other gratuity” means, “such other payments as may be prescribed”.

At the time of publication, no such other payments are prescribed.

(e) and (f) What is Not Included as a Tip or Other Gratuity

Clauses (e) and (f) of the definition provide what “tip or other gratuity” does not include.

Clause (e) states that “tip or other gratuity” does not include, “such payments as may be prescribed”.

At the time of publication, no such payments are prescribed.

Clause (f) states that “tip or other gratuity” does not include, “such charges as may be prescribed relating to the method of payment used, or a prescribed portion of those charges”.

O Reg 125/16 has been made pursuant to this provision. O Reg 125/16provides that a "tip or other gratuity" does not include a portion of a service charge or similar charge imposed by a credit card company on an employer for processing a credit card payment made to the employer by a customer.

Under O Reg 125/16, the portion of the charge that is excluded from the definition is determined by multiplying the total amount of the tip or other gratuity by the greater of:

- the percent charged by the credit card company for processing the payment; and
- 1.5 percent.

See O Reg 125/16 for details.

Trade Union

"Trade union" means an organization that represents employees in collective bargaining under any of the following:

1. The Labour Relations Act, 1995.
2. The Crown Employees Collective Bargaining Act, 1993.
3. Part X.1 of the Education Act.
4. Part IX of the Fire Protection and Prevention Act, 1997.
5. The Colleges Collective Bargaining Act.
6. Any prescribed Acts or provisions of Acts;

This definition sets out the broad scope of the phrase "trade union". The definition covers organizations representing employee interests, whether or not they are called a trade union, under one of the above statutes.

This definition is necessary because the ESA 2000 recognizes the agency status of trade unions in certain circumstances. For example, under ESA Part III, ss. 6 and 7, settlements and agreements or authorizations made by a trade union on an employee's behalf are binding.

Labour Relations Act, 1995

Section 1(1) of the LRA 1995 provides:

“Trade union” means an organization of employees formed for purposes that include the regulation of relations between employees and employers and includes a provincial, national, or international trade union, a certified council of trade unions and a designated or certified employee bargaining agency.

Crown Employees Collective Bargaining Act, 1993

Although the Crown Employees Collective Bargaining Act, 1993, SO 1993, c 38 ("CECBA") does not contain a definition of trade union, that term has the same meaning in CECBA as it does in the Labour Relations Act, 1995 as a result of the referential incorporation of the Labour Relations Act, 1995 (with some modifications) and its definitions.

Education Act

The Education Act, RSO 1990, c E.2 provides as follows:

277.1(1) In this Part, … "designated bargaining agent" for a teachers' bargaining unit means the bargaining agent described in subsection 277.3(2),

277.4(3) or (4) as the bargaining agent for the unit;

277.3(2) The following bargaining agents represent the corresponding bargaining units:

1. For the elementary school teachers' unit at an English-language public district school board, the Elementary Teachers' Federation of Ontario is the bargaining agent.
2. For each of the secondary school teachers' units at an English-language public district school board, The Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation is the bargaining agent.
3. For every teachers' bargaining unit at an English-language separate district school board, The Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Association is the bargaining agent.
4. For every teachers' bargaining unit at a French-language district school board, l'Association des enseignantes et des enseignants franco-ontariens is the bargaining agent.

277.4(3) The bargaining agent for a bargaining unit is each of the following organizations, acting jointly, that, on December 31, 1997, had a branch affiliate representing a member of the bargaining unit for collective bargaining purposes under the School Boards and Teachers Collective Negotiations Act:

1. L'Association des enseignantes et des enseignants franco-ontariens.
2. The Elementary Teachers' Federation of Ontario.
3. The Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Association.
4. [Repealed. 1997, c. 31, s. 122.]
5. The Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation.

(4) Despite subsection (3), the bargaining agent for a bargaining unit described in paragraph 1 or 2 of subsection (1) is l'Association des enseignantes et des enseignants franco-ontariens.

Fire Protection and Prevention Act, 1997

"Bargaining agent" is not defined in the Fire Protection and Prevention Act, 1997, SO 1997, c 4 ("FPPA"), although ss. 46(1) and (2) of the FPPA provide as follows:

46(1) The majority of firefighters in a bargaining unit may request an association of firefighters to represent them and act as their bargaining agent for the purpose of collective bargaining under this Part.

46(2) an association of firefighters that, immediately before the date this Part comes into force, was a party to, or bound by, an agreement made under section 5 of the Fire Departments Act or was bound by the decision or award of a board of arbitration under section 6 of that Act shall, on and after the day this Part comes into force and until such time as a new bargaining agent is requested under subsection (1), be deemed to be the bargaining agent for the firefighters in the bargaining unit.

The FPPA also defines the bargaining units as follows:

45(1) The firefighters employed in a fire department constitute a bargaining unit for the purposes of collective bargaining under this Act

45(2) The bargaining unit shall not include persons who are deemed not to be firefighters under subsection 41(2).

As per s. 41(1) of the FPPA, a firefighter, for the purposes of defining a bargaining unit under the FPPA, means "a person regularly employed on a salaried basis in a fire department and assigned to fire protection services and includes technicians but does not include a volunteer firefighter". In addition, s. 41(2) of the FPPA states that managers are deemed not to be firefighters for the purposes of defining a bargaining unit.

Colleges Collective Bargaining Act, 2008

The Colleges Collective Bargaining Act, 2008, SO 2008, c 15 provides as follows:

"Employee organization" means an organization of employees formed for the purpose of regulating relations between the employer and employees under this Act, but does not include such an organization of employees that discriminates against any employee because of age, sex, race, national origin, colour, or religion.

Any Prescribed Acts

As of the time of writing, no other Acts have been prescribed.

U

V

Vacation Entitlement Year

"Vacation entitlement year" means an alternative vacation entitlement year or a standard vacation entitlement year;

This definition was introduced by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, effective November 26, 2002.

The definition provides that "vacation entitlement year" means an alternative vacation entitlement year or a standard vacation entitlement year. Both of these terms are defined in ESA Part I, s. 1.

For further details, refer to ESA Part XI.

W

Wages

"Wages" means,

(a) any monetary remuneration payable by an employer to an employee under the terms of an employment contract, oral or written, express or implied,

(b) any payment required to be made by an employer to an employee under this Act, and

(c) any allowances for room or board under an employment contract or prescribed allowances,

but does not include,

(d) tips or other gratuities,

(e) any sums paid as gifts or bonuses that are dependent on the discretion of the employer and that are not related to hours, production or efficiency,

(f) expenses and travelling allowances, or

(g) subject to subsections 60(3) or 62(2), employer contributions to a benefit plan and payments to which an employee is entitled from a benefit plan;

This provision defines what are and what are not wages for the purposes of the ESA 2000. According to this definition:

Wages Include:

Any monetary remuneration owed to an employee under a contract of employment

This would include regular wages, whether the employee is paid on an hourly or salaried basis, or through commissions or piece work payments. It would also include any other monetary compensation to which the employee is entitled under their contract.

Any monetary payment owed to an employee under the Act

This includes payments where work is not performed, such as vacation pay, public holiday pay, personal emergency leave pay, domestic or sexual violence leave pay, termination pay and severance pay.

Any allowances for room or board

O Reg 285/01 prescribes maximum amounts at which room and board can be valued for purposes of determining whether an employer has paid at least the minimum wage to an employee; such amounts are considered to be wages under the definition. Note, however, that where the employee is, say, entitled to receive an allowance for room or board that exceeds the amount prescribed in the regulation, that higher amount is considered to be wages for purposes other than determining compliance with the minimum wage requirements. For example, if the employee is provided with an allowance of $75 a week for meals, only $53.55 could be counted towards the employer's minimum wage obligation, but all $75 is considered to be wages, and could be taken into account, for example, in determining the employee's termination pay entitlement in the event of termination without notice.

Note also that since s. 5(4) of O Reg 285/01, which sets out the maximum allowances for room and board, does so for the sole purpose of determining if the minimum wage requirements in the Act have been met, the maximum allowances do not apply to employees who are exempt from the minimum wage provisions in ESA Part IX. One example of such employees is superintendents, janitors and caretakers of a residential building who reside in the building. Therefore, where, pursuant to a contract of employment, an apartment superintendent occupies without charge an apartment at an agreed value of, for example, $400/month, an amount that, incidentally, exceeds the maximum allowances under O Reg 285/01, that amount will be considered to be part of their wages. Note that if the value had not been agreed upon, the true value, i.e., the rent the employer would have otherwise received for the premises, would be included in the calculation of the wages paid to the employee.

Any other money paid to employee on a non-discretionary basis

Bonuses:

- That have been pre-arranged by both employer and employee and thus consequently become part of the employment contract - see William Beasley Enterprises Limited (Beasley Amusements) v Finley et al (November 23, 1979), ESC 669 (Betcherman), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act;
- For cost of living, which are part of an agreement between employer and employee; and
- That are related to hours of work, production or the efficiency of the worker. This is so even if the awarding of the bonus is otherwise discretionary, by virtue of paragraph (e) of the definition. As noted by the referee in Yarzab Brothers Limited v 23 Employees (April 6, 1982), ESC 1194 (Aggarwal), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, this type of bonus "is an award of the [employee's] labour, generally known as an incentive bonus."

Commissions:

Such as sales commissions based on the employee's productivity - see Tim Wilkins Pontiac Buick Ltd. d.b.a. Lorne Brett Motors Ltd. v Ojamae et al (October 2, 1980), ESC 878 (Davis), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act. Note, however, that in Winfield Reas Estate Limited v Rajani (May 7, 1978), ESC 610 (Brent) where the employee, a real estate agent, received 100 per cent commission for the sale of her own house, this representing an additional 30 per cent compared to what she normally earned, the referee held that the making of this arrangement was discretionary on the part of the employer and was not related to hours, production or efficiency. He concluded that this arrangement, therefore, satisfies the double test in paragraph (b) of the definition under the former Employment Standards Act excluding the sum from wages. This part of the definition of wages under the former Employment Standards Act is substantially the same as paragraph (e) of the definition in the ESA 2000.

Profit-Sharing:

Where profit-sharing is included in the contract of employment and does not depend on the discretion of the employer, any monetary remuneration earned under the profit-sharing plan will be considered to be wages. For example, see the profit-sharing bonus agreements in Tim Wilkins Pontiac Buick Ltd. d.b.a. Lorne Brett Motors Ltd. v Ojamae et al and Bayside Kenworth Limited v Havelin (April 11, 1983), ESC 1409 (Aggarwal), both decisions under the former Employment Standards Act.

Prizes for Contests in Workplace:

Such as a sales contest that is intended to serve as an incentive to employees to stimulate sales, productivity, etc. The contest becomes part of the contract of employment and consequently any monetary remuneration earned pursuant to the contest is part of wages - see Square Court Investments Limited o/a Bay & Lada v Poplawski (April 5, 1983), ESC 1390 (Davis), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act.

Wages Do Not Include:

Any non-monetary remuneration received by the employee

For example, neither stocks nor stock options (whether the stocks are subsequently sold or the stock options exercised) are considered to be wages because they are not monetary remuneration at the time they are given to the employee. It should be noted that dividends are also not considered to be wages. An employee, as part of their employment contract may be offered shares in the company and as a result of ownership of these shares, the employee may receive dividends but would do so in their capacity as a shareholder and not in their capacity as an employee.

Tips or other gratuities

Tips or other gratuities, whether they are: received by employees directly or indirectly from a customer of the employees' employer; service charges or similar charges imposed by an employer upon the employer's customer; or a portion of a redistribution of tips, commonly known as a tip pool. For more information on tips or other gratuities, see ESA Part 1, s. 1.

Gifts and bonuses that are discretionary and unrelated to hours of work, production and efficiency

For example, this would include Christmas bonuses, suggestion or patent awards, and profit-sharing plans where the amount to be paid is determined independent of hours, production or efficiency of employees.

Travelling allowances for travel time

This does not include remuneration for hours spent travelling where that is part of work time - see O Reg 285/01, s. 1(1) for examples of travel time that does and does not count as hours of work.

Expense allowances

Living allowances

For example, when the employer provides the employee with money to pay for, or reimburses the employee for, the expenses that they incurred for such things as food, gas, hotel room, laundry, etc.

Employer contributions to a benefit plan, and payments from a benefit plan to the employee

This includes plans like Blue Cross, dental plans, sick pay plans, etc., whether they are provided by a third-party insurer or are part of an employer-funded plan.

Note that the termination and severance provisions in ESA Part XV, ss. 60(3) and 62(2) deem employer contributions to benefit plans to be wages in the circumstances described in those sections.

Other benefits paid by the employer such as

- supplementary unemployment benefits,
- pension plans and union welfare fund,
- strike pay,
- Workplace Safety and Insurance Board payments,
- financial assistance and discounts given to employees, and

- payment of tuition fees

Work Week

"Work week" means,

a) a recurring period of seven consecutive days selected by the employer for the purpose of scheduling work, or

b) if the employer has not selected such a period, a recurring period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

This definition clarifies the meaning of the term "work week", which appears in various sections throughout the Act.

A work week is the period of seven consecutive days within which the employer, through custom or practice, normally schedules work. If the employer has not established such a period, work week will be from Sunday to Saturday.

X

Y

Z

Section 1(2)

Assignment to Perform Work Includes Training – s. 1(2)

1(2) For greater certainty, being assigned to perform work for a client of a temporary help agency includes being assigned to the client to receive training for the purpose of performing work for the client.

Subsection 1(2) clarifies that “assigned to perform work” includes an assignment to receive training from a client of the agency for the purposes of performing work for the client.

For more detail, see the “assignment employee” section in the definition of “employee” in ESA Part I, s. 1.

Section 1(3)

Agreements in Writing - s. 1(3) and (3.1)

1(3) Unless otherwise provided, a reference in this Act to an agreement between an employer and an employee or to an employer and an employee agreeing to something shall be deemed to be a reference to an agreement in writing or to their agreeing in writing to do something.

1(3.1) The requirement in subsection (3) for an agreement to be in writing is satisfied if the agreement is in electronic form.

In the case of many employment standards established by the Act, the standard consists of an entitlement on the part of an employee or a prohibition applicable to an employer (the default standard), together with a provision that permits the employer and the employee to agree (in writing or in electronic form) that some other entitlement or protection will apply instead. For example, agreements can be made:

- To pay an employee's wages by cash or cheque at a place other than the workplace - s. 11(3);
- To pay an employee's wages by direct deposit into an institution that does not have an office or facility within a reasonable distance from where the employee usually works - s. 11(4);
- To exceed the daily hours of work limits - s. 17(2);
- To exceed the weekly hours of work limits - s. 17(3);
- To forego the requirement for a period of at least eight hours free from work between shifts when the total time worked on successive shifts exceeds 13 hours - s. 18(3);
- To break the required 30-minute meal break into two shorter periods that total 30 minutes - s. 20(2);
- To average hours of work for the purpose of determining overtime entitlements - s. 22(2);
- To compensate an employee for overtime hours with paid time off rather than with pay - s. 22(7);
- To delay the taking of paid time off in lieu of overtime pay up to 12 months after the work week in which it was earned - s. 22(7)(b);
- By employees who are not required to work on a public holiday to work on a public holiday - ss. 27, 30;
- To pay an employee premium pay plus public holiday pay for working on a public holiday rather than giving a substitute holiday - ss. 27(2)(b), 29(3), 30(2)(b);
- To delay the taking of a substitute holiday until up to 12 months after the public holiday on which it was earned - ss. 27(3)(b), 28(3)(b), 29(2)(b), 30(3)(b);
- To take vacation days earned in vacation entitlement year in periods of less than one week (s. 35) and to take the vacation days earned in a stub period in periods shorter than those set out in paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of s. 35.1(2) - para. 4 of s. 35.1(2);
- To pay an employee's vacation pay as it accrues or at any other time agreed upon - ss. 36(3), 36(4);
- That allow an employee, with the Director's approval, to forego their vacation time - s. 41;
- In certain circumstances, by employees on a leave to defer taking their vacation to later than when the leave expires - s. 51.1;
- To allow an employee who stops providing care or support to a relative before the end of a week in which they took a family medical leave to return to work before the end of the week - s. 52.1
- To allow a temporary lay-off that would otherwise be deemed a termination once it exceeds 13 weeks in a 20 consecutive week period, if the employer and an employee not represented by a union agree to a recall date within a specified time that will not result in the lay-off lasting 35 weeks or more in a 52 consecutive week period - s. 56(2)(b)(vi);
- To agree to receive severance pay in instalments over up a period of up to three years - s. 66;

- By retail employees to work on a Sunday or a public holiday, subject to their right to change their mind with proper notice - s. 73(3);
- By retail employees who were hired on or after September 4, 2001, to agree at the time of hire that they will not, with some exceptions, be able to refuse to work on Sundays - O Reg 285/01, s. 10.

Section 1(3) provides that these agreements must be in writing. The written requirement is satisfied if the agreement is in electronic form, as per s. 1(3.1), unless otherwise stipulated. One example of a provision where it is otherwise stipulated is ESA Part VII, s. 20(2), which allows employers and employees to agree, whether or not in writing, that the required 30-minute meal break be broken into two shorter periods that total 30 minutes. See also ESA Part XIV, s. 52.1(1)(b) and ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.3) for further examples of where agreements are not required to be in writing.

It is the Program's position that where the Act allows the parties to do something other than what the Act would otherwise require if they agree in writing, and the parties make the agreement but fail to put it in writing, then the agreement is ineffective and the Act's usual rule would apply. In other words, where the Act requires agreements in writing, there is no mechanism for opting for the alternate standard in the absence of a written agreement and the default standard will therefore apply. For example, a verbal agreement to average overtime will not allow for averaging - even in the face of the parties' acknowledgement that there was a verbal agreement to average overtime.

Having agreements in writing serves several valuable purposes:

- It provides tangible evidence of the intent of employers and employees to bind themselves to an agreement;
- It details the precise nature of the agreement;
- It helps the employer and employee be aware of the consequences of their entering into an agreement; and
- It provides a permanent and unaltered record of the agreement.

Several issues can arise regarding the validity of agreements that can be made under the Act. These include:

1. The timing of the agreement in relation to the event being agreed to;
2. Whether signatures are required;
3. The level of specificity of information that needs to be in the agreement;
4. Informed consent;
5. Coerced consent; or
6. Electronic agreements.

These issues are dealt with generally below. Also see the discussion under each provision that provides for agreements for more specific information.

Timing of the Agreement

Agreements are generally effective only with respect to events that take place after the agreement is made. To the extent that an agreement purports to have a retroactive effect, it will not be valid, even if the employee has agreed to make it retroactive.

For example, an employee has been working 50 hours a week since their date of hire on October 1, 2019, but there is no written agreement allowing these excess hours to be worked. On December 1, 2019, the employer and employee agree in writing that the employee will work 50 hours a week. They further agree in writing that the agreement to work excess hours applies retroactively to October 1, either by explicitly stating so in the agreement or by backdating the agreement to October 1. It is Program policy that the agreement applies only from the date it was actually entered into - in this case, December 1 - onward. The agreement will not have the effect of undoing the hours of work violations that occurred between October 1 and December 1, even though the employee has agreed that it would have this retroactive effect.

To allow agreements to have retroactive effect would compromise the intent of the Act. The basic premise of the Act is that the default standards exist unless and until employees and employers agree to suspend them. The provisions of the Act do not contemplate parties being able to retroactively nullify, through their agreements, violations of the Act that have already occurred; they merely allow employers and employees to agree upon a future state of affairs.

This policy against retroactivity is consistent with the approach taken by the Director of Employment Standards when giving averaging approvals or approving permits to work excess hours under the former Employment Standards Act. Not recognizing a retroactive application was upheld under the former Employment Standards Act where the referee in 750338 Ontario Inc. o/a Hillside Foods v Handley (March 20, 1990), ESC 2645 (Haefling) held:

[T]o put the matter another way, apart from the facts just outlined, the finding and conclusion I reach in this case is that no legal or binding effect can be given to a written authorization signed after the event, as occurred here, since the result would plainly serve to defeat the clear purpose and intention of the legislation.

In very limited circumstances, however, an agreement may be permitted to have a retroactive effect. For example, an employee is off sick. The employee is subsequently advised that the sick day will be unpaid. They want to take that day off as a paid vacation day, so, pursuant to ESA Part XI, s. 35, they make a written request to do so, and the employer agrees to allow this in writing. The Program's view is that in this situation, the agreement may be permitted because the employee does not lose any entitlements as a result of recognizing a retroactive application of the agreement. The employee was entitled to a vacation day and received the vacation day.

This can be contrasted to a situation where the employee enters into an agreement to retroactively allow for overtime averaging. In this case, the employee has earned overtime prior to entering into the agreement. In giving the agreement retroactive effect, the employee loses an entitlement already earned under the Act.

Signatures

Signatures are usually the best evidence to establish that both parties intended to enter into the agreement. In the absence of signatures, the party seeking to enforce the agreement must provide other evidence of the parties' intent to enter into the agreement.

Where the employer has not signed the agreement, the employer's intent to enter into it may be established by the fact it drafted the agreement, or by the fact that the agreement is drafted on company letterhead. Where the employee has not signed the agreement, their intent to enter into the agreement may be established through evidence such as oral confirmation to the Officer, or through other documents the employee signed in hardcopy or electronically or sent electronically. More detail on the enforceability of electronic signatures is below in the section on electronic agreements. .

Specificity

The terms of any agreement must be sufficiently certain in order to be enforceable; agreements must clearly and explicitly set out what is being agreed upon. For example, parties drawing up overtime averaging agreements under ESA Part VIII, s. 22(2) should specify that the purpose of the averaging is to calculate the employee's entitlement, if any, to overtime pay. See ESA Part VIII, s. 22 for more detailed information on the requirements for averaging agreements. If one of the parties drafted the agreement, and a particular term is ambiguous and the parties disagree about what the term means, the term will be construed against the parties who drafted the agreement - this is called the contra proferentem rule.

Similarly, parties entering into agreements to work hours in excess of those limits contained in ESA Part VII, s. 17 should state that the employee is agreeing to work in excess of eight hours a day or a longer established regular day and/or 48 hours a week, and it should state the specific number of hours up to which the employee is agreeing to work, up to a maximum of 60. This type of agreement should avoid using the word overtime, because overtime is not the same as excess hours. And because the general overtime threshold of 44 hours is different than the general hours of work limits of eight hours a day or a longer regular day established by the employer and 48 hours in a week, an employee could agree to work overtime, i.e., hours in excess of 44 in a week, without necessarily having agreed to work more than 48 hours in a week or more than eight hours in a day or a longer established regular day. See ESA Part VII, s. 17(3) for more detailed information on the requirements for agreements to work excess hours.

An agreement will not be invalid only because it used the wrong term to describe the employment standard, as long it is clear from the context of the agreement that both parties knew exactly what was being agreed to. For example, an agreement to delay the scheduling of a substitute holiday beyond the default three-month deadline might state that the employee agrees to delay for six months the taking of their extra vacation day they earned for working on Canada Day. While the incorrect term was used - vacation day rather than substitute day - it is clear what the parties intended and the agreement would meet the specificity requirement.

This approach to the issue of specificity is consistent with several court and arbitration cases decided under the former Employment Standards Act. For example, see:

- McLeod v Egan, [1975] 1 SCR 517, 1974 CanLII 12 (SCC), where the Supreme Court of Canada held that a general management rights clause could not be relied upon as consent to override an employee's statutory right to refuse to work beyond eight hours in a day or 48 hours in a week.
- Re Walker Exhausts and United Steelworkers of America Local 2894, 1981 CanLII 1837 (ON SC), where the court ruled that in order for an employee's consent to work excess hours to be enforceable, there must be a specific reference to the limits on working hours set out in the Employment Standards Act. The court held that a consent was sufficient "if such consent or agreement relates specifically to the performance of work by employees beyond the normal statutory legal limits."

- DDM Plastics Inc. v I.A.M. & A.W., Local 2792, 2000 CanLII 29501 (ON LA), where Arbitrator Bendel commented: It is my view that the public interest element in [the former] section 20(3) requires a clear and explicit waiver by employees of their right to be free from a work week of more than 48 hours. Accordingly, where an alleged waiver is ambiguous or equivocal, it seems to me that it does not meet the test required by the legislation, even if extrinsic evidence might justify the conclusion that the union had agreed that a 48-hour work week could be exceeded.
- Ontario Hydro v Power Workers' Union, [1998] LVI 2958-1, 74 LAC (4th) 425, where Arbitrator Burkett determined: On our reading of McLeod v Egan and Re Walker Exhausts, the courts have ruled that the language relied upon as constituting consent or agreement must evidence a clear intent to relinquish the statutory right of affected employees to refuse work beyond the statutory maximum. This intent may be evidenced by reference to the statute or to the permit or to the specific hours beyond the statutory maximum that are compulsory. Language that simply makes overtime compulsory, where either the daily or weekly hours of work are less than the statutory maximum, is not sufficiently specific and, therefore, is equivocal with respect to whether the intent was to give up the statutory right to refuse work beyond the statutory maximum.

In essence, an agreement should be specific and clear enough for an independent, objective third party to know what was being agreed to simply by reading it.

Informed Consent

In the absence of informed consent by one of the parties to the agreement, an agreement is invalid. Informed consent will not be established unless each party knows precisely the ramifications of entering into the agreement.

The best evidence that an employee provided their informed consent is where the agreement itself accurately sets out the consequences of the agreement. If the agreement does not provide that information, informed consent can be demonstrated through other means (e.g., the employee was provided with or obtained an ESA 2000 fact sheet or contacted the Ministry of Labour, Training and Skills Development).

Some examples of where there may be an absence of informed consent include:

- The employee cannot read, and the contents of the document were not read to the employee before they agreed to it;
- The employee does not understand the language the agreement was drafted in, and the contents of the document were not read to the employee in a language they understood before they agreed to it;
- Where the employer simply referenced that an employee was bound by an accompanying Employee Handbook without ensuring that the employee had read and understood the provisions contained in the Handbook - see for example Lukowski v Hatch Associates Ltd. (1996), 25 CCEL (2d) 17 (Ont Gen Div);
- Where an employee did not read the agreement and was told they must sign the document as a requirement of the job - see for example O'Shaughnessy v Drake International Inc. (1986), 14 CCEL 192 (ON SC); and
- Where the employer hides a stringent provision in the fine print of a standard form - see for example Tilden Rent-A-Car Co. v Clendenning, 1978 CanLII 1446 (ON CA).

Officers are not required in every case to undertake a review of whether informed consent was provided by each party to a purported agreement. Officers may assume that there is informed consent, but if something comes to their attention that would contradict this assumption then a review of the conduct of the parties may be undertaken.

Coerced Consent

Agreements may be invalid if a party to the agreement has not voluntarily and freely consented to being bound by its provisions.

In Cardinal Transportation B.C. Inc. v Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 561 (1996), 34 CLRBR (2d) 1 (BC LRB), the British Columbia Labour Relations Board defined "coercion" as follows:

In the labour relations context, "coercion" connotes any effort by an employer to invoke some form of force, threat, undue pressure or compulsion for the purpose of controlling or influencing an employee's [decision].
The Ontario Labour Relations Board has also considered the meaning to be attributed to the term coercion in a case where the applicant sought to set aside a settlement made pursuant to ESA Part XXIII, s. 112. The Board cited with approval a decision of the Board in the labour relations context, noting with approval the discussion therein regarding duress, coercion and the requirement that agreements be entered into freely. See Watkins v The Public Services Health and Safety Association, 2015 CanLII 69408 (ON LRB). The discussion in this decision would also be applicable to s. 120 settlements.

There will always be some reason for a party to enter into an agreement. The issue is which reasons are unacceptable, such that they will render the agreement invalid.

Unacceptable reasons include where an employer:

- Intimidates an employee;
- Threatens to dismiss an employee; or
- Imposes or threatens to impose any other penalty on an employee.

Note that these actions may also amount to a violation of ESA Part XVIII, s. 74 which prohibits reprisals.

For example, an agreement would not be effective if the reason the employee entered it is because the employer:

- Threatened to fire them;
- Threatened to reduce their hours or pay; or
- Penalized the employee's co-workers because they had refused to enter into the agreement, and the employee entered into the agreement to avoid being similarly penalized.

On the other hand, it is unlikely that the reason will be considered to be unacceptable where an employee agrees to an arrangement merely to please their employer, to avoid displeasing them, or because they wanted to earn extra money.

Electronic Agreements

Section 1(3.1) sets out that electronic agreements can constitute an agreement in writing under the ESA 2000.

The Courts have recognized that electronic contracts may be binding on the parties that entered into them. See for example Rudder v Microsoft Corp., 1999 CanLII 14923 (ON SC) where the court ruled that an individual was bound to an Internet service providing contract by clicking the "I agree" button that appeared on the user's computer monitor. However, the courts have also ruled that it is essential that electronic contracts retain their original form and that there are mechanisms provided to ensure their integrity (i.e., safeguards to ensure that the parties have actually entered into the agreement, such as passwords).

Consequently, electronic agreements can be valid agreements under the Act, assuming all of the conditions of a valid agreement are met, e.g., specificity, informed consent, etc. However, precautions must be taken to ensure the integrity of electronic agreements. In particular, officers must be able to verify that the employee whom the employer claims to have electronically agreed to the agreement did in fact agree.

There must be a positive act by the employee to demonstrate their agreement; simply not responding to an e-mail that says, for example, "if you don't respond, you will be considered to have agreed to . . ." does not constitute an agreement.

Officers are not required in every case involving an electronic agreement to verify the integrity of the agreement. Officers may assume that the agreement is as it appears to be, but if something comes to their attention that would contradict this assumption then the officer has to decide whether what has been placed before them does in fact accurately represent what the parties agreed to, on the basis of the evidence.

The enforceability of a party's electronic signature requires proof that the party actually affixed its electronic signature to the agreement, and also intended to be bound by the terms and conditions of the agreement. There are many ways to sign a document electronically.

1. Typing the sender's name at the end of an email message;
2. Providing a scanned image of a handwritten signature that is attached to an electronic document;
3. Providing a secret code, password, or PIN to identify the sender to the recipient;
4. Providing a unique biometrics-based identifier, such as a fingerprint, voice print, or a retinal scan;
5. Using a computer mouse to click on an "I agree" button;
6. Creating a sound, such as the sound by pressing "9" on a telephone, to indicate acceptance; and
7. Creating a "digital signature" through the use of public key cryptography.

[Reference: https://www.lowenstein.com/files/Publication/45e0d333-56b6-485f-835c-011eb4f3aa2f/Presentation/PublicationAttachment/9bde51f9-a5d9-455f-9910-06fa785d5996/1-%20Electronic%20Signatures%20Agreements%20and%20Documents_%20The%20Recipe%20For%20Enforceability%20an.pdf]

In accordance with the general principles discussed earlier regarding the validity of agreements, items that parties may wish to consider including in their electronic agreements include:

- The names of the parties;
- The date the agreement was entered into;

- The date the agreement will come into effect;
- The date the agreement will end;
- The default employment standard that the parties are agreeing to replace with another entitlement or protection, and what that other entitlement or protection is; and
- Electronic signatures of each party to the agreement.

In addition:

- Employees must have had a sufficient amount of time to consider the agreement before agreeing to enter into it. What is sufficient will vary depending on the circumstances and the type of agreement.
- Both parties to the agreement must understand it to mean the same thing. Ideally, the agreement would be sufficiently specific so that an independent, objective third party would be able to determine what was being agreed to simply by reading the agreement.
- Both parties must have given informed consent.
- The agreement must have been freely and voluntarily entered into.
- The agreement will generally only be effective from the date of the agreement onward; it will generally not have retroactive effect.

Different types of agreements may have specific requirements. Please refer to the appropriate section of the ESA 2000 for more information.

Revocability of Agreements

Some of the provisions for agreements within the Act and regulations set out specific restrictions or limitations on the ability of the parties to revoke the agreement. For example, agreements to average hours of work for the purpose of determining overtime entitlements may not be revoked before the agreement expires unless both the employee and employer agree to revoke it as per ESA Part VIII, s. 22(6). Likewise, in general, where there is an agreement for an employee to work up to a specified number of hours in excess of the weekly 48 hour maximum, an employee is only able to revoke such an agreement after giving the employer two weeks' written notice and an employer is only able to revoke after giving the employee reasonable notice.

Where the Act does not impose any restrictions on revocability, employees are entitled to revoke their agreement to the alternate standard and revert back to the default standard, and doing so is a protected activity under ESA Part XVIII, s. 74. If an employer penalizes an employee because the employee withdrew their agreement, that will be a violation of s. 74. See Part XVIII for additional discussion on this point.

Section 1(4)

Exception - s. 1(4)

1(4) Nothing in subsection (3) requires an employment contract that is not a collective agreement to be in writing.

It provides that s. 1(3), which requires that agreements that employees and employers enter into under the Act be in writing, does not mean that employment contracts that are not collective agreements have to be in writing.

ESA Part II – Information Concerning Rights and Obligations

Part II (Information Concerning Rights and Obligations) of the ESA 2000 contains provisions dealing with the requirement that employers provide a copy of the poster prepared by the Director of Employment Standards to each of the employer's employees. The poster provides such information about the ESA 2000 and the regulations as the Director considers appropriate.

This Part is intended to help ensure that employers are aware of their obligations and that employees know their rights under the ESA 2000. It requires that important information about the ESA 2000 and the regulations be provided directly to employees.

ESA Part II Section 2 – Director to Prepare Poster

Director to Prepare Poster – s. 2(1)

2(1) The Director shall prepare and publish a poster providing such information about this Act and the regulations as the Director considers appropriate.

Section 2(1) provides that the Director of Employment Standards shall prepare and publish a poster that provides information about the ESA 2000 and its regulations that the Director considers appropriate.

At the time of writing, the poster prepared pursuant to this section is entitled "Employment Standards in Ontario" and is published by Publications Ontario. The poster is available from Publications Ontario and can be downloaded from the Ministry of Labour's website.

Prior to the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019, which received Royal Assent on April 3, 2019, s. 2(1) required the Minister of Labour to prepare and publish the poster.

If Poster Not Up to Date – s. 2(2)

2(2) If the Director believes that the poster prepared under subsection (1) has become out of date, he or she shall prepare and publish a new poster.

This section provides that the Director of Employment Standards shall prepare and publish a new poster if the Director believes that the existing poster is out of date.

Material to Be Posted – s. 2(3) – REPEALED

Subsection 2(3) was repealed effective April 3, 2019 as a result of the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019. Prior to April 3, 2019, employers were required to post the most recent version of the poster in at least one conspicuous place in every workplace. The discussion of this provision is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when s. 2(3) was in force.

2(3) Every employer shall post and keep posted in at least one conspicuous place in every workplace of the employer where it is likely to come to the attention of employees in that workplace a copy of the most recent poster published by the Minister under this section.

This section requires employers to post a copy of the poster referred to in s. 2(1) in the workplace where it is likely to come to the attention of all employees.

Where Majority Language Not English – s. 2(4) – REPEALED

Subsection 2(4) was repealed effective April 3, 2019 as a result of the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019. Prior to April 3, 2019, employers were required – in particular circumstances – to post a translation of the most recent version of the poster in at least one conspicuous place in every workplace. The discussion of this provision is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when s. 2(4) was in force.

2(4) If the majority language of a workplace of an employer is a language other than English, the employer shall make enquiries as to whether the Minister has prepared a translation of the poster into that language, and if the Minister has done so, the employer shall post and keep posted a copy of the translation next to the copy of the poster.

This section states that where the majority language in a workplace is a language other than English, the employer is required to inquire as to whether the Minister has prepared a translation of the poster into that language. If a translation of the poster into that language has been prepared, the employer is required to post the translation alongside the English poster.

Copy of Poster to Be Provided – s. 2(5)

2(5) Every employer shall provide each of his or her employees with a copy of the most recent poster published by the Director under this section.

The requirement that an employer provide each employee with a copy of the most recent version of the poster came into effect May 20, 2015 as a result of the Stronger Workplaces for a Stronger Economy Act, 2014.

Pursuant to ss. 2(7), the poster must be provided within 30 days of the day the employee became an employee of the employer.

Employers are only required to provide each employee with the poster once. There is no requirement to provide employees with the poster every time a new version of the poster is published by the Director

The Program's position is that an employer may provide the poster as a printed copy or as an attachment in an email to the employee. Further, and consistent with the Program's position regarding the provision of written wage statements under s. 12(1) and the information sheets for assignment employees under s. 74.7(3), an employer may provide the poster via a link to the document on an internet database, if the employer ensures the employee has reasonable access to that database (i.e. the employer must ensure the employee has access to a computer (which includes devices such as tablets and smart phones) and is able to access a working link to the document) and ensures the employee has access to a printer and that the employee knows how to use the computer and the printer.

Same – Translation – s. 2(6)

2(6) If an employee requests a translation of the poster into a language other than English, the employer shall make enquiries as to whether the Director has prepared a translation of the poster into that language, and if the Director has done so, the employer shall provide the employee with a copy of the translation.

If an employee asks for a copy of the poster in a language other than English, the employer is required to inquire as to whether the Director has prepared a translation of the poster into that language. If one has been prepared, the employer is required to provide the employee with a copy of the translation. Note this translation must be provided in addition to a copy in English.

When Copy of Poster to Be Provided – s. 2(7)

2(7) An employer shall provide an employee with a copy of the poster within 30 days of the day the employee becomes an employee of the employer.

Subsection (7) requires the employer to provide an employee with a copy of the most recent version of the poster within 30 calendar days of the day the employee is hired by the employer.

Transition – s. 2(8)

2(8) The most recent poster prepared and published by the Minister under subsection (1) as it read immediately before the day the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 received Royal Assent is deemed to have been prepared and published by the Director.

Subsection (8) is a transitional provision relating to the amendment that shifted the obligation to prepare and publish the poster from the Minister to the Director.

This provision establishes that the poster that was in place immediately before the day the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 received Royal Assent which was prepared and published by the Minister – is deemed to have been prepared and published by the Director.

The effect of this provision is to establish that Version 8.0 of the poster (which was prepared and published by the Minister on December 17, 2018) continues to be the correct version of the poster for the purposes of section 2 until such time as the Director prepares and publishes a new version of the poster under subsection 2(2).

Same – s. 2(9)

2(9) Any translation prepared by the Minister under subsection (6), as it read immediately before the day the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 received Royal Assent, is deemed to have been prepared by the Director.

Subsection (9) is a transitional provision relating to the amendment that shifted the obligation to prepare and publish the poster from the Minister to the Director. This provision establishes that translated versions of the poster in place immediately before the day the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 received Royal Assent – which were prepared by the Minister – are deemed to have been prepared by the Director and continue to be the correct translated versions of the poster for the purposes of section 2 (until such time as the Director prepares new translations of a new poster).

ESA Part III - How this Act Applies

Part III (How this Act Applies) contains provisions dealing with the application of the Employment Standards Act, 2000 and sets out some basic matters that are critical to its operation.

ESA Part III Section 3 – To Whom Act Applies

To Whom Act Applies – s. 3(1)

3(1) Subject to subsections (2) to (5), the employment standards set out in this Act apply with respect to an employee and his or her employer if,

(a) the employee's work is to be performed in Ontario; or

(b) the employee's work is to be performed in Ontario and outside Ontario but the work performed outside Ontario is a continuation of work performed in Ontario.

Section 3(1)(a) indicates that the ESA 2000 applies to all employees whose work is to be performed in Ontario and their employers. However, the fact that some work is performed in Ontario may be insufficient to bring the employee in under the jurisdiction of the ESA 2000. For example, if the employee's work in Ontario is merely a continuation of the work performed in another jurisdiction, then the laws of the other jurisdiction may apply rather than the ESA 2000.

Section 3(1)(b) provides that the ESA 2000 applies to employees whose work is to be performed in Ontario and who also perform work outside of Ontario but only where the work is a continuation of the work performed in Ontario.

Examples of the Implications of s. 3(1)(b):

1. A salesperson, or truck driver (in a provincial jurisdiction operation), who is employed and has a home base in Ontario will fall under the Act's jurisdiction, notwithstanding that they work both in and out of Ontario in the course of their employment. The work performed outside Ontario is a continuation of work performed in Ontario.
2. A bricklayer working for a construction company on a project that is located partly in Ottawa and partly in Hull, Quebec will be subject to Ontario's jurisdiction (even though they may also fall under Quebec' s jurisdiction) because the Quebec work will be considered a continuation of the work in Ontario. Therefore, where the bricklayer worked 40 hours in Ontario and 20 in Quebec in one week, all the work is subject to Ontario jurisdiction and all the hours worked are included for the purposes of the ESA 2000, i.e., the employee would be entitled to overtime pay for 16 of the 60 hours worked in the week.
3. The same approach as in (2) would apply to a service truck driver of that Ottawa construction company, where they drove the truck in Hull to service projects in both cities.
4. An employee works for five years for ABC Company in England, then is transferred to Ontario where they work for ABC for two years. Because the work in England was not a continuation of the work in Ontario, the employee will have two years' employment with ABC for the purpose of determining the employee's entitlements under the ESA 2000.

It should also be noted that, in some situations, there might very well be dual jurisdiction over the matter. For example, a person may be performing work in Newfoundland as a continuation of the work in Ontario, and Ontario would have jurisdiction over the contract of employment, notwithstanding that Newfoundland may have as well.

Factors that are not relevant to the Act's application include where:

- The offer of employment was made or accepted;
- The contract of employment was signed;

- The employee resides;
- The head office of the employer is located;
- The wages are to be paid; and
- The employer is incorporated.

In Shearing v James Way Construction Inc., 2007 CanLII 15197 (ON LRB), the issue was whether the overtime provisions of ESA 2000 applied to work performed in the United States. The employee worked building fast food outlets for a construction business that was based in Kitchener. Occasionally, the employer sent the employee with a loaded truck of building materials to the United States to build similar outlets there, following which the employee would return to Ontario to resume his duties. The Board found that the employee's work in the United States was a continuation of his work in Ontario within the meaning of s. 3(1)(b) and that the overtime provisions applied.

In Karpowicz v Valor Inc., 2016 CanLII 49203 (ON LRB), the Board considered whether the ESA 2000 applied to an employee who performed almost all of his work in the U.S. for an employer with headquarters in Ontario. The employment contract stated that the parties wanted to laws of Ontario, including the ESA 2000, to apply to their employment relationship. However, the employee was based in Michigan, where he performed almost all of his work, even the work that related to clients based in Ontario. He came to Ontario on a few occasions to attend meetings, but the Board determined that this was incidental to his work in Michigan and constituted a continuation of his work outside of Ontario. The Board gave little weight to the intention of the parties and found that the ESA 2000 did not apply because s. 3(1)(b) was inapplicable.

Exception, Federal Jurisdiction – s. 3(2)

3(2) This Act does not apply with respect to an employee and his or her employer if their employment relationship is within the legislative jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada.

This provision, introduced by the ESA 2000, clarifies that the ESA 2000 does not apply to employees and employers that are federally regulated and who are therefore subject to the Canada Labour Code rather than the ESA 2000. Section 3(2) codifies the common law and the Program policy applied under the former Employment Standards Act.

Section 2 of the Canada Labour Code provides a definition of "federal work, undertaking or business" which fall under federal jurisdiction:

> (a) a work, undertaking or business operated or carried on for or in connection with navigation and shipping, whether inland or maritime, including the operation of ships and transportation by ship anywhere in Canada,
>
> (b) a railway, canal, telegraph or other work or undertaking connecting any province with any other province, or extending beyond the limits of a province,
>
> (c) a line of ships connecting a province with any other province, or extending beyond the limits of a province,
>
> (d) a ferry between any province and any other province or between any province and any country other than Canada,
>
> (e) aerodromes, aircraft or a line of air transportation,

(f) a radio broadcasting station,

(g) a bank or an authorized foreign bank within the meaning of section 2 of the Bank Act,

(h) a work or undertaking that, although wholly situated within a province, is before or after its execution declared by Parliament to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces,

(i) a work, undertaking or business outside the exclusive legislative authority of the legislatures of the provinces, and

(j) a work, undertaking or activity in respect of which federal laws within the meaning of section 2 of the Oceans Act apply pursuant to section 20 of that Act and any regulations made pursuant to paragraph 26(1)(k) of that Act; (entreprises fédérales)

However, despite this definition it is not always clear whether an employer is federally or provincially regulated. Generally, it should be presumed that employment standards are provincially regulated, and therefore fall within the jurisdiction of the ESA 2000. If it is unclear whether an employer is provincially or federally regulated, it is recommend that guidance be sought. Additionally, see the sections below for further information on federal vs provincial jurisdiction in employment.

Constitution Act, 1867

In Canada, law-making functions are divided between the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures by the Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly called the British North America Act). Section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 assigned to the federal government a residual authority to make laws concerning the "Peace, Order and Good Government of Canada" (referred to as the POGG power). The courts have determined that such matters as aeronautics, radio and television broadcasting are within federal jurisdiction under this clause. In addition, s. 91 sets out 31 classes of exclusive federal power. These include such matters as unemployment insurance, the military, criminal law and divorce. Finally, pursuant to s. 91(29), Parliament may make laws concerning any classes of works or undertakings expressly excepted from the subjects assigned to provincial jurisdiction in s. 92.

Section 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 assigns jurisdiction to the provinces over such subjects as provincial taxation, municipal institutions within the province, property and civil rights in the province, and the administration of provincial courts. It also establishes exceptions from provincial jurisdiction in ss. 92(10)(a)-(c) for local works or undertakings that connect provinces or extend beyond the province, steamship lines between a province and a foreign country, and those undertakings that are declared to be of national interest. Note that the combined effect of s. 91(29) and s. 92(10)(a) is to provide Parliament with jurisdiction over interprovincial transportation and communications works and undertakings, and the combined effect of s. 91(29) and s. 92(10)(c) is to allow the federal government to declare its jurisdiction over grain elevators and various kinds of mills and warehouses.

As a general rule, the regulation of labour relations and working conditions (which includes employment standards) falls within provincial jurisdiction pursuant to the province's constitutional authority over "Property and Civil Rights in the Province", as per s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

It should be noted that notwithstanding this general rule, Parliament has jurisdiction over labour relations and working conditions when such jurisdiction is an integral part of Parliament's jurisdiction over an area of primary federal authority.

Principles of Federal Jurisdiction

The constitutional principles that have been applied in determining whether Parliament has jurisdiction over employment and labour matters were reviewed by the Supreme Court of Canada in Northern Telecom v Communications Workers, [1980] 1 SCR 115, 1979 CanLII 3 (SCC) and summarized as follows:

1. Parliament has no authority over labour relations as such nor over the terms of a contract of employment; exclusive provincial jurisdiction is the rule.
2. By way of exception, however, Parliament may assert exclusive jurisdiction over these matters if it is shown that such jurisdiction is an integral part of its primary competence over some other single federal subject.
3. Primary federal competence over a given subject can prevent the application of provincial law relating to labour relations and the conditions of employment, but only if it is demonstrated that federal authority over these matters is an integral element of such federal competence.
4. Thus, the regulation of wages to be paid by an undertaking, service or business, and the regulation of its labour relations, being related to an integral part of the operation of the undertaking, service or business, are removed from provincial jurisdiction and immune from the effect of provincial law, if the undertaking, service or business is a federal one.
5. The question of whether an undertaking, service or business is a federal one depends on the nature of its operation.
6. In order to determine the nature of the operation, one must look at the normal or habitual activities of the business as those of "a going concern," without regard for exceptional or casual factors; otherwise, the Constitution could not be applied with any degree of continuity and regularity.

As a result, employees are governed in their employment relationships by federal legislation if the enterprise or operation in which they are engaged is a federal work or undertaking as determined through the exercise of the POGG power or as enumerated in s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, including matters excepted from provincial jurisdiction under s. 92(10). The employer may also fall under federal jurisdiction if it is found to be integral to a federal undertaking, though this requires, among other things, a high level of operational connection between the local and federal undertakings.

Where a federal undertaking carries on an operation unrelated to federal jurisdiction, that operation will be subject to provincial employment and labour law. In Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v Attorney-General of British Columbia, [1948] SCR 373, 1948 CanLII 18 (SCC), also known as the Empress Hotel case, the Supreme Court of Canada held that employees of the railway's hotel (as opposed to the employees working on the railway itself) were subject to provincial labour laws because the operation of the hotel was entirely divisible from the operation of the railway and as such was not an integral element of the operation of the railway. In other words, the hotel operation was not a federal work or undertaking, and the employees were governed by provincial law.

In general, employees of a federal work or undertaking, or of a work or undertaking that is integral to a federal undertaking, will fall under federal jurisdiction, and it is assumed in most instances that management of the undertaking in terms of employment and labour matters is essential and vital to the undertaking as a whole. Therefore, such employees will fall under federal employment law.

Examples of Federal Jurisdiction in Employment Matters

The following is a brief review of employees and industries in which employment matters fall under federal jurisdiction.

Federal Government Employees

Each jurisdiction has full and exclusive competence to legislate with regard to its own employees. Therefore, employees of the federal government will fall under federal rather than provincial jurisdiction.

Federal Crown Corporation Employees

Employees of a federal Crown Corporation may or may not fall under federal jurisdiction. Such employees are governed by federal law only where the corporation is engaged in a federal work or undertaking. See the discussion of the Empress Hotel case above.

Nuclear Facilities

In Ontario Hydro v Ontario (Labour Relations Board), [1993] 3 SCR 327, 1993 CanLII 72 (SCC) the Supreme Court of Canada held that jurisdiction over employees working in Ontario Hydro's nuclear operations was federal rather than provincial. Following this decision, the Canada Labour Code was amended so as to authorize the federal government to make regulations that effectively made the terms of provincial legislation, instead of what was in the Canada Labour Code, apply to these employees. Federal regulations to do this were made and came into force on April 1, 1998. As of that date, Ontario Hydro nuclear operations employees became subject to Ontario's employment standards legislation and are covered (both with respect to the standards and enforcement) under the ESA 2000 just as employees in non-nuclear operations are – see federal regulation SOR/98-181. Note that the federal regulation applies to the Pickering and Darlington nuclear facilities owned and operated by Ontario Power Generation and to the Bruce nuclear facility operated by Bruce Power because the regulation defines a nuclear facility as one other than Ontario Hydro if, on the day on which the regulation came into force (April 1, 1998) or after, the facility was owned and operated by Ontario Hydro.

This federal regulation is supported by s. 94 of the ESA 2000, which makes it clear that the Ontario Labour Relations Board and other persons having power under the Act (such as employment standards officers and the Director of Employment Standards) have the authority to exercise the powers conferred under the federal regulation, i.e., to enforce the employment standards provisions that are incorporated by reference into the Canada Labour Code. See ESA Part XXI, s. 94 for a further discussion.

There is one exception to the application of the ESA 2000 to Ontario Power Generation's nuclear energy facilities. Under the ESA 2000, if an employment standards officer wishes to enter (without the consent of the occupier) a place that is used as a dwelling, they are required under ESA Part XXI, s. 91(3) to obtain a search warrant issued under ESA Part XXI, s. 92. However, if (in the unlikely event) the dwelling were a nuclear facility, the officer would be required to obtain the search warrant under s. 487 of the Criminal Code because s. 4 of the federal regulation SOR/98-181 specifically refers to the search warrant being obtained under that section of the Criminal Code. Please refer to the discussion of entry into dwellings in ESA Part XXI, s. 92.

Aeronautics

Pursuant to the POGG power, the field of aeronautics was held to be within the federal jurisdiction by the Privy Council in the 1931 decision in The Attorney-General Canada v The Attorney-General of Ontario and others, [1931] UKPC 93 (22 October 1931), also known as the Aeronautics Reference. The Council stated that aerial navigation was of such importance as to affect the "body politic of the dominion."

Accordingly, all airlines, air transport undertakings, airports and their employees fall under federal jurisdiction and may include:

- Employees of a company engaged in refueling, maintenance and ground handling of private, corporate and commercial aircraft;
- Employees of a maintenance, installation and repair firm where the firm's work is functionally interrelated with an airline; and
- Employees who service, inspect and certify aircraft (for example, an independent contractor hired by Air Canada to service its planes).

However, the following employees may not be necessary, integral or vital to the functioning of an airport, and may not be under federal jurisdiction:

- Baggage porters;
- An airport limousine service's employees (unless they provide transport beyond the borders of the province on a "continuous and regular" basis);
- Airport parking lot employees;
- Maintenance workers at an air traffic controllers' school;
- Employees of a catering company at an airport operating a coffee shop or restaurant, or contracting with an airline to supply in-flight food and beverages; and
- Employees performing duties upon an aircraft that do not relate to the aircraft operation, or to transportation (e.g., aerial surveys, aerial photography or advertising).

Note that the fact that an airport is situated on land owned by the federal government is not determinative of jurisdiction. The Crown in right of Canada owns a variety of property including national ports, Indian reserves, public harbours, roads, canals and airports. It is the nature of the undertaking rather than the ownership of the land that determines where jurisdiction will lie.

Communications

Communications includes radio and television broadcasting, cable television, telecommunications and internet service providers.

Radio and television broadcasting fall under federal jurisdiction pursuant to the POGG power in s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. See the Privy Council's decision in The Attorney General of Quebec (Appeal No. 84 of 1931) v The Attorney General of Canada and others, (Canada) [1932] UKPC 7 (9 February 1932), also known as the Radio Reference.

The sale of antenna time and the production of commercials has been held to be "program production" and not broadcasting and therefore employees engaged in the same fall under provincial jurisdiction rather than federal. See the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Canada Labour Relations Board et al. v Paul L'Anglais Inc. et al, [1983] 1 SCR 147, 1983 CanLII 121 (SCC).

Cable television, telecommunications and other forms of electronic communications including internet service providers (ISPs) fall under federal jurisdiction through the combined effect of s. 91(29) and s. 92(10)(a) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Together, these provisions provide Parliament with exclusive jurisdiction over interprovincial communications works and undertakings (and transportation).

In Island Telecom Inc. et al., 2000 CIRB 59, the Canada Industrial Relations Board held that internet service providers ("ISPs") fall within exclusive federal jurisdiction, including employment matters, because they constitute a federal undertaking carrying on an activity that is within the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament pursuant to s. 91(29) and s. 92(10)(a) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The basis for this decision was that ISPs provide customers with the ability to communicate across Canada and internationally, i.e., internet service providers provide access to local, inter-provincial and international telecommunications through the Internet.

In Northern Telecom v Communications Workers the Supreme Court of Canada held that the installation of telephone switching and transmitting equipment was part of the establishment and maintenance of a communications network and employees engaged in such an undertaking were therefore under federal jurisdiction. However, where a company is merely installing telephone receivers, its employees are under provincial jurisdiction. See Communications Workers of Canada v CTG Telecommunications Systems, Inc. (Canadian Telecommunications Group), 1985 CanLII 890 (ON LRB).

Companies such as Bell Mobility Inc. which provide wireless telecommunications services would, as such, fall under federal jurisdiction. Until January 2009, a company called Bell Distribution Inc. ("BDI") owned and operated a number of retail stores selling Bell Mobility products. As a retail operation, the stores and employees fell under provincial jurisdiction in employment matters. However, on January 1, 2009, BDI was amalgamated into Bell Mobility Inc. and since that date the retail stores have been owned operated by Bell Mobility Inc. There are 114 such retail store locations in Ontario, which operate under one of three banners: Bell, Bell World and Virgin Mobile. Where such stores are no longer operating as separate and severable entities from Bell Mobility Inc., the employees in those retails stores would be subject to federal jurisdiction.

Banks

The employees of federally-chartered banks fall under federal jurisdiction as banking is a subject enumerated in s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

However, loan and trust companies, credit unions and insurance companies fall under provincial jurisdiction. This is the case even if they operate in more than one province, perform some "banking functions," or are federally-incorporated. See Canadian Pioneer Management Ltd. et al v Labour Relations Board of Saskatchewan et al, [1980] 1 SCR 433, 1979 CanLII 180 (SCC).

Indians and Reserves

As noted earlier, as a general rule, the regulation of employment standards and labour relations falls within provincial jurisdiction pursuant to the province's constitutional authority over Property and Civil Rights in the Province, as per s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. However, s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 gives the federal government jurisdiction over Indians which has been held to encompass all Aboriginal Peoples, including First Nations, Inuit and Métis Peoples.

Whether any particular workplace is governed by federal legislation is determined on a case-by-case basis after examining the nature, operations and habitual activities of the undertaking. Generally, however, an employer will not be found to be governed exclusively by federal employment standards legislation merely because the business is owned and operated by Aboriginal persons, is located on a reserve or delivers its services in a culturally sensitive manner.

For example, in NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union, [2010] 2 SCR 696, 2010 SCC 45 (CanLII), the Supreme Court considered whether an aboriginal child welfare agency, set up pursuant to provincial child welfare legislation, was federally or provincially regulated with respect to their labour relations. A number of features of the child welfare agency suggested that it would be federally-regulated: it was set up collectively by seven First Nations; the child welfare services were provided primarily by First Nations employees to First Nations clients; the services were designed to protect, preserve and benefit the distinct cultural, physical and emotional needs of the children and families of the First Nations involved; it operated out of offices on a First Nations reserve; and federal funding was provided. The SCC found that the nature of the welfare agency's operation was to provide child and family services, a matter that falls exclusively within provincial jurisdiction and therefore determined that the child welfare agency was provincially regulated.

There are some circumstances, however, where a workplace located on a reserve will be governed by employment standards legislation pursuant to the federal government's jurisdiction with respect to "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians" as per s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. For example, a band council and its employees who are involved in the administration of the reserve are generally subject to the Canada Labour Code, and not the ESA 2000, because their primary function is the provision of Aboriginal governance.

However, this does not mean that any employment activity by a band council is necessarily a matter of exclusive federal jurisdiction. Where a federal undertaking carries on an operation unrelated to federal jurisdiction, that operation will be subject to provincial employment and labour law. The difficult question is whether a band council, when employing persons in the exercise of a particular activity, is carrying on a federal activity, operation or function such that the employment standards and labour relations pertaining to that activity must be federally regulated. This question has given rise to divergent cases depending on the particular band activity at issue.

It is recommended that guidance be sought in files involving Aboriginal employers or employees.

Shipping

The owner and employees on a ship engaged in interprovincial or international shipping will fall under federal jurisdiction.

If the owner of a ship falls under federal jurisdiction, but repairs are done to the ship by the employees of another employer while the ship is in drydock, the employees will generally fall under provincial jurisdiction if their employer would otherwise fall under provincial jurisdiction.

The owner of a ship whose ships operate totally within the province of Ontario (e.g., the Toronto Island and Manitoulin Island Ferries) and its employees will be governed by provincial legislation.

Fisheries

Federal jurisdiction over "seacoast and inland fisheries", as set out in s. 91(12) of the Constitution Act, 1867, has not been considered to include jurisdiction over the employment relations of any particular fishing business. The jurisdiction is limited to regulating fisheries in a general way: for example, setting limits on catches and establishing seasons. See United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union et al v British Columbia Provincial Council, [1978] 2 SCR 97, 1977 CanLII 205 (SCC).

As a consequence, jurisdiction over employment relations in the fishing industry, including persons employed in fisheries and those working on commercial fishing boats on inland waters, lies with the province. See Great Lakes Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union v 538391 Ontario Limited (Peralta Foods), 1987 CanLII 3081 (ON LRB).

Feed Mills, Flour Mills, Seed Cleaning Mills and Feed Warehouses

Feed mills, flour mills, seed cleaning mills and feed warehouses, wherever located in Ontario, fall under federal jurisdiction. These facilities are under federal jurisdiction as a result of the federal Parliament making a declaration under s. 92(10)(c) of the Constitution Act, 1867 that they are "for the general advantage of Canada" in s. 55(1.1) of the Canada Grain Act, RSC 1985, c G-10. Occasionally farms have non-commercial seed cleaning mills for their own use. In such cases, it is recommended that advice be sought.

Grain Elevators

The federal Parliament also made a declaration under s. 92(10)(c) of the Constitution Act, 1867 with respect to certain grain elevators in s. 55(1) of the Canada Grain Act, RSC 1985, c G-10. The "elevators" covered by the declaration and that as a result fall under federal jurisdiction are:

1. All elevators in Thunder Bay and west of Thunder Bay;
2. All elevators east of Thunder Bay along Lake Superior, Lake Huron, Lake St. Clair, Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, and canals or other navigable waters connecting those Lakes, or the St. Lawrence River or any tidal waters; and
3. The parts of premises east of Thunder Bay that are used for storing grain which have been designated an elevator under federal regulation.

In other words, pursuant to that declaration, most inland grain elevators east of Thunder Bay fall under provincial jurisdiction. However, it is possible that such an elevator will fall under federal jurisdiction if it is an integral element of a federal operation, e.g., has been purchased and is being operated by a federally regulated employer.

If there is a situation in which this provision potentially arises, it is recommended that advice be sought.

Trucking

The trucking industry is not a subject specifically enumerated in s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as falling under federal jurisdiction, and accordingly, provincial employment legislation will generally apply.

Nonetheless, a portion of the industry does fall under federal jurisdiction as a result of ss. 91(29) and 92(10)(a) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which bring works or undertakings connecting a province with any other or extending beyond the limits of a province under federal jurisdiction.

The trucking industry provides services in the following ways:

1. Common carriers: carriers that offer their services to the public for compensation.
2. Private carriers: firms whose principal business is something other than trucking but who transport their own goods or supplies, or those firms whose principal business is trucking but are not common carriers in that they perform their services exclusively for a related firm (whose principal business is something other than trucking).
3. Carrier services: firms who lease drivers or vehicles to common carriers but who do not themselves offer the services of a common carrier.

Common Carriers

The courts have held that where a common carrier's extraprovincial activity is "continuous and regular" it will be considered to be a federal work or undertaking and fall under federal jurisdiction. In R v. Toronto Magistrates, Ex Parte Tank Truck Transport Ltd., 1960 CanLII 120 (ON SC), only six per cent of the firm's business consisted of extraprovincial haulings, yet the court found that the extraprovincial aspect of the business was "continuous and regular". The fact that the volume of intraprovincial work exceeded the extraprovincial aspect was not relevant.

In R v Cooksville Magistrate's Court, Ex parte Liquid Cargo Lines Ltd., 1964 CanLII 162 (ON SC), only 1.6 per cent of the company's business was extraprovincial, but the court held that:

Viewed from the point of view of the applicant company, it is clear that its customers are provided with extraprovincial service consistently and without interruption whenever they apply to the applicant for such service. The applicant stands ready at any time to engage in hauls outside the boundaries of the Province of Ontario at the instance of any of its customers.... Further, the evidence is clear that it has made such trips frequently....

Therefore, if the trucking firm is willing and able to engage in extraprovincial activity whenever requested, and if it does in fact so engage, the extraprovincial activity will be considered "continuous and regular" and employment matters will be subject to federal jurisdiction.

Consequently, the Program takes the position that if a company operating as a common carrier holds an extraprovincial license it will fall under federal jurisdiction unless:

1. The extraprovincial license is only used on rare occasions (i.e., it is not used on a continuous and regular basis); or
2. The extraprovincial license is held by an organizationally distinct division that is separate from the rest of the operation, in which case only the division holding the extraprovincial licence will fall under federal jurisdiction.

Private Carriers

As a general rule, the delivery operation of a company whose principal operation is manufacturing, processing or selling will not fall under federal jurisdiction, even if the company makes extraprovincial deliveries. This is so even where the extraprovincial trips are regular and continuous. See Milk and Bread Drivers, Dairy Employees, Caterers and Allied Employees (International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, Local Union No. 647) v Dominion Dairies Limited, 1978 CanLII 443 (ON LRB), Humpty Dumpty Foods Ltd. v U.I.T.B.C.A., Local 333 and United Steelworkers of America v Pepsi-Cola Canada Ltd., 1995 CanLII 9942 (ON LRB).

This is so because it is the principal operation of the undertaking that determines its essential character; if the "pith and substance" is one of manufacturing, processing or selling of goods, and not transportation, then the undertaking does not fall under s. 92(10)(a) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and is not a federal undertaking.

Unless the nature of the principal operation puts the undertaking within some other head of federal jurisdiction, the entire undertaking, including the extraprovincial hauling is within provincial jurisdiction. See General Truck Drivers' Union, Local 879 v William R. Barnes Co. Ltd. and Re Mason Windows Ltd.

Carrier Services

Generally, companies that supply only the drivers of vehicles to other companies will not fall under federal jurisdiction, even if the drivers are assigned to work for companies who transport goods across provincial or national borders on a common carrier basis. This is so because it is the normal or habitual activities of a business that define the nature of its operation. In this situation, if the nature of the operation is one akin to a staffing company or temporary employment agency for truck drivers and not transportation, then the undertaking would not fall under s. 92(10)(a) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and is not a federal undertaking. See Woodmac Services Ltd. v Macklam (July 19, 1979), ESC 644 (Saxe).

Likewise, a company that leases vehicles does not fall under federal jurisdiction as a federal undertaking, even if the vehicles are driven beyond the boundaries of the province in which the lease is effected. The lessor is not operating the vehicles and therefore the leasing company's operation is not considered to be one that connects provinces or extend beyond the limits of a province as per s. 92(10)(a) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

However, in some situations, a staffing company or a company that leases vehicles could fall under federal jurisdiction if it is found to be integral to a federal undertaking.

The test that must be applied to find a seemingly provincial undertaking to be integral to a federal undertaking (e.g., a carrier service that crosses provincial or national borders) is rigorous and requires an extensive analysis of the facts.

The Supreme Court of Canada has laid out four general inquiries to help with the analysis of whether a seemingly local undertaking is integral to a federal undertaking:

1. What is the general nature of the local undertaking's operation?
2. What is the nature of the corporate relationship between the local undertaking and the companies that it serves, notably any federal undertaking?
3. What is the importance of the work done by the local undertaking for the federal undertaking as compared with its other customers?
4. What is the physical and operational connection between the local undertaking and the federal undertaking?

The above test (and most particularly the inquiry under four above) has a high threshold. As a result, it is rare that a company leasing drivers and/or vehicles to a common carrier that transports goods across provincial boundaries would be found to be integral to that federal undertaking and thereby fall under federal jurisdiction.

Bus Lines

The same principles apply to bus lines as those set out under trucking. Although a bus line is engaged principally in transporting people as opposed to hauling goods, in pith and substance it may be an undertaking that connects the province with any other or extends beyond the limits of the province. In that event, it would fall under federal jurisdiction.

For example, in Ontario (Attorney General) v Winner (c.o.b. Mackenzie Coachlines), [1954] UKPC 8 (22 February 1954), the Privy Council held that a bus line operating from Boston through Maine and New Brunswick to Nova Scotia that also picked up and set down passengers at intermediate points was an undertaking connecting the province of New Brunswick with that of Nova Scotia, and was therefore within exclusive federal jurisdiction.

In some cases, a municipal bus line or a local school bus service is operated by and functionally integrated with a federally regulated interprovincial bus or transportation company. In particular, the bus service and the rest of the interprovincial transportation company may be subject to common management, control and direction. In such cases, it may be that the bus service which is operating wholly within the province is nonetheless considered to fall under federal jurisdiction.

Courier Companies

The same principles apply to courier companies as those set out under Trucking and Bus Lines above.

A courier company may in pith and substance be an undertaking that connects the province with any other, or extends beyond the limits of the province. In that event, it would fall under federal jurisdiction.

In order for the courier company to fall under federal jurisdiction, the courier company has to transport the items across the border itself, rather than being a freight forwarder (i.e., a middleperson that picks up packages then hands them off to another company to transport over a border). In addition, the transport over a border has to be continuous and regular. For information on the meaning of continuous and regular, see the discussion about Common Carriers under Trucking above.

Sale of a Business Across Jurisdictions

When a business has been sold, ESA Part IV, s. 9 normally applies to provide continuity of employment for any of the vendor's employees hired by the purchaser. Refer to ESA Part IV, s. 9 for further discussion.

Generally, it is Program policy that ESA Part IV, s. 9 does not apply in a cross-jurisdictional sale (i.e., where the sale, lease, transfer or other disposition transforms a federal undertaking into a provincial undertaking or vice-versa.) There cannot be deemed continuity of employment in such a transfer because the Employment Standards Act, 2000 applies only to those employers who are within the legislative jurisdiction of the province. See Western Stevedoring Co. v Pulp, Paper & Woodworkers of Canada and Brotherhood of Railway, Airline and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees v Canadian Pacific Ltd. and Marathon Realty Co. Ltd. For the contrary view, see Canada (Attorney-General) v Standard Trust Co., 1994 CanLII 7516 (ON SC) and Arthur et al v A.A.S. Telecommunications Services Ltd. (February 17, 1998), 1262-97-ES (ON LRB).

Of course, a provincial business could be sold to a federal business and still remain under provincial jurisdiction if it was a discrete, severable part of the federal business and thereby retained its provincial character. In that case, ESA Part IV, s. 9 continuity would require the purchaser to give credit for service to those of its employees who had worked for the vendor.

In Canada (Attorney-General) v Standard Trust Co., a decision made under the former Employment Standards Act, the court held, contrary to Program policy, that the sale of business provisions do apply in a cross-jurisdictional sale. In that case, the assets of Standard Trust (which operated as a trust company and therefore was under provincial jurisdiction) were sold by the liquidator to Laurentian Bank (which was going to use the assets in a bank operation falling under federal jurisdiction). Most employees of Standard were hired by Laurentian, which voluntarily agreed to recognize the employees" length of employment with Standard. The Court held that as s. 13 of the former Employment Standards Act, now ESA Part IV, s. 9(1), provided for continuity of employment where a purchaser hired the employees of the seller and deemed the employment of those employees not to have been terminated, and as there was nothing in the legislation that said the purchaser must be within provincial jurisdiction, former employees of Standard were not entitled to termination and severance pay if they had been hired by Laurentian.

The reasoning in the Canada (Attorney-General) v Standard Trust Co. decision was followed by an adjudicator in the Arthur et al v A.A.S. Telecommunications Services Ltd. decision. There, Rogers Cantel Paging sold part of its business to A.A.S., which resulted in the transformation of a federal undertaking into a provincial undertaking. Shortly after the sale, A.A.S shut down. Adopting the court's reasoning in the Canada (Attorney-General) v Standard Trust Co. decision, the adjudicator rejected the argument that the word employer in s. 13(2) of the former Employment Standards Act, now ESA Part IV, s. 9(1), should be read as if it was modified by the words "within the jurisdiction's competence". The adjudicator ruled that s. 13 of the former Employment Standards Act applied to the sale and that there was continuity of employment. The adjudicator remarked that the argument for the application of s. 13 of the former Employment Standards Act to the sale in this case (federal to provincial) was far stronger than the one in Canada (Attorney-General) v Standard Trust Co. because there was no enforcement problem that flows from finding a formerly federally-regulated business subject to a provincial statutory provision.

Program policy is that neither Canada (Attorney-General) v Standard Trust Co. nor Arthur et al v A.A.S. Telecommunications Services Ltd. should be followed in applying ESA Part IV, ss. 9 and 10. In Rostrust Investments Inc./Investissements Rostrust Inc. v Doxtater, 2006 CanLII 41431 (ON LRB), the Ontario Labour Relations Board distinguished Standard Trust on the basis that the current act, unlike its predecessor, specifically provides that it does not apply to employers and employees if their employment relationship is within federal labour law jurisdiction.

New Building Service Providers

At issue in Rostrust Investments Inc. v Doxtater was whether ESA Part IV, s. 10 applied where the former provider of building services fell under provincial jurisdiction and the new provider fell under federal jurisdiction; since the new provider and any employees it hired would be within federal jurisdiction, the Board held that ESA Part IV, s. 10 did not apply.

While Rostrust Investments Inc. v Doxtater was concerned with ESA Part IV, s. 10 and a change of jurisdiction from provincial to federal, its reasoning is equally applicable to ESA Part IV, s. 9 and to changes in jurisdiction from federal to provincial. Accordingly, regardless of whether one is dealing with a change in building services providers or a sale of a business, and regardless of whether the change in jurisdiction is from provincial to federal or federal to provincial, the continuity of employment provisions do not apply.

Examples of Cross-Jurisdictional Sales

Transformation of business from provincial undertaking to federal undertaking

The sale of a provincial business (i.e., engaged in a provincial undertaking and under provincial jurisdiction) to a federal business may result in a transformation of the provincial undertaking to a federal undertaking (i.e., under federal jurisdiction).

For example: The sale of a boat that has been operated as a floating restaurant to a company that uses the boat to regularly ferry passengers to the United States.

In this case, ESA Part IV, s. 9 has no application to the employment relationship once the employer (and consequently the employment relationship) are no longer under provincial jurisdiction. In other words, the federal purchaser in the above example would not be subject to the provisions of the Employment Standards Act, 2000 and consequently there would be no s. 9(1) liability imposed on the purchaser.

Transformation of business from federal undertaking to provincial undertaking

The sale of a federal business (i.e., engaged in a federal undertaking and under federal jurisdiction) to a provincial business may result in a transformation of the business from a federal undertaking to a provincial undertaking (i.e., it is now engaged in a provincial undertaking and under provincial jurisdiction).

For example: A business operating a Great Lakes ferry that transports passengers to the United States is purchased by a company that uses the boat only as a floating restaurant. Several of the employees who had previously worked on the ferry are hired by the purchaser to work in the restaurant.

In this case, ESA Part IV, s. 9(1) could not be applied so as to recognize as continuous service any period of employment with a business that was, prior to its sale, a federal business. In other words, the employees hired by a purchaser who falls under provincial jurisdiction would not be given any credit for service with their previous federal employer.

Exception, Diplomatic Personnel – s. 3(3)

3(3) This Act does not apply with respect to an employee of an embassy or consulate of a foreign nation and his or her employer.

Section 3(3) provides that an employee of an embassy or consulate of a foreign nation and their employer are not subject to the ESA 2000. The nationality of the employee is irrelevant to the application of this exemption. Employees of an embassy or consulate who also work in locations other than an embassy or consulate of a foreign nation are covered by the Act for the work done at any other location.

Employees of foreign trade offices or foreign government tourist offices are subject to the Employment Standards Act, 2000, unless the office is an integral part of the embassy or consulate of the state in question. For a discussion of the distinction between trade offices and consular offices, see Gilligan v Swedish Trade Council and Swedish Trade Office (Canada) Inc. (February 2, 1998), ESC 97-91 (Randall).

Employees of a foreign embassy or consulate who have labour or employment complaints should contact the equivalent of the Ontario Ministry of Labour in the country of the embassy or consulate concerned.

s. 3(4) – REPEALED (Exception, employees of the Crown)

Effective January 1, 2018, the partial exception for the Crown, a Crown agency or an authority, board, commission or corporation all of whose members are appointed by the Crown (collectively, "the Crown"), and its employees, that was previously found in subsection 3(4) was repealed by the Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017 (FWBJA). As a result, as of January 1, 2018 Crown employees were no longer covered only by the Parts that were specified in s. 3(4); they were generally covered by all of the ESA. (Note that pursuant to s. 4(4.1), a provision introduced by the FWBJA, the Crown was exempted from the section 4 "related employer" provision effective January 1, 2018.)

Effective March 9, 2018, O Reg 285/01 (When Work Deemed to be Performed, Exemptions and Special Rules) was amended to exempt specified election officials employees from sections 17, 18 and 19 of the ESA 2000.

On October 24, 2018, O Reg 285/01 (When Work Deemed to be Performed, Exemptions and Special Rules) was further amended to exempt the Crown and its employees from Part VII (Hours of Work and Eating Periods) and from Part VIII (Overtime Pay).

Effective January 1, 2019, O Reg 285/01 was again amended and provides that the Crown and its employees are exempt from every provision of the ESA 2000 except those listed in the relevant section. See O Reg 285/01 Section 2.1 for more information.

Other Exceptions – s. 3(5)

3(5) This Act does not apply with respect to the following individuals and any person for whom such an individual performs work or from whom such an individual receives compensation:

1. A secondary school student who performs work under a work experience program authorized by the school board that operates the school in which the student is enrolled.
2. An individual who performs work under a program approved by a college of applied arts and technology or a university.

2.1 An individual who performs work under a program that is approved by a private career college registered under the Private Career Colleges Act, 2005 and that meets such criteria as may be prescribed.

3. A participant in community participation under the Ontario Works Act, 1997.

4. An individual who is an inmate of a correctional institution within the meaning of the Ministry of Correctional Services Act, is an inmate of a penitentiary, is being held in a detention facility within the meaning of the Police Services Act or is being held in a place of temporary detention or youth custody facility under the Youth Criminal Justice Act (Canada), if the individual participates inside or outside the institution, penitentiary, place or facility in a work project or rehabilitation program.

Note: On a day established by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor, this paragraph is repealed and the following is substituted:

4. An individual who is an inmate of a correctional institution within the meaning of the Ministry of Correctional Services Act, is an inmate of a penitentiary or is being held in a place of temporary detention or youth custody facility under the Youth Criminal Justice Act (Canada), if the individual participates inside or outside the institution, penitentiary or place in a work project or rehabilitation program.

Note: On a day established by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor paragraph 4 is amended by removing the words "Ministry of Correctional Services Act" and substituting the words "Correctional Services and Reintegration Act, 2018" in their place.

5. An individual who performs work under an order or sentence of a court or as part of an extrajudicial measure under the Youth Criminal Justice Act (Canada).

6. An individual who performs work in a simulated job or working environment if the primary purpose in placing the individual in the job or environment is his or her rehabilitation.

Note: The exclusion in paragraph 6 had been scheduled to be repealed on January 1, 2019, pursuant to the Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017. However, under the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018 amendments, the repeal was delayed and it will now be repealed on a day to be named by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor.

7. A holder of political, religious or judicial office.

8. A member of a quasi-judicial tribunal.

9. A holder of elected office in an organization, including a trade union.

10. A police officer, except as provided in Part XVI (Lie Detectors) or in a regulation made under clause 141(2.1)(c).

11. A director of a corporation, except as provided in Part XX (Liability of Directors), Part XXI (Who Enforces This Act and What They Can Do), Part XXII (Complaints and Enforcement), Part XXIII (Reviews by the Board), Part XXIV (Collection), Part XXV (Offences and Prosecutions), Part XXVI (Miscellaneous Evidentiary Provisions), Part XXVII (Regulations) and Part XXVIII (Transition, Amendment, Repeals, Commencement and Short Title).

12. Any prescribed individuals.

Students in authorized work experience programs – paragraph 1

Often, as part of the education of its students, a school board will establish a program in which the secondary school students will gain practical work experience. Such programs may be called, for example, practicums or co-ops. When a student performs work in such a program, the student and their employer are exempt from the ESA 2000 pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 1.

For this exemption to apply, the following criteria must be met:

1. The individual performing work must be a secondary school student;
2. The individual must be performing work under a work experience program authorized by a school board; and
3. The school board that authorized the work experience program must be the same school board that operates the secondary school in which the student is enrolled.

If the person is not a student at the school but is still in the program, or is in a program authorized by another school board, the exemption in s. 3(5)(1) will not apply.

Note that for the purposes of the exemption in s. 3(5), the term "student" is not limited to a person less than 18 years of age. This is in contrast to the use of the word student for the purposes of the student minimum wage provisions; the student minimum wage applies to a student not otherwise exempted from the ESA 2000 pursuant to s. 3(5) who is under the age of 18 years and:

1. Does not work more than 28 hours per week while attending school; or
2. is employed while on school holiday.

For more information on the student minimum wage, see ESA Part IX, s. 23.1.

Only the work in the program is exempt. If the student performs full or part-time work outside of the program (even if it is in the same workplace and for the same employer) the exemption will not apply to that work. For example, if the student performs work at a workplace under a co-op program on certain days of the week, but also performs work at the same workplace on other days, those other days' work would be covered by the ESA 2000 – see s. 3(6) “Dual Roles”.

The exemption will not apply just because an employee obtained their job through an employment or career counselling centre at a school, college or university.

In order for the exemption to apply, the secondary school in which the student is enrolled must be operated by a school board. The Program's position is that this refers to a school board within the meaning of the Education Act, RSO 1990, c E.82. Under s. 1 of the Education Act "school board" means a district school board or a school authority. The Education Act contains the following definitions:

"District school board" means,

a) an English-language public district school board,

b) an English-language separate district school board,

c) a French-language public district school board, or

d) a French-language separate district school board;

"School authority" means,

a) a board of a district school area,

b) a board of a rural separate school,

c) a board of a combined separate school zone,

d) a board of a secondary school district established under section 67,

e) a board established under section 68, or

f) a board of a Protestant separate school;

As a result, the exemption does not apply with respect to students in private, independent schools as they are not operated by a school board.

Programs approved by colleges of applied arts and technology or universities – paragraph 2

Colleges of applied arts and technology and universities often establish programs that permit students, and others, to gain practical work experience. When an individual performs work in such a program, that individual and their employer are exempt from the ESA 2000 in its entirety, with respect to that work, pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 2.

For the exemption to apply, the individual must perform work under a work experience program approved by a college or university. Unlike the secondary school student exemption in paragraph 1, it is irrelevant whether the individuals performing work in the work experience program are students at the college or university, that has approved the program, or at any college or university.

The exemption applies only to work performed under programs of Ontario colleges of applied arts and technology and Ontario universities. It does not apply to work performed under programs of institutions outside of Ontario.

In determining whether a particular college of applied arts and technology is an Ontario institution, reference can be made to section 2 of O Reg 34/03 under the Ontario Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology Act, 2002. That provision provides a list of institutions designated as colleges in Ontario.

The exemption applies only to work that is performed under the program; see “Dual Roles” at s. 3(6) for details.

Work performed under an apprenticeship program may be covered by this exemption, since such programs can include classroom training and, as such, form part of a program approved by a college or university.

For a more detailed discussion of the application of the ESA 2000 to apprentices please see the definition of employee in ESA Part I, s. 1.

Individuals in program that is approved by private career colleges – paragraph 2.1

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 added this new provision to the ESA 2000.

Effective January 1, 2018, individuals who perform work under a program that is approved by a private career college registered under the Private Career Colleges Act, 2005, SO 2005, c 28, Sched L and their employers are exempt from the ESA 2000 in its entirety, with respect to that work, pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 2.1. It is only work that is performed under programs of Ontario private career colleges that can fall under this exception. It does not apply to work performed under programs of private career colleges outside of Ontario.

The exemption applies only to work that is performed under the program; see “Dual Roles” at s. 3(6) for details.

The new exclusion for private career colleges is subject to criteria as may be prescribed by regulation. As of the date of writing, there are no prescribed criteria.

Similar to the exemption in paragraph 2, it is irrelevant whether the individuals performing work in the program are students at the private career college.

Work performed under an apprenticeship program may be covered by this exemption, since such programs can include classroom training and, as such, form part of a program approved by a private career college.

For a more detailed discussion of the application of the ESA 2000 to apprentices please see the definition of employee in ESA Part I, s. 1.

Participants in Ontario Works community participation activities – paragraph 3

Social assistance recipients involved in Ontario Works community participation activities, sometimes referred to as Welfare-to-Work programs, are exempt from the ESA 2000 pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 3.

The criteria that must be met for this exemption to apply are as follows:

1. The individual must be in receipt of social assistance; and
2. The individual must be participating in community participation activities.

Persons who are merely referred by Ontario Works to a job placement agency or into training, or who are merely placed with an employer, do not fall into the exemption.

Although social assistance recipients are exempt from the ESA 2000 as a whole if they are engaging in the community participation activities, guidelines for participants’ working conditions have been set by Ontario Works. It is the responsibility of the Ministry of Community and Social Services, not the Ministry of Labour, to ensure that the guidelines are adhered to.

Inmates of correctional institutions in work projects or rehabilitation programs – paragraph 4

Note that on a date to be named by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor, this paragraph will be repealed and substituted with modified wording. These modifications are due to changes to other legislation referenced in this paragraph. For more information, see the legislative section above.

Inmates of correctional institutions and penitentiaries operated by or under the province of Ontario or the federal government and individuals being held in a detention facility under the Police Services Act, RSO 1990, c P.15 or youth custody facility under the federal Youth Criminal Justice Act, SC 2002, c 1, who participate in work projects or rehabilitation programs, are exempt from the ESA 2000, pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 4.

Under s. 25 of the Ministry of Correctional Services Act, RSO 1990, c M.22 ("MCSA"), the Minister of Community Safety and Correctional Services who had the powers and duties of the Minister of Correctional Services Act transferred to them by Order in council approved November 24, 2003 may authorize a rehabilitation program under which an inmate may continue to work at their regular employment or obtain new employment. Under s. 26 of the MCSA, the Minister may authorize an inmate to participate in a work project or a rehabilitation program outside the correctional institution. Finally, under s. 18(1) of RRO 1990, Reg 778, a regulation under the MCSA, an inmate may be required to perform work within an institution.

The requirements that must be met for the exemption in s. 3(5) para. 4 to apply are as follows:

1. The individual must be an inmate or an offender in a provincial or federal correctional institution or penitentiary, or an individual who is being held in a detention facility or youth custody facility; and
2. The individual must be performing work in a work project or a rehabilitation program.

Performing work under court order or sentence or under the Youth Criminal Justice Act – paragraph 5

When a person is convicted of an offence, instead of (or as well as) being confined to a detention facility or a place of custody or ordered to pay a fine, the offender (including a young offender) may be ordered to perform a certain amount of work or services, commonly known as community service. When performing this work, the offender is exempt from the subject to the court order is exempt from the ESA 2000 pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 5.

Any other employment undertaken by the offender is not exempted by this provision. For example, a person may be working full time as a secretary at a factory but has been ordered by a court to work 10 hours per week at a community centre. The work at the community centre would be exempt from the ESA 2000, but the ESA 2000 would apply to the employment at the factory, subject to other provisions, exemptions and special rules under the ESA 2000.

Individual performing work in simulated job or working environment – paragraph 6

Note: This exclusion was originally scheduled to be repealed on January 1, 2019, pursuant to the Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017. However, under the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018 amendments, the repeal was delayed. The provision will now be repealed on a day to be named by proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor.

Under this provision, participants in simulated working environments (for example, a sheltered workshop program) are not covered by the ESA 2000 pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 6 if the primary purpose of the workshop is to rehabilitate the participants.

This exemption codifies Program policy and a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, Re Kaszuba and Salvation Army Sheltered Workshop et al., 1983 CanLII 1795 (ON SC). In that case, the Ontario Divisional Court, on judicial review, endorsed in slightly amended form the referee's conclusion that:

> [I]f the substance of the relationship is one of rehabilitation, then the mischief which the Employment Standards Act [now the Employment Standards Act, 2000] has been designed to prevent is not present and a finding that there is no employment relationship within the meaning of the Employment Standards Act must be made.

It is Program policy that in order for the exclusion under s. 3(5) to apply, economic productivity must be a minor and merely incidental aspect of an individual's participation in the work or services performed at a sheltered workshop. Consequently, not all organizations calling themselves sheltered workshops can consider themselves automatically falling within the exclusion in s. 3(5).

In order to determine whether s. 3(5) applies in a particular instance, consideration might be given to the list of factors set out in Linden J.'s concurring opinion in Re Kaszuba and Salvation Army:

1. Hours of work;
2. Method and amount of payment;
3. Profitability of the work;
4. Conditions that must be met at work;
5. Amounts and type of counselling provided;
6. Quantity and quality of recreational and medical facilities; and
7. Any other factors that are relevant in determining whether the relationship is one of employment or if it is a therapeutic exercise.

The above factors may be helpful in determining whether, in the words of s. 3(5), paragraph 6, the primary purpose in placing an individual in a simulated job environment is their rehabilitation.

There is also a type of relationship where a charitable agency places a worker with a “host” business to reintegrate them into the workforce. The relationship typically lasts for a short period, such as eight weeks, and the worker receives payment from the host business. There is no control or training of the worker by the agency, and therefore the agency is not the employer of the worker. Usually, the agency pays the host business, which pays the worker. The agency is in turn reimbursed by a governmental agency such as the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board. Since this is not an arrangement where an individual is placed in a simulated job environment with a view to their rehabilitation, the exclusion in ESA Part III, s. 3(5) would not apply. The issue of whether or not there is an employer-employee relationship between the host business and the worker must be determined based on the relevant common law tests.

Such an arrangement was considered in 379169 Ontario Limited c.o.b.a. Bell Air Conditioning v Prevost (May 15, 1987), ESC 2242 (Fraser) in which the referee held that the applicant host company was an employer under the former Employment Standards Act and that the monies received by the employee pursuant to the former Workers' Compensation Board Vocational Training Program were wages under that Act.

This exemption is also referenced in the definition of employee in ESA Part I, s. 1 see Sheltered Workshop.

Holders of political, religious or judicial office – paragraph 7

Holders of political, religious or judicial office are exempt from the ESA 2000 pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 7. This provision reflects the common law position that holders of political, religious or judicial office are not employees.

While it is often obvious whether an individual occupies a religious office, it is not always the case. In Kashruth Council of Canada v Rand, 2011 CanLII 71786 (ON LRB), the OLRB ruled on the question of whether this exemption applied to two Mashgiachim (kosher food inspectors). The OLRB held that while the position of a Mashgiach is a religious one, that does not in itself enough mean that a Mashgiach holds a religious office. The OLRB observed that an essential characteristic of office-holder status is independence. While not ruling out the possibility that there may be situations where a particular Mashgiach is subject to this exemption, it found that the individuals in this case did not have any greater independence than non-religious food inspectors and that the exemption therefore did not apply.

Members of quasi-judicial tribunals – paragraph 8

Members of quasi-judicial tribunals are exempt from the ESA pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 8. This provision reflects the common law position that members of quasi-judicial tribunals are not employees.

Holders of elected offices in organizations – paragraph 9

Holders of elected offices in organizations, including trade unions, are exempt from the ESA pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 9. This provision reflects the common law position that elected officers in an organization, such as school board trustees, are not employees.

Police officers, except as provided in Part XVI (Lie Detectors) or in a regulation made under clause 141(2.1)(c) – paragraph 10

Pursuant to s. 3(5) paragraph 10, police officers are exempt from the ESA 2000 except for the lie detector provisions contained in Part XVI.

If a regulation was to be made with respect to infectious disease emergencies under s. 141(2.1)(c), police officers would also be subject to the provisions of the ESA as provided for in that regulation. At the time of writing, no such regulation was made.

Clause 141(2.1)(c) provides that the Lieutenant Governor in Council may make regulations:

> "providing that section 50.1 or any provision of it applies to police officers and prescribing one or more terms or conditions of employment or one or more requirements or prohibitions respecting emergency leave for infectious disease emergencies that shall apply to police officers and their employers"

Directors of a corporation – paragraph 11

Under s. 3(5) paragraph 11, directors are exempt from the ESA 2000 except for those Parts concerning the liability of directors and the administration and enforcement of the ESA 2000:

- Part XX Liability of Directors
- Part XXI Who Enforces This Act and What They Can Do
- Part XXII Complaints and Enforcement
- Part XXIII Reviews by the Board
- Part XXIV Collection
- Part XXV Offences and Prosecutions
- Part XXVI Miscellaneous Evidentiary Provisions
- Part XXVII Regulations
- Part XXVIII Transition, Amendment, Repeals, Commencement and Short Title

For a more detailed discussion, see the employee definition in ESA Part I, s. 1.

Any prescribed individuals – paragraph 12

At the time of writing, the only prescribed individuals are those described in O Reg 477/18 – Non-Application of Act, which reads:

ESA Part III Section 3.1 – Crown Bound

3.1 This Act binds the Crown.

This provision was introduced into the ESA 2000 by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 effective January 1, 2018, at the same time that the former s. 3(4) – which provided that only certain provisions of the ESA 2000 applied to the Crown, Crown agencies or an authority, board, commission or corporation, all of whose members were Crown appointees – was repealed.

This section provides that the ESA 2000 binds the Crown. However, it must be read in conjunction with:

- s. 4(4.1), which provides that s. 4(2) – which treats "related" entities as one employer under the ESA 2000 – does not apply to the Crown, Crown agencies, or an authority, board, commission or corporation, all of whose members were Crown appointees, and
- s. 2.1 of O Reg 285/01, which provides that the Crown, Crown agencies, or an authority, board, commission or corporation, all of whose members were Crown appointees is exempt from every provision of the ESA 2000 except for those listed in that provision. See the discussion of s. 2.1 of O Reg 285/01 for details.

ESA Part III Section 4 – Separate Persons Treated as One Employer

Separate Persons Treated as One Employer – s. 4(1)

4(1) Subsection (2) applies if associated or related activities or businesses are or were carried on by or through an employer and one or more other persons.

Section 4 sets out when separate persons may be treated as one employer for the purposes of the ESA 2000.

In law, a person includes a corporation. Further, for purposes of the ESA 2000, person is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1(1) to include a trade union. As a result, corporations, individuals (sole proprietors), partnerships (whether of individuals or corporations), unions and other associations (whether of individuals or corporations) are all potentially within the scope of s. 4.

The definition of employer in ESA Part I, s. 1(1) states:

1(1) "employer" includes,

(a) an owner, proprietor, manager, superintendent, overseer, receiver or trustee of an activity, business, work, trade, occupation, profession, project or undertaking who has control or direction of, or is directly or indirectly responsible for, the employment of a person in it, and

(b) any persons treated as one employer under section 4, and includes a person who was an employer.

In order for separate persons to be treated as one employer, the following requirements must be met:

- Associated or related activities or businesses must be carried on
- Those activities or businesses must be carried on by two or more entities

A detailed discussion of these requirements is below.

Note: On January 1, 2018, the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 SO 2017, c 22 amended s. 4 to remove the requirement that the intent or effect of the arrangement as described in s. 4(1) must be to defeat, either directly or indirectly, the purpose of the ESA 2000 in order for the employer and other persons to be treated as one employer.

Note also that while at one time under the former Employment Standards Act, two or more entities could not be treated as related employers unless the employee whose rights were in question was an employee of each of the entities concerned, that requirement was eliminated by amendments made to the former Employment Standards Act in 1987. There is nothing in the language of s. 4 to suggest that an employee must be an employee of each of the entities concerned in order for s. 4 to apply.

Associated or Related Activities

In determining whether the associated or related test is met, the employment standards officer should consider the following significant criteria. They are listed in descending order of significance with the most important factor listed first:

- Common management
- Common financial control
- Common ownership
- Existence of common trade name or logo
- Movement of employees between two or more entities
- Use of same assets by two or more entities, or transfer of assets between them
- Common market or customers served by the two or more entities

This list is not exhaustive; there may be other relevant factors in the context of a particular case. It should also be noted that it is not necessary for all of the factors to be present in order for a finding of relatedness or association to be made under s. 4(2). See Verdun v PlateSpin Canada Inc., 2005 CanLII 1637 (ON LRB) for a good discussion of these criteria.

The following is a discussion of each of the criteria.

Common Management

The requirement that two entities be under common control or direction appeared in the pre-June 15, 1987 Employment Standards Act. That phrase, however, did not appear in provisions in the former Employment Standards Act that came into force on June 15, 1987, and it does not appear in s. 4(1) of the ESA 2000. As a result, it is not always necessary to show common control or direction or common management to make a finding of relatedness. However, it is the policy of the Program that common management will be a highly significant (although not always a necessary) factor in determining relatedness. For example, if Corporation A exercises control on a regular basis over the internal management of its subsidiary, Corporation B, then the common management test will be satisfied. This form of control may be evident in a number of forms, such as:

1. Management personnel of the subsidiary are appointed, terminated or transferred by the parent company on a regular basis;
2. The Board of Directors of A and its subsidiary B are interlocking or have common members, and decisions of B's Board of Directors are made according to A's and B's interests;
3. Management practices of the subsidiary are determined by the parent corporation.

The concept of a "directing mind" or "controlling mind" is often helpful in determining whether there is common management. For example, if several corporations constitute a comprehensive and integrated business and are under the control of an individual who is the directing mind of the business, the common management test will be satisfied. See 550551 Ontario Ltd. v Framingham (Div. Ct.), 1991 CanLII 7388 (ON SC), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act.

If there is a common directing or controlling mind, the common management test may be met even though the corporations involved do not have common directors. See 782368 Ontario Inc. o/a Consolidated Security Services v Powers (December 23, 1990), ESC 2793 (Barnett), another decision under the former Employment Standards Act.

Note, however, that an individual who is the controlling or directing mind of a business would not be made personally liable under s. 4(2) unless the individual is operating as a sole proprietor. See 550551 Ontario Ltd. v Framingham (Div. Ct.) and also Canada Machinery Corporation v Employees (September 18, 1991), ESC 2931 (Mitchnik). A sole proprietorship exists where an individual carries on business themselves, as opposed to where a corporation or partnership carries on the business. A sole proprietor might carry on the business under their own name or they may do so under another name. If the sole proprietor carries on business other than under their own name, the sole proprietor is required to file a declaration under the Business Names Act, RSO 1990, c B.17. This declaration is required to be filed at the Ministry of Government and Consumer.

The mere fact that entity A owns a majority interest in entity B may not be sufficient in itself to satisfy the common management test. If the ownership is in the nature of an investment only, and A does not manage or actually control the affairs of B, the common management test may not be met. In this regard see Modern Mold Ltd. v Finnerty (December 18, 1990), ESC 2802 (Brown), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act. However, if A does manage the affairs of B, the common management test will be satisfied and there will be a strong indication that the two entities are related.

The common law cases in the area of wrongful dismissal are also helpful. At common law, a plaintiff in a wrongful dismissal action against his employer may wish to join the employer's parent corporation as a party to the action, because it has a better ability to pay a judgment or is in a jurisdiction in which it is procedurally more advantageous to sue. In such cases, the common management test is often a key one. See, for example, Manley Inc. v. Fallis and Sinclair v Dover Engineering Services Ltd., 1987 CanLII 2692 (BC SC).

The common management test may also be satisfied even though Corporation B does not commence operations until after Corporation A ceases to do so. For example, if the sole shareholder and manager of Corporation A discontinues the business and sets up Corporation B, in which she or he is also the sole shareholder and manager, the common management test would be met and a finding of relatedness may be made. See Refac Industrial Contractors Inc. v Haygood et al (May 30, 1990) ESC 2703 (Brown), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act. Note this example is not intended to imply that the owner of A must be the owner of B in order for the common management test to be met. If A and B had a common controlling mind, this test will be met.

Common Financial Control

Examples of common financial control would be a centralized payroll, centralized accounting functions and procedures, and consolidated financial statements. For example, if Corporation A performs the payroll functions for both Corporation A and B, the common financial control test will be met, and there is an indication that the corporations may be related. See for example Laverty Richards Guerrieri Investments Inc. o/a Madame's Mansion Restaurant v McHugh (June 13, 1988), ESC 2347 (Baum), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act.

Common Ownership

The common ownership test would be met where, for example, Corporation A owned more than 50 per cent of the shares of each of Corporations B and C. In such a case, B and C would be under common ownership. The common ownership test by itself will likely not support a finding of relatedness – see Modern Mold Ltd. v Finnerty, discussed previously. However, if, in addition to common ownership, one or more of the other factors is present, such as common management, market or customers, then a finding of relatedness may be made.

Existence of a Common Trade Name or Logo

The existence of a common trade name or logo may be supportive of a finding of relatedness or associatedness. For example, if one company is X Ltd. and the other is Y Ltd. carrying on business as X, the common trade name or logo criterion will be satisfied. For an example of a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, see Million Dollar Saloon Inc. v MacDougall (October 13, 1989), ESC 2576 (Rose). However, franchisees using the same trade name under license from the franchisor will generally not be related to each other or to the franchisor. There may be some cases, though, where they are related, especially where the relationship between the parties goes beyond a pure franchise arrangement. For example, see Texas Longhorn Café Inc. v Snider et al (September 1, 1992), ES 142/92 (Wacyk), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, where the arrangement included movement of staff and supplies between two entities as well as overlaps in ownership.

Movement of Employees Between Two or More Entities

The requirement for the employee to have been employed by all of the entities considered related appeared in the pre-June 15, 1987 Employment Standards Act. However, neither s. 4(1) nor the corresponding provisions under the former Employment Standards Act that came into force on June 15, 1987 contained such a requirement. Nonetheless, the fact that the employee-claimant or other employees have worked for both entities A and B is significant (although no longer necessary) in determining whether the entities are related or associated under s. 4(1).

The transfer of employees may indicate a functional integration between the two entities suggesting that they are related, especially if there is common management or common financial control. For example, see Million Dollar Saloon Inc. v MacDougall, a case under the former Employment Standards Act. If the entities are covered by the same collective agreement, and there is movement of unionized employees from one entity to the other, it may indicate a possibility that the entities are related. But note that some collective agreements are of a type that is meant to cover several employers who have no connection with each other apart from the fact that they are all in the same industry, e.g., provincial agreements in the industrial, commercial and institutional sector of the construction industry.

Use of Same Assets by Two or More Entities

The use of the same assets by two or more entities or the transfer of assets between them may be an indication that the two entities are associated or related under s. 4(1). For example, if the two entities operate out of the same premises or share the same machinery and equipment, this may be an indication that the entities are related or associated, especially if one of the other more significant factors such as common management or common financial control is present. For example, see Synform Design Group Inc. v Onorato (December 25, 1990), ESC 2805 (Baum), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act.

If there is a transfer of assets or a transaction between two entities, and the transfer or transaction is not at fair market value, then there is an indication that the entities are not dealing at arm's length, which suggests that the entities are associated or related. For example, where Corporation A, which owns real estate and leases that property at below market rent to Corporation B, the two corporations may be related. See 550551 Ontario Ltd. v Framingham (Div Ct), decided under the former Employment Standards Act.

Common Market or Customers Served by Two or More Entities

The common market/customer test was adopted in Refac Industrial Contractors Inc. v Haygood et al, a decision under the former Employment Standards Act. The common market/customers test would be met if, for example, Corporation A sold equipment to its customers and Corporation B serviced that equipment. This test should be used in conjunction with the more significant of the tests.

Another test adopted by the referee in Refac Industrial Contractors Inc. v Haygood et al was the "mode and means of production" test. It involves consideration of whether the companies are manufacturing the same type of product in the same manner. The mode and means test is considered by the Program to be overly narrow and not to be determinative in any respect.

Two or More Entities Carrying on Business

This requirement is quite straightforward. There must be more than one entity carrying on the associated or related activities, businesses, etc. It is important to note that the activities need not be carried on at the same time, see s. 4(3). Corporations A and B may be a single employer even if B did not start carrying on business until such time as A ceased to do so. Decisions under the former Employment Standards Act, before there was explicit statutory wording to the effect of s. 4(3), include Refac Industrial Contractors Inc. v Haygood et al, 782368 Ontario Inc. o/a Consolidated Security Services v Powers (December 23, 1990), ESC 2793 (Barnett), and Chatters Restaurant and Tavern Inc. and 791818 Ontario Ltd. o/a T.C. Mellons v Morrissey and Yarmoloy (July 28, 1992), ES 121/92 (Wacyk).

Separate Persons Treated as One Employer – s. 4(2)

4(2) The employer and the other person or persons described in subsection (1) shall all be treated as one employer for the purposes of this Act.

Section 4(2) provides that if the requirements of s. 4(1) are met, the employment standards officer must treat the associated or related activities or businesses as one employer. It is a deeming provision and does not provide for the exercise of discretion by the employment standards officer.

One effect of the "non-discretionary" nature of the officer's application of s. 4(2) is that employees involved in a civil action against their employer may cite s. 4(2) in the action, arguing that if the requirements of s. 4(1) are met, the Act requires that the section be applied. An employee may propose this because an associated or related business may be better able to pay a judgment.

Businesses Need Not Be Carried on at Same Time – s. 4(3)

4(3) Subsection (2) applies even if the activities or businesses are not carried on at the same time.

Section 4(3) clarifies that the test set out in s. 4(1) for relatedness may be met even if the activities or businesses are not carried on at the same time. For example, Corporation A operates from January 1, 2002, to January 1, 2003. Corporation B commences operations on February 1, 2003. If Corporation A and B have common directors, if the business of both corporations is identical and if the employees employed by Corporation A move to Corporation B at the time that Corporation B began doing business, a finding of relatedness may be made despite the fact that Corporations A and B did not operate at the same time. See, for example, the following decisions under the former Employment Standards Act: Refac Industrial Contractors Inc. v Haygood et al, 782368 Ontario Inc. o/a Consolidated Security Services v Powers, and Chatters Restaurant and Tavern Inc. and 791818 Ontario Ltd. o/a T.C. Mellons v Morrissey and Yarmoloy.

Exception, Individuals – s. 4(4)

4(4) Subsection (2) does not apply with respect to a corporation and an individual who is a shareholder of the corporation unless the individual is a member of a partnership and the shares are held for the purposes of the partnership.

Section 4(4) ensures that s. 4(2) is not used to make a finding that Corporation A and the shareholders of Corporation A are related employers. To use s. 4(2) in this way would be to ignore the legal concept of the separate legal identity of corporations.

In law, a corporation is regarded as having a separate existence from the person or persons who own it. Ownership of a corporation is represented by shares. A person who owns more than 50 per cent of the shares is said to own a controlling interest in the corporation.

Section 4(4) establishes the one circumstance in which the legal concept of separate corporate personality (the corporate veil) can be pierced for the purposes of this section. If the shares of a corporation are held by the partners, and the partners, in turn, hold those shares for the purpose of the partnership, s. 4(2) may apply. Section 4(4) effectively prevents a partnership (which at law is not regarded as having a separate existence from the partners who form the partnership) from masquerading as a corporation.

Exception, Crown – s. 4(4.1)

4(4.1) Subsection (2) does not apply to the Crown, a Crown agency or an authority, board, commission or corporation all of whose members are appointed by the Crown.

This provision was introduced by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 effective January 1, 2018, at the same time that s. 3.1 was added to the Act to provide that the Act binds the Crown. Subsection 4(4.1) states that ss. 4(2), which treats “related” entities as one employer under this Act, does not apply to the Crown, a Crown agency or an authority, board, commission or corporation all of whose members are appointed by the Crown.

The term "Crown" refers to the government of Ontario. More precisely, it refers to the executive branch of government, as the term Crown does not include the Legislative Assembly or the judiciary.

The determination of whether an entity is a Crown agency and therefore exempted from the application of the s. 4 related employer provisions is generally made on the basis of the common law, which looks at the nature and degree of control which the Crown, through its Ministers, exercises over the entity. For example, see Westeel-Rosco Ltd. v Board of Governors of South Saskatchewan Hospital Centre, [1977] 2 SCR 238, 1976 CanLII 185 (SCC).

For a discussion about the meaning of “the Crown, a Crown agency or an authority, board, commission or corporation all of whose members are appointed by the Crown”, and the history of which provisions applied to the Crown, etc. at which point in time, see O Reg 285/01 s. 2.1.

Joint and Several Liability – s. 4(5)

4(5) Persons who are treated as one employer under this section are jointly and severally liable for any contravention of this Act and the regulations under it and for any wages owing to an employee of any of them.

Section 4(5) states that if persons are found to be one employer under s. 4(2), each person will be responsible for all the obligations under the ESA 2000 and regulations of all the other entities, separately and together.

Consider the example of entities A and B and an employee who became entitled to severance pay from entity A. Even if A and B did not become related until sometime after the employee became entitled to severance pay, entity B (as well as entity A) will still be liable for those monies under s. 4(2), if A and B are found to be a single employer under s. 4(2). However, by contrast, if an employee is terminated by employer A, which has a $2.0 million annual payroll, and subsequently A becomes related to employer B, which has a $1.0 million annual payroll, the employee will not be entitled to severance pay from either employer A or B, even though the combined payrolls exceed $2.5 million, the amount that triggers the entitlement to severance pay for an employee with five or more years' employment, under ESA Part XV, s. 64(2). The difference between the two situations is that, in the first situation, employer B is considered to have assumed the pre-existing employment standards obligations of employer A at the time they became related, whereas, in the latter, there was no pre-existing obligation for B to assume.

For a more detailed discussion, see the definition of person in ESA Part I, s. 1.

ESA Part III Section 5 – No Contracting Out

No Contracting Out – s. 5(1)

5(1) Subject to subsection (2), no employer or agent of an employer and no employee or agent of an employee shall contract out of or waive an employment standard and any such contracting out or waiver is void.

Section 5(1) prohibits employers, employees and their agents from waiving or contracting out of any employment standard provided by the ESA 2000, and nullifies and voids any such contracting out or waiver.

The prohibition in s. 5(1) is subject to s. 5(2). Accordingly, an employment standard need not be complied with if the employee is receiving a greater right or benefit with respect to that particular standard.

ESA Part I, s. 1 defines employment standard as follows:

"employment standard" means a requirement or prohibition under this Act that applies to an employer for the benefit of an employee.

Accordingly, the prohibition on contracting out applies only with respect to the ESA 2000's provisions that confer a benefit to an employee not with respect to those provisions that confer a benefit on an employer. For example, the ESA 2000 will not prohibit an agreement between an employee and employer to waive the requirement for an employee to provide four weeks' notice of intention to resign at the end of a pregnancy and parental leave.

Numerous referees have dealt with situations in which an employer and employee have come to an arrangement, the effect of which is to waive an employment standard. Such arrangements have been declared void, even in cases where the employee vociferously supported the arrangement. The following decisions under the former Employment Standards Act are some examples of arrangements that have been found unacceptable:

In Arpin Trucking Limited v Proud (November 24, 1981), ESC 1108 (Sheppard), the employees agreed to work at a higher hourly rate than previously, but with no overtime premium. The referee decided that they could not waive the employment standard, despite the fact that none of the employees supported the assessment against the employer.

In Canecon Investments Inc., c.o.b. as G.M. Stamm, Economic Research Associates v Gillezeau (December 11, 1981), ESC 1117 (Bigelow), the referee did not accept the employer's argument that the employee had accepted a yearly salary that supposedly allowed for vacation and public holiday pay, as such an arrangement would have been a waiver of the relevant employment standards.

In James Fibre Glass Manufacturing Co. Limited v Lindsay (Wilson) (December 6, 1984), ESC 1752 (Adamson), the referee found that an oral agreement to work extra hours to make up lost time at regular pay was void, as such an arrangement was a waiver of the employee's right to overtime pay.

In London White Trucks Limited v Martel (May 30, 1977), ESC 425 (Picher), the employer told the employee that he was to be dismissed, and suggested that giving him notice ". . . wouldn't be of any value…", The referee held that the employee's agreement with the suggestion was a waiver of an employment standard. Accordingly, the referee declared the agreement void.

In Lindzon v Starr (June 27, 1979), ESC 635 (Picher), the referee held that the employee's written release of her employer from any claims she may have had against him was null and void, with the result that the employer was liable for pay in lieu of notice of termination.

Where an employment contract contains a provision that purports to waive the right to notice of termination under ESA Part XV, s. 57 and 58, this attempted waiver, being null and void, cannot be used to determine the question of whether the employee received reasonable notice at common law. In this regard, see Machtinger v HOJ Industries Ltd., [1992] 1 SCR 986, 1992 CanLII 102 (SCC).

However, the prohibition against contracting out under the ESA 2000 must be distinguished from the settlement of an entitlement under the ESA 2000. For example, under ESA Part III, s. 6, a union could agree to a settlement with respect to entitlements under the ESA 2000, including severance pay. A settlement is distinguished from an attempt to contract out of the ESA 2000 because it is entered into only with respect to an entitlement that has crystallized or whose crystallization is imminent.

Greater Contractual or Statutory Right – s. 5(2)

5(2) If one or more provisions in an employment contract or in another Act that directly relate to the same subject matter as an employment standard provide a greater benefit to an employee than the employment standard, the provision or provisions in the contract or Act apply and the employment standard does not apply.

Section 5(2) ensures that where an employee has greater rights under an employment contract (which includes a collective agreement) or another statute, such greater rights will prevail over the minimum standards established by the ESA 2000. Such greater rights include a greater hourly rate, lesser hours of work, a greater percentage of vacation pay, longer vacations, higher public holiday pay and a greater number of public holidays.

(Note that prior to April 3, 2019, section 17.2 of the ESA 2000 provided an exception to the application of s. 5(2). Section 17.2 was repealed on April3, 2019 as a result of the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019. Before its repeal, ESA Part VII, s. 17.2 provided that even where a contract gave an employee a greater right than all or part of the hours of work provisions in the ESA 2000, employers were still required to comply with the requirement that existed at the time to obtain the approval of the Director of Employment Standards (or to have an application for approval pending for at least 30 days, as well as meeting certain other conditions) before the employer's employees could work in excess of the weekly limit on hours of work.)

Determining if Greater Right or Benefit Exists

Comparing Apples and Oranges

Consistent with s. 5(2), the Program takes the position that in determining whether the employment contract confers a greater right or benefit, one should not compare apples with oranges, i.e., the fact that a contractual provision or set of contractual provisions relating to the same subject matter as one employment standard provides a greater benefit to employees than that employment standard cannot be used to justify giving employees less than they are entitled to under a different employment standard. For example, the fact that an employee is paid considerably more than the minimum wage does not allow the employer to avoid paying overtime pay.

There is, however, some indication that the Board may take a different view. In Track-Corp Equipment Ltd. v Tremblay, 2007 CanLII 15165 (ON LRB), the employee had agreed to work for a flat rate of $19 per hour, purportedly inclusive of any entitlements to overtime pay, public holiday pay and vacation pay. Following the termination of his employment, he filed a complaint with the ministry. The investigating employment standards officer, finding that the employee was owed overtime pay, public holiday pay and vacation pay, issued an order to pay, which the employer appealed. The Board allowed the appeal. Noting that the employee had been paid over $12,000 during his time with the employer, and that if his rate of pay had been only the minimum wage in effect during that time ($7.45 per hour), his total entitlement, including overtime pay, public holiday pay and vacation pay, would have been just over $5,000, the Board held that:

…as a whole, the terms of [the employee's] verbal contract of employment (the $19.00 flat rate) clearly provided him with a greater right or benefit than the Act's minimum standards. Indeed, he was paid twice as much as would have been required to comply with the Act. In these circumstances, the contract of employment prevails.

In other words, it seems that the Board, rather than comparing the benefit conferred by the contractual rights pertaining to the same subject as one particular employment standard with the benefit that would be conferred by that standard, compared the total benefit of the entire contract with the total benefit of all employment standards. The Program's position is that this is not an appropriate approach to take as it would have the effect of depriving virtually any employee earning significantly more than minimum wage of all of their other entitlements under the ESA 2000.

The correct approach, in the Program's view, is that which was taken in C. Fasano Food Market v Bouvier (February 20, 1978), ESC 482 (Satterfield), where the referee rejected an employer's argument that it did not have to comply with the former Employment Standards Act's public holiday provisions because certain payments it had made to the employee for time not worked, voluntary cash payments and payment in trade were a greater benefit to the employee than the employment standard. In responding to that argument, the referee stated:

. . .That requires an interpretation of s. 4(2) [the provision in the former Employment Standards Act corresponding to s. 5(2) of the ESA 2000] that an employer's benefits and terms or conditions of employment collectively are of a greater benefit to the employee than those set out in the Employment Standards Act. Section 4(2) of the Act cannot reasonably bear that meaning. Its meaning is quite clear where it reads in part . . . 'that provides in favour of an employee a higher remuneration in money, a greater right or benefit or lesser hours of work than the requirement imposed by an employment standard shall prevail over an employment standard' (emphasis added). Section 1(e) of the [former] Act [corresponding to the definition of "employment standard" in s. 1(1) of the ESA 2000] defines an employment standard as meaning 'a requirement imposed upon an employer in favour of an employee by this Act or the regulations' . The use of the words 'an employment standard' conveys the meaning that for an employer's terms or conditions of employment to prevail, they must confer a greater benefit in respect to a particular employment standard and would only prevail in respect to that standard. In other words, the employer could not rely on a greater benefit in respect to one standard to offset a lesser benefit in respect to another standard. For example, an employer who provided vacations with pay in excess of the minimum standards set up in the Act could not claim relief for paying less than the minimum wage set by the Act.

While the wording of the predecessor greater right or benefit provision is somewhat different than the current provision, the Program is of the view that the differences are not significant and that the approach taken in the C. Fasano Food Market v Bouvier decision is still the appropriate approach to greater right or benefit issues.

Comparing Different Varieties of Apples / Package Approach

Although the Program is of the view that one cannot compare apples with oranges in determining whether a greater right or benefit is being provided, one can compare different varieties of apples. This means that one takes into account the entire package of contractual provisions that relate to the same subject as a particular employment standard. In some cases, this will require a comparison of both monetary and non-monetary aspects. For example, where the issue is whether the employment contract confers a greater right or benefit in relation to holidays than Part X, one would look at several features, including the number of holidays recognized, qualifying conditions, whether there is a right to be off work on a holiday, premium pay entitlements for working on a holiday, etc. A Divisional Court decision under the former Employment Standards Act, Re Queen's University and Fraser et al, 1985 CanLII 2260 (ON SC), indicated that this was the proper approach.

This approach gives the employer some flexibility where they are giving a contractual right that on balance is better overall for employees than the corresponding statutory standard, notwithstanding that the contractual right is not better in all respects or perhaps not even as good in some. Note that in order for a contractual provision to be found to prevail over an employment standard under s. 5(2), the right or benefit conferred by the provision must be in fact greater and not merely equal.

Rest Periods

It is not a greater benefit for an employee to receive payment in lieu of the required rest periods in ESA Part VII, s. 18 and ESA Part VIII, s. 20. The benefit provided by these required rest periods in the ESA 2000 is time off from work. Therefore, the appropriate comparison to determine whether a greater right or benefit has been provided to an employee with respect to these rest periods is the time off from work. Payment in lieu of time off from work, premium pay for working additional hours or the willingness of the employee to work extra hours are not relevant considerations for the determination of a greater right of benefit for rest periods.

Eating Periods

An employer may provide a greater right or benefit with respect to eating periods than that provided under ESA Part VII, ss. 20 and 21. For example, the contract may provide that the employee will be entitled to an hour long eating period within the time limits set out in ESA Part VII, ss. 20(1) and (2).

It is not a greater benefit for an employee to receive payment in lieu of the required eating period. The benefit provided by the eating period in the ESA 2000 is time off from work. Therefore, the appropriate comparison to determine whether a greater right or benefit has been provided to an employee with respect to the eating period is the time off from work.

In All-Way Transportation Services Ltd v Fountain (June 6, 1979), ESC 627 (Brent) the employer argued that an arrangement that allowed wait staff to continue to earn tips constituted a greater right or benefit. The Board, in rejecting that argument, said:

Working cannot be considered a greater right or benefit than not working just because the employee is getting paid. If that were possible, any employer could refuse to give meal breaks as long as the employee was paid. It is implicit in the Act that the break itself is the benefit.

Overtime

In Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited v Sudbury Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers' Union, Local 598 (July 13, 1981), ESC 1021 (Egan), a hearing was held on the issues of, first, the meaning of “week” in the overtime provisions in s. 25 of the former Employment Standards Act, which corresponds to ESA Part VIII, s. 22, and, second, the meaning of greater right or benefit, collective agreement versus the ESA 2000.

The work week of the employer was established and commenced at 8:00 a.m. Sundays, and was based on a set schedule over a four-week cycle, a series of seven consecutive eight-hour days worked over two work weeks. The union argued that week in former s. 25 referred to any period of seven consecutive days and that, accordingly, overtime was not being paid properly pursuant to the Act's requirement of one and one-half times the regular rate after 44 hours in the week, notwithstanding that overtime was paid, in accordance with the collective agreement entitlement, after 40 hours in a work week. The referee did not accept the employer's argument that week in s. 25 meant work week, but rather held that it means any period of seven consecutive days. Further, he held that since the overtime provisions of the collective agreement, being a package of rights involving premium pay after 40 hours per week, eight hours per day, on Sundays, and call-in pay, did not specifically relate to the particular s. 25(1) overtime standard in a week (being seven consecutive days), it could not be compared.

On judicial review, the Divisional Court in the unreported decision Re Falconbridge Nickel Mines Ltd. and Egan et al (January 18, 1982), (ON SCDC) found that the referee made an incorrect construction of week in s. 25 and of s. 4(2) of the former Employment Standards Act, which corresponds to s. 5(2). The Court determined that the employer has established a work week, the reference to week in s. 25 means the seven-day period which coincides with the work week. The Court also ruled that the referee was obligated by s. 4(2) to compare the rights, benefits, terms or conditions of the collective agreement "relative to overtime" with s. 25, which was the entire statutory provision regarding overtime.

In Re Falconbridge Nickel Mines Ltd. and Egan et al., 1983 CanLII 1931 (ON CA), the majority of the Court of Appeal affirmed the Divisional Court's decision on the interpretation of the s. 25(1) week issue, but did not comment on the s. 4(2) holding. However, the Divisional Court relied on this form of package comparison having been acceptable when they confirmed that approach in Re Queen's University and Fraser et al.

The fact that a contract of employment may provide for overtime payable after eight hours per day or 40 hours per week does not necessarily render it a greater benefit than that contained in ESA Part VIII, s. 22(1). The entire package must be examined. For example, an employee is paid an hourly rate and an amount for mileage and the collective agreement provides for time and one-half after 40 hours. The collective agreement may at first appear to be providing a greater right or benefit. However, the collective agreement also contains a provision stating that the hours of work in respect of which mileage is paid will not count as hours of work for the purposes of calculating overtime. In the event that pay for mileage plus regular pay plus overtime pay as per the collective agreement is less than the wages otherwise due had ESA Part VIII, s. 22(1) applied, then s. 5(2) would not apply and the ESA 2000's minimum standard would be operative.

Minimum Wage

Where a contract of employment (including a collective agreement) provides for greater remuneration than the minimum wage, that greater remuneration prevails over the minimum wage requirements of the ESA 2000. An employment standards officer can assess and enforce the greater remuneration.

Public Holidays

Where an employee has greater benefits under an employment contract or collective agreement with respect to public holidays, such greater benefits prevail over the minimum requirements in the ESA 2000.

For example, if an employee's employment contract grants the employee more money for a public holiday than does the calculation of public holiday pay under the ESA 2000, the employee is entitled to that higher amount. For example, the calculation for public holiday pay under the ESA 2000 is based on regular wages earned and vacation pay payable, but if that employee's employment contract provides for public holiday pay calculated using all wages earned in the four work weeks, the employee is entitled to that higher amount.

Another example is if an employer's requirements for public holiday pay are not as stringent as those in the ESA 2000, an employee is entitled to that pay if they fulfil those less stringent requirements. In Sturdell Industries Limited v Wilson (March 13, 1979), ESC 593 (Johnston), a case decided under the former Employment Standards Act, employer policy provided for a paid holiday even if the employee did not work the regularly scheduled day after the holiday, as long as they subsequently made up any lost time. The referee held that the employer could not retroactively "tighten up" the system and attempt to recover holiday pay that it paid, even though the employee would not have been entitled to the pay under the Public Holiday provisions.

In the context of collective agreements, arbitrators have held as follows:

In Canada Cement Lafarge Ltd. v. C.L.G.W., the arbitrator held that a collective agreement under which employees in a continuous operation would receive premium pay of 2 1/2 to 3 1/2 times the regular rate for work on 12 holidays provided a greater benefit than the Act. Accordingly, the agreement prevailed, since the package as a whole was considered to exceed the requirements of the Act.

In Re Queen's University and Fraser et al, the Divisional Court held that no illegality results from the fact that a collective agreement does not treat a particular day (being a public holiday under the ESA 2000) as the holiday, so long as the collective agreement provisions respecting holidays provide a greater right or benefit in total than the provisions of the Act.

Note that while these cases were all decided under the former Employment Standards Act, the principles enunciated in the decisions still apply.

Package Approach

Whether dealing with an individual employment contract or a collective agreement, the entire public holiday package, including monetary and non-monetary aspects and the stringency of qualifying conditions, must be reviewed. In order to find that the terms of a contract or collective agreement prevail over the ESA 2000, they must be on balance not just equal to the ESA 2000, but must provide a greater benefit.

The Divisional Court upheld the package approach in Re Queen's University and Fraser et al, where Madame Justice Van Camp, speaking for the majority stated, "One must look at the entirety of the terms in the agreement respecting holidays and not compare each individual item."

The Program's position is that factors that must be considered when assessing whether a contract provides a greater right or benefit with respect to public holidays include:

- The number of days off;
- The pay the employee receives when taking the day off;
- The pay the employee receives for working on a holiday;
- The qualifying conditions for the days off;
- Whether the employee has a right to refuse work on the holiday;
- Whether and how substitute days off may be arranged; and
- Whether some or all of the holidays provided under the contract are the same as those provided under the ESA 2000.

Historically, one view of the public holiday entitlement has been that such days are intended to be a common day free from work, to facilitate religious or traditional public celebrations or to spend time with family. As one aspect of the entitlement, it should be considered as one of the factors in determining whether the entitlements under the employment contract provide a greater right or benefit.

Consequently, applying the greater right or benefit provisions of the ESA 2000 could result in a finding that an employment contract provides a package related to public holidays that will prevail over the public holiday entitlements in the ESA 2000, even though the package does not treat for example Family Day, or indeed any one or more of the other public holidays under the ESA 2000, as a public holiday.

In order for a non-statutory benefit respecting public holidays to prevail over Part X provisions, the conditions of employment must confer a greater benefit in relation to the statutory public holiday employment standard and they will only prevail in respect of that standard. The employer cannot rely on a greater benefit in respect of one standard to offset a lesser benefit in respect of another standard.

In C. Fasano Food Market v Bouvier (a decision under former Employment Standards Act), the referee ordered the employer to pay public holiday pay even though he paid for time not worked (sick leave and personal time-off), voluntary cash bonuses and payment in trade, all of which amounted to a figure well in excess of the amount of the order to pay.

In 22 Employees v Christie's Dairy Limited (July 23, 1981), ESC 1030 (Sheppard) (a decision under the former Employment Standards Act), the referee ordered the employer to pay public holiday pay even though he had reduced the employees' work week from a five-day, eight hours per day week (40 hours total) to a four-day, nine hours per day week (36 hours total) with no reduction in salary. He had argued that this new arrangement was a better benefit, so he was justified in not paying premium pay for work on public holidays, especially as the employees had fully consented to the change. The referee did not agree with this argument.

Percentage in Lieu Arrangements

In some cases, the terms of a collective agreement or individual contract of employment provide for an employee to receive, in addition to their regular earnings, a percentage of those earnings in lieu of public holiday pay for public holidays not worked, or more typically, in lieu of a number of entitlements and benefits including public holiday pay. Since in such cases the employer is not adhering to the public holiday requirements per se, the employer cannot be considered to be in compliance with the ESA 2000 unless the percentage in lieu arrangement constitutes a greater right or benefit within the meaning of s. 5.

In order to determine whether a percentage in lieu arrangement constitutes a greater right or benefit, one must compare what the employee receives in lieu of public holiday pay with what the employee would have received had the employer paid public holiday pay in accordance with ESA Part X. Only if the former exceeds the latter can it be said that a greater right or benefit is being provided.

Where the amount paid under the arrangement is solely in lieu of public holiday pay (and not in lieu of other entitlements or benefits as well), the determination is made by comparing the percentage in lieu figure with the percentage that public holiday pay would have represented had the employer paid public holiday pay in accordance with Part X. This latter percentage may vary for a particular employee from holiday to holiday and year to year, depending, for example, on whether the employee was away from work in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred.

Where the amount paid under the arrangement is in lieu of other entitlements or benefits as well as public holiday pay, one must still determine the appropriate bench mark percentage to determine whether a greater right or benefit is being provided and compare that with the percentage in lieu of public holiday pay provided by the employer.

If the contract or collective agreement breaks down the total percentage in lieu to show how much of it is being provided in lieu of public holiday pay, that is the figure that should be compared with the benchmark.

Where the contract or collective agreement does not break down the total percentage, it will have to be determined whether or not the percentage in lieu is sufficient to fund all the benefits and entitlements it is intended to cover. If it is not sufficient, then the percentage in lieu does not constitute a greater right or benefit than ESA Part X.

In some cases, employees may receive a percentage in lieu for public holidays not worked, but still receive regular wages plus premium pay for any holidays that they do happen to work. Where this occurs, the amount paid for public holiday work may have to be taken into account along with the percentage in lieu in order to determine whether the employee received a greater right or benefit than what they would have received had the employer complied with ESA Part X in all respects. However, if the appropriate benchmark figure is exceeded on the basis of the principles discussed in the preceding paragraphs even without consideration of the amount paid for public holiday work, it is not necessary to take this additional step.

Vacation with Pay

It must be clear from the contract of employment exactly what the greater entitlement is before it is enforced. For example, although a contract may provide a greater benefit of four weeks' vacation time, this does not necessarily mean that a corresponding increase (e.g., to eight per cent) in the percentage of vacation pay can be enforced. However, if a contract of employment does provide a greater percentage for vacation pay, that greater percentage will be enforced even if the employee does not complete the vacation entitlement year, unless the entitlement to the greater percentage is clearly dependent upon that completion.

Leaves of Absence

Pregnancy and Parental Leave

Questions regarding the application of s. 5(2) may arise in the context of pregnancy and/or parental leave when an employee, who has taken time off that exceeds the leave periods under the ESA 2000, seeks the assistance of the Program in returning to work.

In many cases, employers are prepared to allow employees to take additional time off following the statutory leave. In fact, such arrangements are often individually tailored to suit a specific employee's needs rather than appearing as a standard contract entitlement. Nothing in the ESA 2000 prohibits employers from agreeing to allow an employee to take additional time off or otherwise negotiating a discrete, non-statutory leave entitlement as a term of the contract of employment. But, in either case, the terms of that extended period of time off or discrete, non-statutory leave would not be subject to scrutiny or enforcement under the ESA 2000. Most importantly, the rights of reinstatement afforded under the ESA 2000 are not enforceable at the end of the extended period of leave or following a discrete, non-statutory leave.

However, if the leave as provided under the terms of the contract is determined to be a greater right or benefit than the statutory leave entitlement, the terms of the leave under the contract of employment will apply and can be enforced.

In determining whether a contract provides a greater right or benefit with respect to leave, one must examine and compare the entire package of contractual provisions that relate to the package of leave provisions under the ESA 2000. However, one essential element of the package will be reinstatement in some form, as the concept of a leave from work necessarily implies a right to return to work.

It may not be necessary for the rights of reinstatement afforded under the contract provisions to be precisely the same as those afforded under the ESA 2000. For example, the contract provision may allow an employee to take reinstatement at the end of the statutory leave period in accordance with ESA Part XIV, s. 53, but limit the employee's rights to reinstatement following a period of leave that is longer than the statutory requirements, to reinstatement to a comparable job only. An officer would need to review all of the terms and conditions of the contractual provisions before concluding that there was a greater right or benefit but it would be open to an officer to conclude that a contract provides a greater right or benefit, despite the fact the employee seeking reinstatement at the end of the longer period of leave would be entitled only to a comparable job as per the contract.

Further, where an employer provides a greater right or benefit with respect to statutory leave in that the employment contract offers a period of pregnancy or parental leave that is greater than the statutory minimum, it will not necessarily mean that rights collateral to the statutory leave period such as participation in benefit plans and accrual of length of service, employment and seniority will automatically apply to that greater period of leave.

As an example, an employee had a right under her contract to extend her leave for an additional 26 weeks following the 78 week period of combined pregnancy and parental leave under the ESA 2000. However, if she does so, she will not accrue credit for seniority for that 26 week period. All other rights afforded under the statutory leave provisions continue to apply for the additional 26 week period. In that case, an officer may find that the leave provisions in the contract provide a greater right or benefit because the employee has all the rights afforded under the ESA 2000 for the period equivalent to the statutory leave as well as a right to a longer leave, despite the fact the contract provisions do not extend the right to accrue credit for seniority for that period of leave exceeding the statutory entitlement.

[Note: the discussion of the application of the greater right or benefit principle to the now-repealed Personal Emergency Leave standard appears below, following the Bereavement Leave discussion.]

Sick Leave

Determining whether the provisions of an employment contract provide a greater right or benefit than ESA Part XIV, s. 50 in relation to time off work because of personal illness, injury or medical emergency can be a difficult matter. The principle that applies in making the determination is the same principle that governs in any greater right or benefit determination, i.e., do the relevant contractual provisions, taken in their entirety, give the employee a better deal than the corresponding employment standard taken in its entirety.

In order to provide assistance in determining whether the employment contract is providing a greater right or benefit than sick leave under the ESA 2000, the following list of criteria has been developed. In any given case, some criteria might point one way, while some might point the other; bearing in mind, however, that the question to be answered is whether the contractual leave provisions, taken in their entirety, give the employee a better deal than ESA 2000's sick leave provisions, taken in their entirety. The contractual scheme should be examined in light of all of the criteria and then considered whether, on balance, it is the contract or the ESA 2000 that provides the better deal for the employee. Note, however, that the various criteria are not all of equal significance; while no single criterion is likely to be conclusive in itself, some are much more important than others. The criteria set out below have been listed in the order of their importance.

Note that if an employee who takes what is purported to be leave under the contract has no actual entitlement to return to work, the leave under the contract will NOT be considered to be a greater right or benefit. This is because it is inherent in the concept of a leave that there is an entitlement to return; a supposed leave without such an entitlement is meaningless.

Criteria

Number of Days of Leave

How many days of leave does the contract provide for? If the contract provides for fewer than three days' leave per calendar year, the leave under the contract will NOT be considered to be a greater right, since even only one day less leave under the contract constitutes such a significant reduction in the entitlement. For example, if a contract provides for only two days of sick leave, an employee's entitlement to sick leave would be reduced by a full one-third if that contract were to be considered to be a greater right or benefit. On the other hand, an unlimited leave entitlement, or an entitlement to more than the three days per calendar year that the ESA 2000 provides for, weighs in on the side of concluding that there is a greater right or benefit.

Qualifying Events

Does the contract cover all the different types of events that would entitle an employee to sick leave under ESA Part XIV, s. 50? For example, does the contract allow the employee days for a medical emergency but not for personal injury? If so, it would be a very strong indication that the contract does not provide a greater right or benefit.

Paid or Unpaid

Is the leave under the contract paid leave? None of the days of sick leave are paid under the ESA 2000, so if the leave under the contract is paid leave, this tends to point to the contract providing a greater right or benefit. But as with the other criteria, this criterion is not conclusive in itself; other criteria might tip the balance the other way.

Reinstatement Right

As stated above, if an employee who takes what is purported to be leave under the contract has no actual entitlement to return to work, the leave under the contract will NOT be considered to be a greater right or benefit. This is because it is inherent in the concept of a leave that there is an entitlement to return; a supposed leave without such an entitlement is meaningless.

If the employee takes leave under the contract, are they entitled to return to their original position (assuming it still exists), as they would be if they took sick leave under the ESA 2000? While it is unlikely, as a practical matter, that a short-term absence would result in the employee being moved to another position, it is quite conceivable that an employer might make such a move if there were repeated absences, and the new position might not even be comparable. If the employee does not have a right to return to their original position if it still exists, or to be placed in a comparable position if it does not, this would be a factor tending to suggest that a greater right or benefit is not being provided.

Negative Consequences

Even if the employee has a right to their original job, can the employee be adversely affected in any other way because they take leave under the contract? For example, the employee might have an entitlement under the contract to take leave and keep the original job, but they might lose out in other ways, e.g., the absence from work may cause them to be ineligible for a perfect attendance bonus, or the absence from work may be included when determining whether the employee has triggered an absence threshold that results in termination. This points in the direction of the contract not providing a greater right or benefit. See the discussion of the impact of statutory leaves on attendance management programs and perfect attendance bonuses at ESA Part XIV, s. 52(1).

Other examples of negative consequences that would point in the same direction include interruption in certain kinds of benefit coverage, deduction of leave time from seniority, and forfeiture of contractual vacation entitlement because the leave results in the vacation being postponed beyond the last allowable date for taking vacation under the contract.

Other Criteria

A number of other criteria, although comparatively minor in importance, could conceivably have some impact on the greater right or benefit determination. These criteria include:

- Whether there is a length of employment requirement that employees must meet in order to be eligible for the leave, and if so, how long it is.
    - The ESA 2000 provides that employees must be employed for two consecutive weeks in order to be eligible for the leave.
- What sort of evidence the employer requires to support the entitlement under the contract
    - Does it go beyond "evidence reasonable in the circumstances", which is what the employer is entitled to ask for under ESA Part XIV, s. 50(6)?
- Whether the contractual right is based on the calendar year or on the individual employee's year of employment
    - The right under the ESA 2000 is based on the former; the latter can impact unfavourably on employees who have only just started with the employer; and
- Whether the employer can deduct a part day of leave from the employee's entitlement as if it were a whole day
    - The ESA 2000 allows the employer to do this, but the contract may be more favourable to the employee.

Although none of these criteria may be greatly important in themselves, they could tip the balance one way or the other in a close case. In some cases these criteria may be more important – for example, if the contract contained a six-month length of employment requirement in order to be eligible for the leave, that criteria would be a factor strongly tending to suggest that a greater right or benefit is not being provided to an employee who has not met the six-month requirement. On the other hand, if a contract does not have any period of employment requirement and provides everything the ESA provides (which means, for example, that all of the rights under the General Provisions Concerning Leaves and the anti-reprisal protection would apply to the absences) this would strongly tend to suggest that a greater right or benefit is being provided.

If a contract does provide a greater right or benefit than ESA Part XIV, s. 50 provides, the terms of the contract will apply instead of ESA Part XIV, s. 50. That is, the terms of the contract, not ESA Part XIV, s. 50, will govern how absences are treated how many the employee is entitled to, what situations will trigger an entitlement, what evidence of eligibility may be required, whether or not they are paid, etc.

If a contract does not provide a greater right or benefit than ESA Part XIV, s. 50 provides, ESA Part XIV, s. 50 will apply.

Note that pursuant to ss. 50(7) – (9), where an employee opts to take a contractual leave that is not a greater right or benefit than s. 50, in circumstances that would also give rise to an entitlement under s. 50, the Act deems the contractual leave to be a s. 50 sick leave. See the discussion at subsections 50(7) – (9) for more information.

Family Responsibility Leave and Bereavement Leave

Determining whether the provisions of an employment contract provide a greater right or benefit than ESA Part XIV, s. 50.0.1 (family responsibility leave) and s. 50.0.2 (bereavement leave) in relation to time off work because of the death or illness, injury or medical emergency of a relative or an urgent matter concerning a relative can be a difficult exercise. The principle that applies in making the determination is the same principle that governs in any greater right or benefit determination, i.e., do the relevant contractual provisions, taken in their entirety, give the employee a better deal than the corresponding employment standard taken in its entirety.

In order to provide assistance in determining whether the employment contract is providing a greater right or benefit than family responsibility leave or bereavement leave under the ESA 2000, the following list of criteria has been developed. In any given case, some criteria might point one way, while some might point the other; bearing in mind, however, that the question to be answered is whether the contractual leave provisions, taken in their entirety, give the employee a better deal than the ESA 2000's family responsibility leave or bereavement leave provisions, taken in their entirety. Note, however, that the various criteria are not all of equal significance; while no single criterion is necessarily conclusive in itself, some are much more important than others. Whether the employment contract covers all of the types of events referred to in ESA Part XIV, s. 50.0.1 or s. 50.0.2 should be given far more weight than, for example, whether the contract would allow the employee to take family responsibility leave because their spouse's step-grandparent was ill. The criteria set out below have been listed in the order of their importance.

Note that if an employee who takes what is purported to be leave under the contract has no actual entitlement to return to work, the leave under the contract will NOT be considered to be a greater right or benefit. This is because it is inherent in the concept of a leave that there is an entitlement to return; a supposed leave without such an entitlement is meaningless.

Criteria

Number of Days of Leave

How many days of leave does the contract provide for? If the contract provides for fewer than three days' leave per calendar year for family responsibility purposes, or fewer than two days' leave per calendar year for bereavement, the leave under the contract will NOT be considered to be a greater right, since even only one day less leave under the contract constitutes such a significant reduction in the entitlement. For example, if a contract provides for only two days of leave for family responsibility purposes, an employee's entitlement to family responsibility leave would be reduced by a full one-third if that contract were to be considered to be a greater right or benefit. If the contract provides for only one day of leave for bereavement, an employee's entitlement to bereavement leave would be reduced by one-half if that contract were to be considered a greater right or benefit. On the other hand, an unlimited leave entitlement, or an entitlement to more than the three or two days per calendar year that the ESA 2000 provides for, weighs in on the side of concluding that there is a greater right or benefit.

Qualifying Events

Does the contract cover all the different types of events that would entitle an employee to family responsibility leave under ESA Part XIV, s. 50.0.1? For example, if the contract allows the employee family responsibility leave for the illness of a dependent relative, but not an urgent matter, this is a very strong (though not in itself conclusive) indication that the contract does not provide a greater right or benefit.

Paid or Unpaid

Is the leave under the contract paid leave? Neither family responsibility nor bereavement leave are paid leaves under the ESA 2000. So, if the leave under the contract is a paid leave, this tends to point to the contract providing a greater right or benefit. But as with the other criteria, this criterion is not conclusive in itself; other criteria might tip the balance the other way.

Reinstatement Right

As stated above, if an employee who takes what is purported to be leave under the contract has no actual entitlement to return to work, the leave under the contract will NOT be considered to be a greater right or benefit. This is because it is inherent in the concept of a leave that there is an entitlement to return; a supposed leave without such an entitlement is meaningless.

If the employee takes leave under the contract, are they entitled to return to their original position (assuming it still exists), as they would be if they took family responsibility or bereavement leave under the ESA 2000? While it is unlikely, as a practical matter, that a short-term absence would result in the employee being moved to another position, it is quite conceivable that an employer might make such a move if there were repeated absences, and the new position might not even be comparable. If the employee does not have a right to return to their original position if it still exists, or to be placed in a comparable position if it does not, this would be a factor tending to suggest that a greater right or benefit is not being provided.

Negative Consequences

Even if the employee has a right to their original job, can the employee be adversely affected in any other way because they take leave under the contract? For example, the employee might have an entitlement under the contract to take leave and keep the original job, but they might lose out in other ways, e.g., the absence from work may cause them to be ineligible for a perfect attendance bonus, or the absence from work may be included when determining whether the employee has triggered an absence threshold that results in termination. This points in the direction of the contract not providing a greater right or benefit. See the discussion of the impact of statutory leaves on attendance management programs and perfect attendance bonuses at ESA Part XIV, s. 52(1).

Other examples of negative consequences that would point in the same direction include interruption in certain kinds of benefit coverage, deduction of leave time from seniority, and forfeiture of contractual vacation entitlement because the leave results in the vacation being postponed beyond the last allowable date for taking vacation under the contract.

Eligible Relationships

With respect to entitlement to leave for death or illness, injury, medical emergency or urgent matters concerning certain relatives, how does the contractual right compare with family responsibility or bereavement leave under the ESA 2000, insofar as scope of coverage is concerned? ESA Part XIV, s. 50.0.1 and s. 50.0.2 provide an entitlement in relation to a fairly broad range of expressly designated relationships, including some that might be considered fairly remote (e.g., foster parent of the employee's spouse); moreover, the entitlement also extends to dependent relatives even if they do not fall into any of the named categories. If the contractual entitlement covers a narrower range of relationships (e.g., members of the employee's immediate family only), this weighs in on the side of concluding that it does not constitute a greater right or benefit. However, if, for example, a contractual entitlement for bereavement leave may be used in relation to any death – Including that of a non-relative – it tends to suggest that this may be a greater right than ESA bereavement leave.

Other Criteria

A number of other criteria, although comparatively minor in importance, could conceivably have some impact on the greater right or benefit determination. These criteria include:

- Whether there is a length of employment requirement that employees must meet in order to be eligible for the leave, and if so, how long it is.
    - The ESA 2000 provides that employees must be employed for two consecutive weeks in order to be eligible for the leaves.
- What sort of evidence the employer requires to support the entitlement under the contract
    - Does it go beyond "evidence reasonable in the circumstances", which is what the employer is entitled to ask for under ESA Part XIV, s. 50.0.1(7) and s. 50.0.2(7)?
- Whether the contractual right is based on the calendar year or on the individual employee's year of employment
    - The right under the ESA 2000 is based on the former; the latter can impact unfavourably on employees who have only just started with the employer; and
- Whether the employer can deduct a part day of leave from the employee's entitlement as if it were a whole day
    - The ESA 2000 allows the employer to do this, but the contract may be more favourable to the employee.

Although none of these criteria may be greatly important in themselves, they could tip the balance one way or the other in a close case. In some cases these criteria may be more important – for example, if the contract contained a six-month length of employment requirement in order to be eligible for the leave, that criteria would be a factor strongly tending to suggest that a greater right or benefit is not being provided to an employee who has not met the six-month requirement. On the other hand, if a contract does not have any period of employment requirement and provides everything the ESA provides (which means, for example, that all of the rights under the General Provisions Concerning Leaves and the anti-reprisal protection would apply to the absences) this would strongly tend to suggest that a greater right or benefit is being provided.

If a contract does provide a greater right or benefit than ESA Part XIV, s. 50.0.1 or s. 50.0.2 provides, the terms of the contract will apply instead of the ESA leave provision. That is, the terms of the contract, not ESA Part XIV, s. 50.0.1 or s. 50.0.2, will govern how absences are treated how many the employee is entitled to, what situations will trigger an entitlement, whether or not they are paid, etc.

Note that pursuant to ss. 50.0.1(8) – (10), where an employee opts to take a contractual leave that is not a greater right or benefit than s. 50.0.1, in circumstances that would also give rise to an entitlement under s. 50.0.1, the Act deems the contractual leave to be a s. 50.0.1 family responsibility leave. The same applies in the bereavement leave context. Pursuant to ss. 50.0.2(8) – (10) , where an employee opts to take a contractual leave that is not a greater right or benefit than s. 50.0.2, in circumstances that would also give rise to an entitlement under s. 50.0.2, the Act deems the contractual leave to be a s. 50.0.2 bereavement leave.

Personal Emergency Leave (in force prior to January 1, 2019)

Personal emergency leave was repealed pursuant to the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018 effective January 1, 2019. As such, this leave is no longer applicable. However, since employees may still have a complaint relating to personal emergency leave that arose during the period of time when that leave was in force, the discussion about what to consider when assessing whether an employee had a greater right or benefit with respect to personal emergency leave remains as part of this publication. The text appears in red to highlight that s. 50 personal emergency leave has been repealed.

Determining whether the provisions of an employment contract provide a greater right or benefit than ESA Part XIV, s. 50 (personal emergency leave) in relation to time off work because of personal illness, the death or illness of a relative or an urgent matter concerning a relative can be a very difficult exercise. The principle that applies in making the determination is the same principle that governs in any greater right or benefit determination, i.e., do the relevant contractual provisions, taken in their entirety, give the employee a better deal than the corresponding employment standard taken in its entirety.

However, in the case of personal emergency leave, the determination is much more complicated than it is in the case of other employment standards because of the very wide range of events referred to in section 50, the large number of features of the statutory right (e.g., reinstatement right, prohibition against penalization) and the virtually limitless variation in contractual entitlement schemes.

In order to provide assistance in determining whether the employment contract is providing a greater right or benefit than personal emergency leave under the ESA 2000, the following list of criteria has been developed. In any given case, some criteria might point one way, while some might point the other; bearing in mind, however, that the question to be answered is whether the contractual leave provisions, taken in their entirety, give the employee a better deal than the ESA 2000's personal emergency leave provisions, taken in their entirety. The contractual scheme should be examined in light of all of the criteria and then considered whether, on balance, it is the contract or the ESA 2000 that provides the better deal for the employee. Note, however, that the various criteria are not all of equal significance; while no single criterion is likely to be conclusive in itself, some are much more important than others. Whether the employment contract covers all of the types of events referred to in ESA Part XIV, s. 50 should be given far more weight than, for example, whether the contract would allow the employee to take leave because their spouse's step-grandparent was ill. The criteria set out below have been listed in the order of their importance.

Note that if an employee who takes what is purported to be leave under the contract has no actual entitlement to return to work, the leave under the contract will NOT be considered to be a greater right or benefit. This is because it is inherent in the concept of a leave that there is an entitlement to return; a supposed leave without such an entitlement is meaningless.

Criteria

Qualifying Events

Does the contract cover all the different types of events that would entitle an employee to personal emergency leave under ESA Part XIV, s. 50? For example, if the contract allows the employee personal sick leave and bereavement leave but does not allow any leave for the illness of, or urgent matter concerning, a dependent relative, this is a very strong (though not in itself conclusive) indication that the contract does not provide a greater right or benefit.

Number of Days of Leave

How many days of leave does the contract provide for? Obviously, if the contract provides for something less than 10 days' leave per calendar year, this weighs in on the side of concluding that it does not constitute a greater right or benefit. On the other hand, an unlimited leave entitlement, or an entitlement to more than the ten days per calendar year that the ESA 2000 provides for, weighs in on the side of concluding that there is a greater right or benefit.

Paid or Unpaid

Is the leave under the contract paid leave? Only the first two days of leave are paid under the ESA 2000 and the remaining eight days are unpaid, so if the leave under the contract is paid leave, this tends to point to the contract providing a greater right or benefit. But as with the other criteria, this criterion is not conclusive in itself; other criteria might tip the balance the other way.

Reinstatement Right

If the employee takes leave under the contract, are they entitled to return to their original position (assuming it still exists), as they would be if they took personal emergency leave under the ESA 2000? While it is unlikely, as a practical matter, that a short-term absence would result in the employee being moved to another position, it is quite conceivable that an employer might make such a move if there were repeated absences, and the new position might not even be comparable. If the employee does not have a right to return to their original position if it still exists, or to be placed in a comparable position if it does not, this would be a factor tending to suggest that a greater right or benefit is not being provided.

Negative Consequences

Even if the employee has a right to their original job, can the employee be adversely affected in any other way because they take leave under the contract? For example, the employee might have an entitlement under the contract to take leave and keep the original job, but they might lose out in other ways, e.g., the absence from work may cause them to be ineligible for a perfect attendance bonus, or the absence from work may be included when determining whether the employee has triggered an absence threshold that results in termination. This points in the direction of the contract not providing a greater right or benefit. See the discussion of the impact of statutory leaves on attendance management programs and perfect attendance bonuses at ESA Part XIV, s. 52(1).

Other examples of negative consequences that would point in the same direction include interruption in certain kinds of benefit coverage, deduction of leave time from seniority, and forfeiture of contractual vacation entitlement because the leave results in the vacation being postponed beyond the last allowable date for taking vacation under the contract.

Eligible Relationships

With respect to entitlement to leave for death or illness of or urgent matters concerning certain relatives, how does the contractual right compare with personal emergency leave under the ESA 2000, insofar as scope of coverage is concerned? ESA Part XIV, s. 50 provides an entitlement in relation to a fairly broad range of expressly designated relationships, including some that might be considered fairly remote (e.g., foster parent of the employee's spouse); moreover, the entitlement also extends to dependent relatives even if they do not fall into any of the named categories. If the contractual entitlement covers a narrower range of relationships (e.g., members of the employee's immediate family only), this weighs in on the side of concluding that it does not constitute a greater right or benefit.

Other Criteria

A number of other criteria, although comparatively minor in importance, could conceivably have some impact on the greater right or benefit determination. These criteria include:

- What sort of evidence the employer requires to support the entitlement under the contract
    - Does it go beyond "evidence reasonable in the circumstances", which is what the employer is entitled to ask for under ESA Part XIV, s. 50(10)?
- Whether the contractual right is based on the calendar year or on the individual employee's year of employment
    - The right under the ESA 2000 is based on the former; the latter can impact unfavourably on employees who have only just started with the employer; and
- Whether the employer can deduct a part day of leave from the employee's entitlement as if it were a whole day
    - The ESA 2000 allows the employer to do this, but the contract may be more favourable to the employee.

Although none of these criteria may be greatly important in themselves, they could tip the balance one way or the other in a close case.

If a contract does provide a greater right or benefit than ESA Part XIV, s. 50 provides, the terms of the contract will apply instead of ESA Part XIV, s. 50. That is, the terms of the contract, not ESA Part XIV, s. 50, will govern how absences are treated how many the employee is entitled to, what situations will trigger an entitlement, whether or not they are paid, etc.

If a contract does not provide a greater right or benefit than ESA Part XIV, s. 50 provides, ESA Part XIV, s. 50 will apply. Any issue as to the application of the contractual leave terms will not be an issue for the employment standards program.

For example, a contract provides for three paid personal sick leave days and three paid bereavement leave days per year. There is no provision for job-protected time off (paid or unpaid) for any other reason listed in s. 50 (e.g., to tend to a sick child or a spouse with an urgent matter). It is the Program's view that this contract does not provide a greater right or benefit than ESA Part XIV, s. 50 provides. Accordingly, s. 50 will apply. An employee will have the right to two days of paid leave and eight days' unpaid leave per calendar year for any of the reasons listed in ESA Part XIV, s. 50. Assume the employee takes 10 days of personal emergency leave for personal illness. The employee will have no further personal emergency leave entitlements under the ESA 2000. The question of whether the personal emergency leave absences will also draw down against the contractual right of three paid sick days is not a matter for the employment standards program.

Other Leaves

Similar considerations as those listed above apply in the context of family medical leave, family caregiver leave, critical illness leave, domestic or sexual violence leave, crime-related child disappearance leave and child death leave when determining whether a contractual provision provides a greater right or benefit than the provisions of the ESA 2000 as they relate to these six leaves. As with the leaves described above, if an employee who takes what is purported to be leave under the contract has no actual entitlement to return to work, the leave under the contract will not be considered to be a greater right or benefit. This is because it is inherent in the concept of a leave that there is an entitlement to return; a supposed leave without such an entitlement is meaningless.

Termination Notice / Pay and Severance Pay

Where an employee is provided a greater benefit for notice of termination, termination pay or severance pay under an employment contract or collective agreement that directly relate to the employment standard, such greater benefit prevails over the minimum requirements in the ESA 2000.

For example, if an employee's contract of employment provides the employee with two weeks of severance pay per year of employment rather than the minimum set out in the ESA 2000, the employee will be entitled to the higher amount under the contract of employment. However, where an employee's contract grants the employee a lump sum of $5,000 as severance pay and the employee's entitlement under the ESA 2000 is $7,500, the contract of employment will be considered to be void in this regard and the employment standard will prevail. Therefore, the employee would be entitled to severance pay in the amount of $7,500 despite the contract of employment.

In some cases, when terminating an employee, an employer will provide salary continuance for an extended period in order to bridge and/or maximize pension entitlements for the departing employee. Such arrangements may not refer explicitly to a termination date and in some cases, the employee is not expected (or even allowed) to attend at the workplace for the period that they are in receipt of the salary continuance payments. As a result, the Program may view the salary continuance as pay in lieu of notice rather than working notice.

In either case, such payments may exceed the statutory entitlement to notice or pay in lieu and would be a greater right or benefit. Where the employee is also entitled to severance under the ESA 2000, the employer may likewise claim that the salary continuance is a greater right or benefit with respect to severance pay, that is, where the total amount paid under the salary continuance arrangement exceeds both the notice or pay in lieu and severance obligations under the ESA 2000.

However, for this to be the case, the parties must have clearly turned their minds to the termination and severance obligations in the ESA 2000 in forging the deal. Even if the package is more generous than the combined entitlements under the ESA 2000, the package must reference severance pay explicitly or it will not be held to satisfy both notice and severance obligations. See McPherson v Xebec Imaging Services Inc. (January 25, 1996), ESC 96-17 (Randall). Note that although these arrangements may not comply with the requirements under ESA Part V, s. 11(5) with respect to the timing of the payment of termination pay in lieu of notice or severance pay, they may be considered to be a greater right or benefit in respect of those entitlements despite this technical breach.

In McDonnell Douglas Canada Ltd. v Topham (April 22, 1993), ES 93-74 (Randall) the employer argued that a provision in a collective agreement prohibiting termination except for just cause was a greater right or benefit than an individual employee's right to notice of termination under s. 57 of the former Employment Standards Act and, therefore, that the employee was not entitled to notice of termination since the greater right or benefit prevailed over the employment standard. In that case, the employee was terminated for innocent absenteeism and an arbitrator had ruled that this was just cause for termination. The referee agreed with the employer, stating that the just cause provision afforded the employee greater job security than the notice provisions in the Act. This decision is contrary to Program policy.

It is the Program's position that to compare a just cause clause with the statutory provision providing for notice of termination is to compare apples and oranges. While both a just cause clause and the statutory notice requirement relate to the termination of employment, they are different things. The focus of the just cause clause is job security. The statutory notice requirement has nothing to do with protecting an employee's job. Its purpose is to provide an employee whose employment is being terminated with a reasonable period of time (or pay in lieu) to seek other employment without undue financial hardship. A just cause provision provides a valuable right to job security, but it does not give an employee any right to notice of termination or pay in lieu. The just cause clause and the notice requirements address two different concerns. It is therefore the Program's view that the only thing that can be a greater right or benefit than notice of termination under ESA XV, ss. 57 or 58 is notice that is of greater length than that required under the ESA 2000.

The Divisional Court considered the issue of greater right or benefit in the termination notice context in the 1984 decision in Fanaken v Bell, Temple, 1984 CanLII 1856 (ON SCDC). The employee in that case was entitled under the former Employment Standards Act to four weeks' written notice of termination, but did not receive it. Rather, he was provided with six weeks' oral notice, key assistance in securing another job, together with the freedom not to report to work during the notice period. The court found that situation to be a greater right or benefit than the entitlement to four weeks' written notice. It must be emphasized that the oral notice was not just a casual reference to a likelihood of termination in the future but rather was found to be "clear and unequivocal" notice of a specified termination date. The Fanaken v. Bell, Temple decision does not stand for the proposition that oral notice of equal length to the required written notice under the ESA 2000 is either sufficient notice or a greater right.

Other Issues

Referees have often denied an employer's claim that a greater benefit has been granted. In St. Peter's Hospital o/a St. Peter's Centre v Kee (November 20, 1980), ESC 917 (Egan), the referee held that a six-month pregnancy leave (when the employment standard was 17 weeks) was not to be a greater benefit, because the employer also required one month's notice and three months' compulsory absence prior to the date of delivery. In Michaud v Employee (November 23, 1973), ESC 165 (Bolan), the referee held that a higher rate of pay than the standard in the area and no overtime pay was not a greater benefit. In Oxford Warehousing Limited v Morin et al (October 17, 1980), ESC 891 (Bigelow) the referee held that rehiring terminated employees so the conditions and pay were the same as if they never left and therefore not a greater benefit than termination pay. The cases cited in this paragraph are all decisions under the former Employment Standards Act.

Once the employer has given greater benefits to an employee, they cannot subsequently recover them. In Fleet Facts (Canada) Ltd. v Woods (October 16, 1973), ESC 179 (McNish), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, the referee held that an employer cannot give two weeks' termination pay and then, because the employee was entitled to only one week under the ESA 2000, try to deduct one week's pay from the vacation pay. Further, in David Kirsch Customs Limited v Fenney (March 22, 1983), ESC 1388 (Baum), the referee rejected the employer's argument that the amount of vacation pay paid to the employee in excess of the requirements of the former Employment Standards Act should be deducted from the pay in lieu of adequate notice of termination he had been ordered to pay to the employee. This was due to the fact that, among other things, the amount of vacation pay paid in excess of what was required by the former Employment Standards Act had been the subject of agreement between the employer and the employee. Since the Act indicated that a greater contractual or statutory right prevailed over a corresponding employment standard, the employer was obliged to pay it.

ESA Part III Section 5.1 – No Treating as if Not Employee

No Treating as if Not Employee – s. 5.1(1)

5.1 (1) An employer shall not treat, for the purposes of this Act, a person who is an employee of the employer as if the person were not an employee under this Act.

This provision was added to the ESA 2000 by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 effective November 27, 2017. It expressly prohibits an employer from treating an employee as if that person were not an employee under the ESA 2000. For example, this provision prohibits an employer from misclassifying or treating an employee as an independent contractor, volunteer or any other type of non-employee, and therefore denying that employee some or all of their ESA 2000 entitlements.

In applying this provision, it must be determined if the individual is in fact an employee. See ESA Part I, s. 1 for a detailed discussion on the definition of employee. See also the discussion of employer-employee relationships and independent contractors in ESA Part I, s. 1.

Note that before the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 added this provision to the ESA 2000, if an employer misclassified an employee for the purposes of the ESA 2000, an officer could only issue an order with respect to specific standards that were contravened. However, with the introduction of this new provision, if an employment standards officer finds that an employer violated s. 5.1(1) as well as other ESA 2000 provisions in relation to that employee, the officer may issue a notice of contravention under ESA Part XXII, s. 113 for s. 5.1(1) and those violations as well. For example, if an employer misclassified an employee as an independent contractor and subsequently denied the individual overtime pay, the officer may issue a notice of contravention for the violation of s. 5.1(1) as well as an order to pay wages under ESA Part XXII, s. 103 for the unpaid overtime pay.

An employer does not contravene this provision simply by contravening another provision of the ESA 2000 (e.g., failing to pay vacation pay). However, if that other contravention stemmed from the employer's misclassification of the employee as a non-employee, that would constitute a contravention of s. 5.1(1).

Knowledge and Intentions of Parties

The key consideration in determining if an employer violated this provision is whether or not an individual is an employee as per the definition in ESA Part I, s. 1 and if an employer-employee relationship exists. It does not matter whether the misclassification and treatment of an employee as a non-employee arose from:

- The parties' honest belief that the employee is an independent contractor, volunteer or any other type of non-employee;

- The parties' lack of knowledge or uncertainty about the difference between an employee and independent contractor, volunteer or any other type of non-employee;
- The parties agreeing that the employee would be classified as a non-employee; or
- The employee requesting to be classified and treated as a non-employee.

Note that an employee's request or agreement to be classified as an independent contractor or any other type of non-employee would be considered contracting out under ESA Part III, s. 5(1). Any such agreement is null and void.

From November 27, 2017 to December 31, 2018, s. 5.1 included a so-called "reverse onus" provision; it placed the burden of proof on the employer or alleged employer if, during the course of an investigation into a complaint, inspection or proceeding, the employer or alleged employer took the position that an individual is not an employee for the purposes of the ESA 2000. The effect of that provision was to require the employer to establish, on a balance of probabilities, that the person was not an employee. Although the onus was on the employer to demonstrate that the worker was not an employee pursuant to that subsection, it was Program practice that employment standards officers would not rely solely on the employer's failure to demonstrate this when making a determination, as officers make their determination based on the best available evidence. In the the investigatory context of the employment standards program, this meant, and continues to mean after the repeal of the "reverse onus" provision, that officers actively collect evidence from both parties and make the "employee status" determination on a balance of probabilities standard based on the best available evidence.

ESA Part III Section 6 - Settlement by Trade Union Binding

6 A settlement made on an employee's behalf by a trade union that represents the employee is binding on the employee.

This provision was introduced by the Employment Standards Act, 2000. It codifies Program policy as it applied under the former Employment Standards Act. Section 6 confirms that a trade union can agree to a settlement on behalf of an employee that the trade union represents. For example, s. 6 could apply to allow a union to enter into a binding settlement regarding severance pay entitlements.

It is important to note that such settlement may be entered into only with respect to an entitlement that has crystallized or where its crystallization is imminent. As a consequence, this section could not, for example, be applied to bind employees to a contract provision that provided for future overtime hours to be paid at the employees' regular hourly rate. This would be considered to be an attempt to contract out of the Act and contrary to s. 5(1). However, where, for example, employees represented by a trade union had not been paid anything with respect to overtime hours contrary to the Act and the collective agreement, the union could enter into a settlement on behalf of the employees that required the employer to pay the employees at their regular rate (as opposed to the overtime rate) for those overtime hours.

ESA Part III Section 7 - Agents

7 An agreement or authorization that may lawfully be made or given by an employee under this Act may be made or given by his or her agent and is binding on the employee as if it had been made or given by the employee.

This provision was introduced by the Employment Standards Act, 2000. Section 7 provides that, where the Act allows an employee to enter into an agreement with the employer (such as an agreement to work excess hours or to average overtime), an agent may make such an agreement. Where the agent makes such an agreement, it is binding on the employee. In Collins & Aikman Plastics Ltd. v. United Steelworkers, Local 9042 an arbitrator concluded that although the terms of the collective agreement allowed the employer to require an employee to work on a public holiday, those terms could not override the employee's individual statutory rights to choose not to work. This decision is inconsistent with the Program's interpretation of s. 7 of the Act and should not be followed.

The type of agreement that this section governs is limited to agreements made under the Act.

Where the Act requires that the agreement made or given by an employee be in writing, which is in most cases - see ESA Part I, s. 1(3) - the agreement made by the agent must also be in writing.

ESA Part III Section 8 – Civil Proceeding Not Affected

Civil Proceedings Not Affected – s. 8(1)

8(1) Subject to section 97, no civil remedy of an employee against his or her employer is affected by this Act.

Section 8(1) provides that nothing in the Employment Standards Act, 2000, subject to s. 97, suspends or affects the right of the employee to sue their employer in court. In particular, the ESA 2000's limitation period provisions do not apply when an employee pursues their ESA 2000 rights by suing in court.

Section 97 states:

97(1) An employee who files a complaint under this Act with respect to an alleged failure to pay wages or comply with Part XIII (Benefit Plans) may not commence a civil proceeding with respect to the same matter.

(2) An employee who files a complaint under this Act alleging an entitlement to termination pay or severance pay may not commence a civil proceeding for wrongful dismissal if the complaint and the proceeding would relate to the same termination or severance of employment.

(3) Subsections (1) and (2) apply even if,

> (a) the amount alleged to be owing to the employee is greater than the amount for which an order can be issued under this Act; or
>
> (b) in the civil proceeding, the employee is claiming only that part of the amount alleged to be owing that is in excess of the amount for which an order can be issued under this Act.

(4) Despite subsections (1) and (2), an employee who has filed a complaint may commence a civil proceeding with respect to a matter described in those subsections if he or she withdraws the complaint within two weeks after it is filed.

For a detailed discussion of when civil proceedings are not permitted, refer to ESA Part XXII, s. 97.

Notice of Civil Proceedings – s. 8(2)

8(2) Where an employee commences a civil proceeding against his or her employer under this Act, notice of the proceeding shall be served on the Director on a form approved by the Director on or before the date the civil proceeding is set down for trial.

Section 8(2) requires a litigant to give notice to the Director when the litigant relies on the ESA 2000 to support a claim against their employer.

Section 8(2) ensures that the Director and therefore the Ministry will be alerted so that it may seek standing in a proceeding if it is of the view that important issues are being raised or the integrity of the legislation is being challenged. The obtaining of standing will allow an opportunity to present the Ministry's view of the legislation if the lawsuit involves a legislative interpretation or policy issue, and further will ensure that the Director is informed of legal developments affecting the ESA 2000.

Another purpose for this section is to enable an employment standards officer to determine whether the employee is prohibited from filing a claim with the Ministry on the basis of previously having commenced a civil action for the same matter.

The Director need not be notified of the proceeding at its onset, rather, they must be notified when all the parties' pleadings are complete and on or before the date the matter is set down for trial. See ss. 8(3) to (5) for information on the service of the notice. For copies of the approved form please contact the Employment Practices Branch.

Note that the ESA 2000 does not require a client of a temporary help agency to notify the Director if it commences a civil action against a temporary help agency for charging a prohibited fee in contravention of paragraph 8 or 9 of ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.8(1).

Service of Notice - s. 8(3)

8(3) The notice shall be served on the Director,

(a) by being delivered to the Director's office on a day and at a time when it is open;

(b) by being mailed to the Director's office using a method of mail delivery that allows delivery to be verified; or

(c) by being sent to the Director's office by fax or email.

This provision must be read in conjunction with ss. 8(4) and 8(5), which establish when the service is deemed to be effected.

Section 8(2) requires that an employee give notice to the Director when they commence a civil proceeding against their employer under the ESA 2000. The notice must be served on a form approved by Director on or before the date the civil proceeding is set down for trial. Section 8(3) establishes the methods by which the notice may be served on the Director:

Delivered to the Director's office when it is open

This would include, for example, personal delivery by the employee or their representative or agent, or delivery by a private courier.

Generally, the Director's office is closed between 5 p.m. and 8:30 a.m. Monday through Friday, on Saturdays, Sundays, the nine public holidays under the ESA 2000 as well as Easter Monday, the August Civic Holiday, and Remembrance Day. See the definition of public holiday in ESA Part I, s. 1 for a list of the public holidays.

Mailed to the Directors office using verifiable mail

It is Program policy that three Canada Post services fall within the meaning of verifiable mail: these are Registered Mail, Xpresspost and Priority Courier. However, it is important to note that Xpresspost and Priority Courier are verifiable only if the "signature upon delivery" option is selected.

On the date of publication, the Directors office is located at the following address:

Ministry of Labour

Employment Practices Branch

400 University Avenue, 9th Floor

Toronto, ON M7A 1T7

Faxed or e-mailed to the Director's office

At the time of writing, the Director's fax number is 416-326-7061. The Director's email address is Director.EmploymentStandards@ontario.ca.

When Service Effective – ss. 8(4), (5)

8(4) Service under subsection (3) shall be deemed to be effected,

(a) in the case of service under clause (3) (a), on the day shown on a receipt or acknowledgment provided to the employee by the Director or his or her representative;

(b) in the case of service under clause (3) (b), on the day shown in the verification;

(c) in the case of service under clause (3) (c), on the day on which the fax or email is sent, subject to subsection (5).

This provision must be read in conjunction with s. 8(3) which sets out the methods by which a notice of a civil proceeding may be served on the Director. Section 8(4) establishes when the service of the notice of civil proceeding is deemed to have taken place.

If the notice was served by delivering it to the Director's office on a day and at a time when the office is open per s. 8(3)(a), service is deemed to have taken place on the day indicated on the receipt or acknowledgement provided by the Director or their representative.

If the notice was served by mailing it to the Director's office using a method of mail delivery that allows the delivery to be verified per s. 8(3)(b), service is deemed to be effective on the day shown in the verification.

If the notice was served by sending it to the Director's office either by email or fax per s. 8(3)(c), service is deemed to have taken place on the day the electronic transmission or fax transmission is sent, unless the transmission is sent on a day that the Director's office is closed or after 5:00 p.m. on any day. In those situations, s. 8(5) provides that the service is deemed to have been effected on the next day the office is open.

Generally, the Director's office is closed between 5 p.m. and 8:30 a.m. Monday through Friday, on Saturdays, Sundays, the nine public holidays under the ESA 2000 as well as Easter Monday, the August Civic Holiday, and Remembrance Day. See the definition of public holiday in ESA Part I, s. 1 for a list of the public holidays.

Same – s. 8(5)

8(5) Service shall be deemed to be effected on the next day on which the Director's office is not closed, if the fax or email is sent,

(a) on a day on which the Director's office is closed; or

(b) after 5 p.m. on any day.

When an employee serves their notice of civil proceeding on the Director via email or by fax after 5:00 p.m. on a regular business day, or at any time on a day when the Director's office is closed, s. 8(5) deems the service to have occurred on the next day the Director's office is open.

Generally, the Director's office is closed between 5 p.m. and 8:30 a.m. Monday through Friday, on Saturdays, Sundays, the nine public holidays under the ESA 2000 as well as Easter Monday, the August Civic Holiday, and Remembrance Day. See the definition of public holiday in ESA Part I, s. 1 for a list of the public holidays.

ESA Part IV - Continuity of Employment

The continuity of employment provisions in Part IV provide that where there is a sale of a business and an employee of the seller is hired by the purchaser, or where there has been a change of contractors for building services and an employee of the replaced provider is hired by the new provider, the employee's length or period of employment with their previous employer is treated as if it had been employment with the new employer with respect to rights under the Employment Standards Act, 2000 that are determined by length or period of employment, i.e., vacation, pregnancy and parental leave, domestic or sexual violence leave, critical illness leave, crime-related child disappearance leave, child death leave, notice of termination or pay in lieu, severance pay, organ donor leave and reservist leave.

ESA Part IV Section 9 – Sale, etc., of Business

Sale, etc., of Business – s. 9(1)

9(1) If an employer sells a business or a part of a business and the purchaser employs an employee of the seller, the employment of the employee shall be deemed not to have been terminated or severed for the purposes of this Act and his or her employment with the seller shall be deemed to have been employment with the purchaser for the purpose of any subsequent calculation of the employee's length or period of employment.

Section 9(1) provides for continuity of employment for an employee when there is a sale of a business if the purchaser employs an employee of the seller, subject to the s. 9(2) rules regarding a gap between employment with the purchaser and the earlier of: (1) the last day of employment with the seller and (2) the date of the sale. In that case, the employee is deemed not to have had their employment terminated or severed for the purposes of the ESA 2000 and employment with the seller is included in any subsequent calculation of length or period of employment with the purchaser for entitlements to:

1. Vacation – Employees whose period of employment is less than five years are entitled to two weeks of vacation with pay upon completion of each 12-month vacation entitlement year: s. 33(1)(a) and employees whose period of employment is five years or more are entitled to three weeks of vacation with pay upon completion of each 12-month vacation entitlement year;
2. Pregnancy leave – Employees may be entitled to pregnancy leave if they have been employed for at least 13 weeks preceding the expected date of birth: s. 46(1);
3. Parental leave – Employees may be entitled to parental leave if they have been employed at least 13 weeks prior to commencing the leave: s. 48(1);
4. Organ Donor Leave – Employees may be entitled to organ donor leave if they have been employed at least 13 weeks prior to commencing the leave: s. 49.2(3);
5. Reservist Leave – Employees may be entitled to reservist leave if they have been employed at least six consecutive months prior to commencing the leave: s. 50.2(3);
6. Critical Illness Leave – Employees may be entitled to critical illness leave if they have been employed for at least six consecutive months prior to commencing the leave: s. 49.4(2) and (5);
7. Domestic or Sexual Violence Leave – Employees may be entitled to domestic or sexual violence leave if they have been employed for at least 13 consecutive weeks prior to commencing the leave: s. 49.7(2);
8. Crime-Related Child Disappearance Leave – Employees may be entitled to crime-related child disappearance leave if they have been employed for at least six consecutive months prior to commencing the leave: s. 49.6(2);
9. Child Death Leave – Employees may be entitled to child death leave if they have been employed for at least six consecutive months prior to commencing the leave: s. 49.5(2);
10. Written notice of termination or pay in lieu:
    - Employees may be entitled to notice or pay in lieu (including mass notice, s. 58) if they have been continuously employed for at least three months: s. 54;
    - Entitlement to one to eight weeks of notice or pay in lieu depends on length of employment: s. 57;
11. Severance pay:
    - Employees may be entitled to severance pay if they have been employed for at least five years: s. 64;
    - Entitlement to up to 26 weeks of severance pay depends on length of employment: s. 65.

Vacation

Under the former Employment Standards Act, it was the Program's position that the effect of s. 13 was to transfer the liability for employees' vacation pay accrued but not yet due at the time of the sale to a purchaser. This position was consistent with several referee decisions which found that, based on the language of s. 13 and based on the clear link between vacation time and vacation pay, a purchaser was liable for accrued vacation pay. Although the language in s. 9(1) is different from the wording in the former provision, the Program's position is that the policy intent remains the same. The Program is of the view that had the Legislature intended to change the rules regarding vacation pay in the context of the sale of a business, it would have dealt with vacation pay explicitly - for example, under s. 76(1) a building service provider is required to pay accrued vacation pay upon ceasing to provide services at a premises and ceasing to employ an employee, there is no similar provision in s. 9.

The Program's policy is that both the employee's length of service and the vacation pay liability flow through the sale to the purchaser. However, the vacation pay liability only flows through the sale with respect to the accrued vacation pay that did not become due until after the sale. In other words, the seller is liable only for the vacation pay that was both accrued and due to the employee prior to the sale.

An exception to the flow-through rule occurs if the purchaser hires an employee of the seller more than 13 weeks after the earlier of the last day of the employee's employment with the seller and the date of the sale. In this situation, there is no continuity of employment under s. 9 and, therefore, the seller is liable for all vacation pay accrued by the employee to their last day of employment with the seller. In addition, the purchaser is not required to recognize the employee's length of service with the seller for the purposes of determining the employee's entitlements to vacation time under Part XI.

Part XIV Leaves of Absence

Section 9 does not require a purchaser to hire employees of the seller. As a result, the purchaser has no obligation to hire an employee of the seller who is on a statutory leave at the time of the sale. See Gonzalez v IBM Canada Limited, 2014 CanLII 14188 (ON LRB). Where the purchaser does hire the employee, it is the Program's position that the offer of employment may be made on whatever terms and conditions the purchaser chooses and so there is no statutory right to the "balance of the leave" commenced when the employee was employed by the seller, nor is there any obligation with respect to "reinstating" the employee to the same or a comparable job to the one held with the seller. For more information on Part XIV leaves of absence and reinstatement, see ESA Part XIV.

Termination Unrelated to Sale

Where an employee's employment is terminated and severed prior to the sale and for reasons unrelated to the sale, the question may arise as to whether s. 9 would apply.

Because the purpose of s. 9 is to "undo" a common law termination that would otherwise be triggered by the sale, it is the position of the Program that s. 9(1) does not apply where the termination or severance is not related in any way to the sale. For example, if an employee's employment was terminated by the seller for wilful misconduct and the employee was hired by the purchaser, s. 9(1) would not apply.

Inter-Jurisdictional Sale

It is the Program's position that there is no continuity of employment under s. 9 where there is an inter-jurisdictional sale, e.g., where there is a sale of a business from an employer that falls under provincial jurisdiction to an employer that falls under federal jurisdiction and vice versa. For additional information see the discussion at Part III, s. 3 on the sale of a business across jurisdictions.

For information on the Program's policy related to public holiday pay and a sale of business, refer to Part X, s. 24.

Definitions

Section 9(1) applies to a "sale" of all or part of a "business". These terms are broadly defined in s. 9(3) and s. 1(1) respectively as follows:

9(3) In this section,

"sells" includes leases, transfers or disposes of in any other manner, and

"sale" has a corresponding meaning.

1(1) In this Act, "business" includes an activity, trade or undertaking;

Section 9(1) applies to provide continuity of employment if:

1. An employer sells a business or part of a business; and
2. The purchaser of the business employs an employee of the seller, subject to the rules regarding a hiatus or gap in s. 9(2).

Determining Whether a Sale of a Business Has Occurred

Sale of a Business vs. Sale of Assets

It is sometimes difficult to determine whether a transaction involves a sale of a business or just a sale of assets. In a sale of assets, an employer sells items of property that it used in its business, but it does not transfer the actual business to the purchaser, even though it may discontinue its business following the sale. A sale of a business is sometimes described as a sale of a "going concern" or a "functional economic vehicle", but these are imprecise terms which may not provide much help in distinguishing a sale of a business from a sale of assets in practice.

The Ontario Court of Appeal in Abbott v Bombardier Inc., 2007 ONCA 233 (CanLII) considered the application of the going concern test and rejected its use on the basis that it did not accord with the purpose of section 9. The case involved a contracting out of information technology services where there was a significant transfer of assets and the purchaser agreed to make an offer of employment to each of the employees who performed the transferred functions and to recognize the past service of each employee who accepted the offer as if it had been employment with the purchaser. The Court found that the transaction constituted a sale of a part of a business under section 9 on the basis that the outsourced function was an "activity" for purposes of the definition of "business" in s. 1(1).

The Court held that a sale of a business arises ". . . where there was the transfer of a specific bundle of tasks and functions performed by an identifiable group of employees." While this appears to suggest that a mere contracting out transaction or outsourcing of a specific function may constitute a sale of a business, the decision must be considered in the particular context of the case. First, there was another indicator of a sale of a business, a transfer of significant assets - a substantial amount of computer equipment. Secondly, there was an obligation on the part of the purchaser to make offers of employment to the affected employees. Third, the employees were in fact transferred to the purchaser in accordance with the terms and conditions respecting their future employment with the purchaser as provided for in the agreement governing the transaction.

However, the presence of any of the following indicators generally points to a sale of a business:

- The seller has agreed not to compete with the purchaser (in some cases for a specified time or within a specific geographic area);
- The seller has agreed to give up use of its trade or corporate name or the purchaser plans to use or is using the name;
- The seller has given the purchaser client/supplier lists and other records used in its business;

- The purchaser has taken over the seller's outstanding contracts or customer accounts;
- The purchaser is marketing the same products or service as the seller did before the sale;
- The sale agreement specifically assigns the seller's "goodwill" to the purchaser.

While the existence of any of the above-mentioned factors points to a sale of a business, the absence of any of them does not mean that there was only a sale of assets. Further, the fact that the seller or purchaser calls the transaction a sale of assets does not make it one if, in actual fact, a sale of a business has occurred. Often, a seller and a purchaser will call the transaction a sale of assets for tax purposes when, in fact, it is a sale of a business for purposes of s. 9.

The issue as to whether a particular sales transaction involved the sale of a business or a part of a business (in either case, s. 9 would apply) or a sale of assets that may or may not be used in the operation of another employer's business (in which case s. 9 would not apply) has been the focus of many hearings under the former Employment Standards Act.

Referee Gorsky in McLaughlin Chevrolet-Oldsmobile Ltd. v Coombs (May 9, 1980), ESC 780 (Gorsky) cited the following test of what constitutes a sale of a business:

In deciding whether a transaction amounted to the transfer of a business, regard must be had to its substance rather than its form, and consideration must be given to the whole of the circumstances, weighing the factors which point in one direction against those which point in another. In the end, the vital consideration is whether the effect of the transaction was to put the transferee in possession of a going concern, the activities of which he could carry on without interruption.

The above is an excerpt from Kenmin v Frizzell et al, [1968] 1 All ER 414 (Eng QB) which appeared in an Ontario Labour Relations Board decision, Canadian Union of Public Employees v Metropolitan Parking Inc., 1979 CanLII 815 (ON LRB), from which Referee Gorsky cited at length.

In Mobile Mix Concrete Products (1971) Ltd. v McClain (October 29, 1974), ESC 206 (McNish), Referee McNish concluded that a sale of a business had occurred in light of the fact that the agreement of sale contained covenants by the vendor not to compete with the purchaser after the sale, and to give up the use of its corporate name and to deliver to the purchaser customer lists, salesmen's reports and production records.

Similarly, in 477286 Ontario Food c.o.b. as Vitto Brand Foods v Gilbank (September 18, 1981), ESC 1068 (Davis), Referee Davis ruled the transaction to be a transfer of a going concern and not a mere sale of discrete items of property because the purchaser used the vendor's trade name and packaging materials.

As previously noted, the lack of certain indicia of a sale of a business will not in itself take a transaction out of s. 9 where other indicia of such a sale are present. In Ontario Film Laboratories Ltd. v Pharand et al (July 8, 1980), ESC 814 (Aggarwal) the purchaser operated the same type of business as the vendor in the same premises with the same employees and with some of the vendor's assets. Referee Aggarwal concluded that s. 13(2), which corresponds to s. 9(1) in the ESA 2000, applied, notwithstanding the fact that the purchaser did not adopt the vendor's trade name.

In McLaughlin Chevrolet-Oldsmobile Ltd. v Coombs, the vendor's failure to assign outstanding contracts and to deliver up customer lists did not preclude a finding that a sale of a business had taken place where the purchaser had taken over the vendor's premises, employees, equipment and automobile dealer's franchise.

In Cambridge Stampings Inc. v Harth and Barradell (November 6, 1980), ESC 909 (Egan) Referee Egan held that the mere fact that the purchase made some post-sale alterations to both the machinery and the product of the vendor's metal stamping business did not prevent the application of s. 13(2) in the former Employment Standards Act, which corresponds to s. 9(1) in the ESA 2000.

In Nathan Hennick & Co. Ltd. v Masci (September 25, 1978), ESC 550 (Davis), where a purchased factory ceased operations for a three-week period following its acquisition, Referee Davis nevertheless determined that a sale of a business had occurred, since the evidence showed that there had been no severance of customer relations after the transaction and since the vendor's past practice had been to close the plant for a similar period for annual vacation purposes.

In Cambridge Stampings Inc. v Harth and Barradell, Referee Egan found that that while the fact that an agreement of purchase and sale which specifically provides for a transfer of goodwill is often cited as evidence that a business has been sold, ". . . the absence of goodwill is not conclusive of the contrary."

In 446816 Ontario Inc. c.o.b. Centreside Dairy v Popplewell (September 23, 1982), ESC 1286 (Fraser), Referee Fraser found that a lack of an express assignment of goodwill does not prevent a determination that there was a de facto transfer. In that case, the vendor had given a 10-year non-competition covenant and the purchaser had assumed all of the vendor's regular customers.

In Revin v Lamantia Garcia Products Ltd., 2008 CanLII 790 (ON LRB), the Board concluded that there had been a sale of a business even though there was no goodwill or even purchaser loyalty that could be transferred. In that case, the vendor assigned the lease of its stall at the Ontario Food Terminal and sold about $80,000 worth of fruit and vegetable inventory in it to the purchaser. The Board cited Abbott v Bombardier Inc. in taking the position that a sale of a business for the purposes of s. 9 of the ESA 2000 did not require the transfer of a going concern. Rather, the Board found that the purchaser had bought a very valuable business asset in the form of the lease of the stall and had purchased all of the vendor's fruit and vegetable inventory pursuant to the Bulk Sales Act. It had effectively purchased all that could be purchased of the vendor's business and then expanded its own business into an area previously carried on by the vendor. As such, it amounted to a sale of a business for the purposes of s. 9.

A purchaser who acquires assets such as premises and equipment from a vendor and who employs the vendor's employees does not remove itself from the ambit of s. 9(1) merely because it makes changes in the nature of the business formerly carried on by the vendor; if the purchaser continues on with a part of the vendor's undertaking, s. 9(1) will apply. For example, in Centreside Dairy v Popplewell, the vendor had operated a dairy primarily to process and to distribute milk, but had also manufactured and distributed ice cream. The purchaser of the dairy ceased milk processing altogether to devote the purchased facilities exclusively to the manufacture of ice cream, but it did arrange for the distribution by its delivery men of milk processed by another dairy. The referee held that because the sales operation of the business (as opposed to its production operation) continued unchanged after the purchase, the transaction could be characterized as the acquisition of "a part" of an activity, trade or undertaking, which fell within the definition of business – note that definition is similar to the one now contained in ESA Part I, s. 1(1).

Somewhat similar in effect is Lakehead Rent-Alls Limited v Estate of Karl Kuzik (October 17, 1981), ESC 1048 (Davis), where the purchaser and vendor had both carried on the business of renting and selling equipment from the same premises with the same employees. Referee Davis held that s. 13, which corresponds to s. 9 in the ESA 2000, was applicable despite the fact that the purchaser's marketing strategy was to concentrate on consumer rentals whereas the vendor had emphasized industrial sales.

Sale of a Business vs. Sale of Shares

In law, a corporation is regarded as having a separate existence from the person or persons who own it. Note that ownership of a business corporation is represented by shares. A person who owns more than 50 per cent of the shares is said to have a controlling interest in the corporation.

Therefore, where employees are employed by a corporation and the shares of the corporation change hands, the corporation and hence, the employer, is regarded as being unchanged, notwithstanding that the corporation now has new owners. In other words, the sale of a company's shares will not in itself give rise to a new employment relationship, given that the company, as a legal entity, is not changed by the transfer of its share capital to a new owner. Accordingly, s. 9 has no application to a sale of shares in a corporation. It is not necessary to give the protection of s. 9 in such a case because the accrued length or period of employment of the corporation's employees remains unaffected by a change in the corporation's owners.

Where an employee is employed by Corporation A, the shares of which are subsequently purchased by Corporation B, the employee who moves from A to B is considered to continue to be employed by the same employer, and their accrued length or period of employment with A is recognized without the application of s. 9.

An exception to this principle would occur, however, if the purchaser subsequently moved to wind up the seller corporation, or amalgamate it with another, with the result that the employees of the seller are now employed by another entity. In such cases, a sale transaction would likely be found to have occurred, either at the time of the transfer from the seller or subsequent winding up or amalgamation. In that case, s. 9 would apply. Each case however must be assessed on its own facts.

Receiverships

Where a receiver, acting on the instructions of a secured creditor of a debtor employer, is appointed to assume control of the employer's business, the end result will be either that the business is wound up or that it is sold as a going concern to a purchaser.

If the receiver opts for a wind-up, it may liquidate the assets of the business immediately following its appointment. Sometimes, however, the business will be wound up gradually, so as to maximize recovery for the secured creditor. Typically, loan agreements signed by debtors authorize the secured lender to appoint a receiver if default occurs. Such agreements usually provide that if a receiver is appointed, the receiver will be considered as agent for the debtor in carrying out the wind-up.

Secured creditors can also apply to the court for an order appointing a receiver. In such cases the receiver is acting as an officer of the Court. Any proceeds collected by a court appointed receiver are distributed through court orders.

Obviously, the appointment of a receiver raises many potential issues concerning the application of s. 9. If the debtor employer's employees continue working for the receiver for a time following its assumption of control over the business, the question might arise whether s. 9(1) applies so as to result in continuity of employment following the receiver's appointment. And if the receiver, instead of liquidating the business, sells it as a going concern, and the purchaser retains the employees of the business, the issue of whether the purchaser inherits the employees' accrued seniority would come into play.

Referees have consistently held that the involuntary nature of a disposition does not prevent it from being characterized as a sale within the meaning of s. 13(2), which corresponds to s. 9(1) in the ESA 2000. In Hotel Esquire (St. Catharines) Ltd. v Hands et al (May 31, 1982), ESC 1233 (Roberts) the referee held that the business of mortgagor assumed by mortgagee upon foreclosure. In Nathan Hennick & Co. Ltd. v Masci and Hentschell Clocks Canada (1977) Ltd. v Clarke (April 23, 1981), ESC 987 (Howe), the referees found that the sale of a business as a going concern by receiver. Accordingly, the fact that a business "changed hands" as a result of the appointment of a receiver does not preclude the application of s. 9(1). However, the appointment of a receiver will not generally constitute a "sale" such that that a receiver will be considered a "purchaser" for the purposes of s. 9 - see Armstrong et al v Coopers & Lybrand Ltd. et al, 1986 CanLII 2621 (ON SC). Rather, where the receiver sells the business, it is the purchaser of the business who may be subject to the continuity of employment provisions. As noted in Brandwood v Renfrew Inn Holdings Ltd. (November 15, 1994), ESC 94-212 (Genge), the receiver in such a case is acting as a conduit between the insolvent business and the purchaser. Employees who resign their employment between the time when the receiver is appointed and when the final sale to a purchaser is completed will not be entitled to termination and severance pay – see Brandwood v Renfrew Inn Holdings Ltd..

It follows from the foregoing that:

1. Where the receiver does not operate or sell the business but rather liquidates the assets, no s. 9(1) issue arises because there has been no sale of a business. It is the Program's position that the debtor employer is liable for any termination and severance pay owing in respect of the employees' service with the employer.
2. Where the receiver operates the business for a time for the purpose of maximizing realization but eventually liquidates the assets instead of selling the business, no s. 9(1) issue arises because there has been no sale of a business. In such a situation, ownership of the business was not transferred, but rather rested legally with the debtor employer to the date the assets were sold. It is the Program's position that the debtor employer will therefore be responsible for any termination pay or severance pay with respect to the employees' employment before the wind-up was finally effected, and that the receiver will not have any personal liability in this respect.
3. Where the receiver sells the debtor employer's business as a going concern and the purchaser hires the debtor's employees, s. 9(1) does apply, subject to the rules concerning a hiatus or gap, s. 9(2). The employees' service with the debtor, including service during the period of the receivership, is regarded as service with the purchaser for the purposes of any subsequent calculation of the employees' length or period of employment, regardless of whether, prior to the sale, the debtor-employer or the receiver gave termination notice or pay in lieu.

Bankruptcies

Trustee Sells Business

Where the employer becomes bankrupt, a trustee is appointed under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. If the trustee then sells all or part of the business to a purchaser, who employs employees of the bankrupt employer, s. 9 will apply, subject to the rules concerning a hiatus or gap in s. 9(2). Employees will not be considered to be automatically terminated by the appointment of the trustee if the trustee sells all or part of the business. Furthermore, the purchaser, upon subsequently terminating any of the employees, will have to recognize their length or period employment with the purchaser, plus that with the bankrupt company which includes employment for the period the company's estate was under the trustee's administration.

See for example:

- Bendall v Three Penguins Inc. o/a Sketchley Cleaners (December 3, 1992), ES 215/92 (Randall);
- 359027 Ontario Limited c.o.b. Yolles Furniture v Penny (December 14, 1977), ESC 466 (Burkett);
- The Cambridge Towel Corporation v Kells (June 5, 1980), ESC 815 (Gorsky);

- Schievan et al v Durham Furniture Co. (AprIL 27, 1994), ESC 94-90 (Randall).

Example:

- Employee hired by A Co. - June 30, 1995
- Trustee in bankruptcy appointed for A Co. - June 30, 2002 (Trustee retains employee)
- Trustee sells business of A Co. to B Co. - December 31, 2002 (B Co. hires employee)
- B Co. terminates employee - June 30, 2003

The employee would not be entitled to termination and severance pay until their termination by B Co. At that time, the employee's length of service for purposes of termination and severance pay would be eight years.

Trustee Does Not Sell Business

In a situation such as the above, but with the difference that there is no sale of the business and the employee is terminated/severed (including a deemed termination/severance resulting from a lay-off), the employee is entitled to termination and severance pay based upon their length of employment with the bankrupt employer (which includes employment with the trustee in bankruptcy). The claim is against the estate of the company, and is made by filing a proof of claim.

Vacation Pay Liabilities in 1 and 2 above

Where the trustee does not sell the business, a proof of claim for the vacation pay relating to the employee's employment with the insolvent employer (both accrued and due) would be filed with the trustee if an employee in such a situation worked for the trustee, any vacation pay relating to the period of employment with the trustee would be paid out of the bankrupt company's estate. Note that these expenses are not, in general, a personal liability of the trustee.

Where the trustee sells the business and s. 9 provides continuity of employment, an employer that purchases a bankrupt business from a trustee will be liable for the vacation pay that accrued while the employee was working for the bankrupt employer provided that the vacation pay has not already have become due under the bankrupt employer. Therefore, the officer may issue an order to pay against the purchaser of the business for vacation pay that accrued during employment with the bankrupt company (including employment with the trustee) but did not become due until sometime after the employee had commenced employment with the purchaser.

Example:

- Employee's vacation pay is due 10 months after completion of each 12 months of employment.
- Employee hired by A Co. (vacation year is based on anniversary date) – June 30, 1998
- Trustee in bankruptcy appointed for A Co. (trustee retains employee) – June 30, 2002*
    - * $2400 in V.P. accrued June 30, 2000, to June 2001 - due on April 30, 2002, but unpaid, plus $2400 in V.P. accrued June 30, 2001, to June 30, 2002, accrued but not due until April 30, 2003
- Trustee sells business of A Co. to B. Co. (Proof of claim filed for $2400 in V.P. for period June 30, 2000 to June 30, 2001) – December 31, 2002
- B Co. hires employee – December 31, 2002

- $2400 V.P. accrued June 2001 to June 2002 is due (10 months after June 30, 2002) – April 30, 2003

In the above-noted example, a proof of claim could be filed with the trustee for $2,400 in vacation pay that had accrued in the period June 30, 2000, to June 30, 2001, and was due April 30, 2002 (i.e., due prior to the appointment of the trustee). On April 30, 2003, the officer could issue an order to pay to B. Co. for the $2400 in vacation pay that accrued while the employee was employed by A. Co. from June 30, 2001, to June 30, 2002, but which came due after the employee commenced employment with B. Co. (The purchaser of the business would also be liable for vacation pay accrued between the date the trustee was appointed (June 30, 2002) and the date of the sale December 31, 2002) but only when that vacation pay came due.

In support of Program policy in this regard, see Sis Cronin, a division of Urus Industrial Corporation v Hurdis (March 21, 1994), ESC 94-69 (Randall).

Foreclosures

Occasionally, a secured creditor will exercise whatever rights they have to foreclose on a debtor employer's business. This typically means that the secured creditor takes the business in satisfaction of the debt rather than hiring a receiver to sell the business. Where this occurs, and the creditor continues to operate the business and retains the debtor's employees, s. 9(1) applies – see Hotel Esquire (St. Catharines) Ltd. v Hands et al. In this case, the secured creditor's position is, for the purposes of s. 9(1), tantamount to that of a purchaser of the business.

Landlord's Right of Distraint

When a landlord exercises a right of distraint on the assets of a tenant/employer to recover arrears of rent, it generally does so by securing control of the equipment, inventory and other assets located in the leased premises. This is done with a view to selling the assets to recover arrears of rent. In such cases, s. 9 will typically have no application. However, if the landlord enters the premises and carries on the operation of the business and retains its previous tenant's employees, it may be considered to be a purchaser of the business as per the discussion on secured creditors above.

Franchise Situations

Generally speaking, s. 9(1) will not apply in the franchise or concession type of situation. Such situations by and large do not involve a transfer of a business directly between the old franchisee and the new franchisee, but rather involve two separate transactions in which the franchise rights held by the old franchisee first revert to the franchisor and then are reconveyed by the franchisor to a new franchisee. There may, in a sense, be a transfer of a business from the original franchisee to the franchisor, followed by a second transfer of a business from the franchisor to the new franchisee, but s. 9(1) cannot apply to these transfers individually unless they are accompanied by a parallel movement of employees. Since the franchisor himself does not usually enter into an employment relationship with the original franchisee's employees in the course of the transactions, there is no basis on which s. 9(1) can be applied, even though those employees may ultimately end up working for the new franchisee.

While the treatment of franchises and concessions in labour law is a rather complicated and difficult matter, the following rule should be of assistance in dealing with these kinds of transactions:

Where employer X has a franchise or some other key contract from franchisor Y, and it gives it up or loses it and a third party Z then acquires the franchise or other key contract and hires X's employees, s. 9(1) will not apply, unless:

- X transferred the franchise directly to Z (as opposed to Y taking back the franchise and the reassigning it to Z); or
- Y, when taking back the franchise from X, hired X's employees before reassigning the franchise to Z (who hired the employees in turn).

A typical example of a franchise operation is a service station; the station operator (X) acquires from an oil company (Y) the right to sell its product and to display its name. The oil companies usually will not permit station operators to sell the franchise; instead, the operator will have to give it up, and the oil company itself will sell the franchise to a new franchisee (Z). Generally, the oil company will not enter into an employment relationship with X's employees, and while usually there would be no need for them to do so (since Z will probably take over from X with virtually no interruption in the activity of the service station), the fact that the oil company does not hire X's employees means that there is no basis on which s. 9(1) can be applied.

The opinion of most referees has been that where there is no direct assignment of the contract (franchise) from the original contractor (old franchisee) to the third party (new franchisee), there is no sale of a business to which s. 9(1) can apply, and hence, there is no continuity of employment.

In Burbank Automotive Ltd. v Wilson (March 21, 1978), ESC 493 (Davis), X had carried on business as a service station operator, but retired, terminating both his lease of the station premises from Shell Oil and his product supply and exclusive marketing contracts, also with Shell. Immediately upon termination, Shell gave a new lease to Z and entered into similar supply and marketing agreements with Z, who employed all of X's former employees. The only transaction directly between X and Z was the sale of a truck and some stock in trade. Referee Davis held that this small isolated transaction could not be viewed as a sale of a business between X and Z, and went on to conclude that the business must be seen as having first been transferred from X to Shell and then from Shell to Z. Shell was the owner of the business for a notional instant in time, and the transfer of the business from X to Shell (not having been accompanied by a corresponding transfer of employees to Shell) effected a termination, even if there was, practically speaking, no interruption in employment.

Results similar to those in Burbank Automotive Ltd. v Wilson were obtained in Phil Coutu Limited v Talbot (September 30, 1982), ESC 1294 (Davis) and Cecil B. Carter o/a Shell Service Centre v Walker (February 28, 1981) ESC 957 (Saltman). The only ruling by a referee in which s. 13(2), which corresponds to s. 9(1) in the ESA 2000, was held to be applicable in these circumstances was Joe Hinschberger c.o.b. Joe's Gulf v Spicer (March 4, 1982), ESC 1161 (Hunter), which, for a number of reasons, is not considered by the Branch to be convincing counter-authority to the Burbank Automotive decision.

In conclusion, it is difficult to see how, in its present wording, s. 9(1) can be interpreted to apply to a supposed sale which is actually a two-stage transfer (from X to Y to Z), and in which Y does not employ X's employees, even though they are employed by Z. Accordingly, the current policy of the Program in such cases is that there is no continuity of employment, and when X discontinues its operation of the business, a termination of employment occurs. Note, however, that s. 9(1) will apply where Y does hire X's employees, or where X assigns the key contract directly to Z.

Determining whether Employees of the Seller are Employed by the Purchaser

In addition to the requirement that there be a sale of a business in order for s. 9(1) to operate, there must also be a purchaser who employs an employee of the seller. Subsection 9(1) does not have the effect of obligating the purchaser of a business to hire the seller's employees. If the purchaser does not hire the employees, s. 9(1) has no application.

It should also be noted that if the purchaser opts to hire the seller's employees, s. 9(1) does not require that the purchaser hire the employees on the same terms and conditions of employment as the seller had offered. Subsection 9(1) would apply to provide the employees with continuity of employment even though the purchaser hired the seller's employees at a wage rate lower than that which they had been earning in the seller's employ.

There are several referee and adjudicator decisions which state that s. 13 of the former Employment Standards Act (now s. 9) does not apply where the purchaser employs the employees on terms that are "radically different" from those which the employees had with the vendor, e.g., Berdan et al v Dunlop Construction Products Inc. (June 18, 1993) ES 93-117 (Muir). However, these are contrary to Program policy and should not be followed on this particular point.

Program policy is that if the purchaser does employ the employees of the seller, it cannot avoid the application of s. 9(1) by relying on any of the following:

1. The employee signed an application for employment and went through a selection process, including an interview.
2. The employee is working under entirely new terms and conditions of employment.
3. The employee has acknowledged, in writing or otherwise, that this is a new contract of employment with no seniority carried forward.

The provision of continuity of employment for certain purposes of the ESA 2000, and the purchaser's obligation to honour it, is an employment standard which cannot be contracted out of or waived by either the employee or employer or their representatives.

As previously mentioned, the fact that an employee is employed by the purchaser in a different position than they held with the vendor does not prevent s. 9(1) from operating. In T.A.S. Investments Limited v Kleinert (April 20, 1978), ESC 508 (Springate), continuity was held to flow through regardless of the fact that the employee was employed by the vendor as a store manager but was only employed by the purchaser to maintain the store's financial and payroll records. Likewise, if the purchaser employed the employee on a "term or task" basis, there will still be continuity of employment under s. 9(1). Note that there is one adjudicator's decision to the contrary on that point – see Penrose et al v Maher Inc. in Bankruptcy c/o Ernst & Young Inc. (August 24, 1994), ESC 94-155 (Wacyk).

On the other hand, there is nothing that obliges the employee to accept employment with the purchaser, even if that employment is exactly the same position with identical terms and conditions of employment. The employee always has the option of rejecting the purchaser's offer of employment, and treating the vendor's sale of the business as a termination and severance of employment.

Referee Davis in Galante c.o.b. as Fredy's Barber Shop v Shaw (January 13, 1982) ESC 1125 (Davis) upheld this option, although with no express reference to s. 13(2) of the former *Employment Standards Act, which corresponds to s. 9 in the ESA 2000. In that case, the owner of a business had decided to sell it but did not inform his employees of the impending sale. He planned to announce it to them at the closing, at which time he was going to give them termination pay. As he was about to make the announcement, one of the employees, who had heard that there was to be a sale and felt that the purchaser of the business would be unlikely to hire him, lamented that there would be no work for him and announced that he was "leaving". The employer argued that he was not liable for termination pay because the employee had quit, but the referee held that the employee lacked this intention and had left because he had concluded that his employment was being terminated by the sale. The employer's contention that he should not be ordered to pay termination pay, because the employee's abrupt departure had precluded him from putting forward employment alternatives (such as employment by the purchaser or by the vendor at a different location) for the employee's consideration, was rejected on the grounds that these alternatives represented not a continuation of the existing employment relationship, but the formation of a new employment relationship.

In order for there to have been "employment by the purchaser", it is not necessary for the purchaser of a business to make an express statement offering employment to the seller's employees. It is enough that the purchaser knowingly allows the employees to continue working in the business following the sale. However, this rule should not be applied too narrowly. Where, for example, a sale of a business occurs during an employee's shift, the purchaser will not be considered to have employed the employee for the purposes of s. 9(1) merely because the employee works through to the end of his shift, if the business is such that termination at the precise moment of the sale would be impractical and if the employee never enters into any agreement with the purchaser and performs no further work for them. See the decision of Agincourt Motor Hotel Limited v Flannigan et al (August 19, 1982), ESC 1272 (Davis).

Other Issues

Purported Termination by Seller

In Ontario (Employment Standards Officer) v Equitable Management Ltd. (Div Ct), 1990 CanLII 6973 (ON SC) the Divisional Court held that s. 13(2) of the former Employment Standards Act, which corresponds to s. 9 in the ESA 2000, applied even if the seller gave notice of termination. This decision accords with the intent of the continuity provisions, which is to ensure that credit for an employees' past employment with the seller is not lost when they are hired by the purchaser, subject to the rules regarding a gap between employment with the seller and employment with the purchaser in s. 9(2). It is Program policy that the employee also retains credit of their past employment with the seller where the seller, instead of giving notice of termination, gives pay in lieu of notice.

Termination and Severance Liabilities where Purchaser Does Not Employ Employee of Seller

In the case of a sale of a business where an employee terminated by the seller is not hired by the purchaser within the 13-week period set out in s. 9(2), the seller must comply with Part XV, that is, must provide proper notice of termination or pay in lieu thereof, and severance pay, where applicable.

It is important to note that s. 9:

1. Does not obligate the purchaser of the business to hire the seller's employees; and
2. Allows the employee to reject an offer of employment from the purchaser and to instead treat the sale of the business as a termination by the seller.

The purchaser is not obligated to hire the seller's employees whether they are currently working, on lay-off, sick leave, a leave of absence or workers' compensation.

The employee is under no obligation under the ESA 2000 to accept employment with the purchaser and their refusal does not disentitle them to termination notice, or pay in lieu or severance pay. This is so even if the purchaser is offering the same terms of employment or reasonable alternative employment.

It sometimes happens that the sale contract between the seller and the purchaser will contain a provision obligating the purchaser to offer employment to some or all of the seller's employees. However, if the seller, relying on the contract, does not provide notice of termination to its employees but the purchaser does not end up making an offer after all, it is the seller who is responsible for the termination pay and severance pay, since it is the one who terminated and severed its employees' employment. There is no basis in the ESA 2000 for holding the purchaser liable, despite what was in the sale contract, although the seller may be able to sue the purchaser civilly.

Termination and Severance Liabilities where Purchaser Employs Seller's Employees and Terminates/Severs

Where a purchaser does employ the seller's employees following a sale in accordance with s. 9 but later terminates their employment, there is no pro rata division of liability for termination pay between the seller and purchaser. The subsequent responsibility for complying with Part XV requirements based on length of employment with both the seller and the purchaser lies solely with the purchaser.

Further, the purchaser is not entitled to any credit for termination pay or notice of termination that was previously paid or provided by the seller at the time of the sale. However, if the seller had paid severance pay at the time the employees lost their employment with it, that amount may be offset against the purchaser's subsequent liability as a contractual payment based on length of employment or seniority per paragraph 3 of s. 65(8).

Exception – s. 9(2)

9(2) Subsection (1) does not apply if the day on which the purchaser hires the employee is more than 13 weeks after the earlier of his or her last day of employment with the seller and the day of the sale.

While in many sale situations, the employee's first day of employment with the purchaser will follow immediately after their last day of employment with the seller, there will also be situations where there are short interruptions in employment. Section 9(2) provides, in effect, that s. 9(1) will apply only if no more than 13 weeks separates the first day of employment with the purchaser and the earlier of:

1. The employee's last day of employment with the seller; or
2. The day of the sale.

The term "last day of employment with the seller" simply means the last day on which the employee is employed by the seller for purposes of the ESA 2000. Bearing in mind that both active and inactive employment counts as employment for purposes of ESA Part XV, s. 59(1) and ESA Part XV, s. 65(2), this includes time spent on lay-off up to the point at which a termination or severance is triggered. Note that for purposes of s. 9(2), the first day of the lay-off is not considered the last day of employment with the seller. While some might argue that it should be so considered because of s. 56(5), which deems the first day of a lay-off that ends in termination to be the day on which the employee's employment is terminated, this argument ignores the fact that s. 9(2) refers to the last day of employment, not the day on which the employee's employment was deemed terminated; it also ignores the fact that s. 9(2) applies for all rights under the ESA 2000 that depend on how long an employee has been employed and not just for purposes of notice of termination or termination pay in lieu.

If an employee on lay-off is potentially entitled to both termination pay and severance pay, their last day of employment will be considered, for purposes of s. 9(2), to be the later of: (1) the day on which a termination is triggered, and (2) the day on which a severance is triggered. For example, if an employee who is potentially entitled to both termination pay and severance pay is put on lay-off and benefits are not maintained and none of the other conditions described in ESA Part XV, ss. 56(2)(b) or (c) are met, their employment is considered terminated once more than 13 weeks have passed, and severed once 35 weeks had passed. For purposes of s. 9(2), therefore, their last day of employment is considered to be the final day of the 35th week; if the purchaser hired the employee within 13 weeks of the earlier of that day and the day of the sale, there would be continuity insofar as any subsequent calculation of length of employment or period of employment was concerned.

If the employee did not have a potential entitlement to severance pay, for example, because they would not have accumulated five years of employment with the employer in total as of the end of 35 weeks of lay-off, or because their employer did not have a payroll of at least $2.5 million, the last day of employment would be considered to be the final day of the 13th week of lay-off; if the purchaser hired the employee within 13 weeks of the earlier of that day and the day of the sale, there would be continuity insofar as any subsequent calculation of length of employment or period of employment was concerned.

Example 1:

- If an employee were laid off one week before the date of the sale and the lay-off ceased to be temporary 13 weeks later (and assuming the seller had no severance obligations with respect to the employee), the employee's last day of employment would be 12 weeks after the date of the sale.
- In this case, employee continued to be employed (i.e., was on a temporary lay-off) with the seller of the date of the sale. In order to trigger the continuity of employment obligations in s. 9, the purchaser would have to hire the seller's employee within 13 weeks of the sale date.

Example 2:

- Employee A is placed on temporary lay-off 20 weeks before the date of the sale and ceased to be on temporary lay-off for notice of termination purposes seven weeks before the date of the sale but continued to be on lay-off for severance purposes until 15 weeks after the sale date.
- In this case, the employee continued to be employed (i.e., was on a lay-off that had not yet resulted in severance) with the seller as of the date of the sale. In order to trigger the continuity of employment obligations in s. 9, the purchaser would have to hire the seller's employee within 13 weeks of the sale date.

It should also be noted that the deemed termination date as set out in ESA Part XV, s. 56(5) has no application with respect to any subsequent liability a purchaser may have for notice or termination pay where there is continuity of employment under s. 9, because under s. 9(1), the employment would be deemed not to have been terminated at the time of the sale, even if the employee was not hired by the purchaser until after the lay-off had exceeded the period of a temporary lay-off.

Example:

- Employer A sells business to employer B on June 14, 2012.
- A's employee is laid off on June 7, one week before the sale date.
- Temporary lay-off for notice of termination purposes ends September 6, the day on which the employee has been on lay-off for more than 13 weeks, 12 weeks after the sale date.
- Pursuant to s. 56(5), the employee's employment would be deemed to be terminated on June 7, the first day of lay-off.
- However, for the purposes of s. 9, A's last day of employment is considered to be September 6.

- Section 9(1) applies because employer B hired the employee on or before September 13, the date that is 13 weeks after the earlier of (1) the last day of employment with the seller and (2) the day of the sale.
- Employer B subsequently terminates the employee's employment.
- Under s. 9(1), the employee's employment was deemed not to have been terminated by employer A and the employee's employment with employer A is attributed to employer B.

Definitions – s. 9(3)

9(3) In this section, "sells", includes leases, transfers or disposes of in any other manner, and "sale" has a corresponding meaning.

This is an inclusive definition, giving sale a broader meaning than it has in normal usage. For example, a sale would not normally include a transfer of a business by way of a gift or inheritance. However, since this section defines a sale to include "transfers or any other manner of disposition", such a transfer would be considered a sale for the purposes of s. 9.

However, a "contracting out" (or "contracting in") of services, without more, is not usually considered a sale, even within the meaning of the expanded definition in s. 9. The contracting in/out of services is distinguished from a sale of business because the former typically involves simply a change in the way in which some function ancillary to the business is carried out rather than anything that could be said to amount to the transfer of a business or a part of a business. For example, if a retail employer had in the past provided its security staff with in-house self-defence training and subsequently engaged a private company to provide that training; it would be characterized as a "contracting out of services" rather than a sale.

It is important to note that determining whether what has taken place is a sale of business (or part of a business) or is instead merely a contracting out or contracting in is very much a fact-specific determination. See, for example, the discussion of the Abbott v Bombardier Inc.

Predecessor Acts – s. 9(4)

9(4) For the purposes of subsection (1), employment with the seller includes any employment attributed to the seller under this section or a provision of a predecessor Act dealing with sales of businesses.

Section 9(4) ensures the flow-through of length or period of employment attributed to a seller under the provisions of the current ESA 2000 or former Employment Standards Act.

Example:

- Employee hired by Corporation A - September 1, 1990
- Corporation A sells business to Corporation B – January 1, 1994
- Employee is hired by Corporation B – January 1, 1994
- Corporation B sells business to Corporation C – January 1, 2002
- Employee is hired by Corporation C – January 1, 2002
- Corporation C sells business to Corporation D – January 1, 2006

- Employee hired by Corporation D – January 1, 2006

In this example, pursuant to s. 9(4), the employee's employment with corporations A, B and C will be treated as if it was employment with corporation D for purposes of those rights under the ESA 2000 that depend on period or length of employment.

This is because under the former Employment Standards Act, the sale from A to B and B's hiring of the employee resulted in the employee's employment with A being attributed to B. The sale from B to C and C's hiring of the employee occurred after the current Act had come into force, and it resulted in the employment with B – including employment with A that was attributed to B under the former Employment Standards Act – being attributed to C. Likewise, the sale from C to D and D's hiring of the employee resulted in the employment with C – including employment with A and B that was attributed to C – being attributed to D.

ESA Part IV Section 10 - New Building Services Provider

New Building Services Provider – s. 10(1)

10(1) This section applies if the building services provider for a building is replaced by a new provider and an employee of the replaced provider is employed by the new provider.

This provision is similar to ss. 13.1(2) and 13.1(3) in the former Employment Standards Act. It defines the circumstances in which s. 10 will provide continuity of employment when a provider of building services is replaced by a new provider and the new provider employs any of the replaced provider's employees (subject to the rules regarding a hiatus or gap, s. 10(3)).

Definitions

The terms "building services" and "building services provider" are defined in s. 1(1) of the ESA 2000 as follows:

Building Services

1(1) "building services" means services for a building with respect to food, security and cleaning and any prescribed services for a building;

The definition of building services must be read in conjunction with s. 1 of O Reg 287/01, which prescribes additional "building services":

The following are prescribed as services for a building for the purposes of the definition of "building services" in s. 1 (1) of the Act:

1. Services that are intended to relate only to the building and its occupants and visitors with respect to,

i. a parking garage or parking lot, and

ii. a concession stand.

2. Property management services that are intended to relate only to the building.

Building Services Provider

1(1) "building services provider" or "provider" means a person who provides building services for the premises and includes the owner or manager of a premises if the owner or manager provides building services for premises the person owns or manages.

These terms are discussed in more detail in ESA Part I, s. 1 and O Reg 287/01 of the Manual with respect to the termination and severance obligations of building services providers in Part XIX of the ESA 2000 (Building Service Providers) when employees of a replaced provider are not hired by the new provider.

Section 10(1) applies to provide continuity of employment if the following criteria are met:

1. The former building services provider is replaced by a new provider; and
2. An employee of the replaced provider is employed by the new provider.
    - This criterion is met if any employee of the replaced provider is employed by the new provider, including, for example, employees such as office managers who worked only at the replaced provider's head office. In other words, s. 10 is not restricted in its application only to those employees who were engaged in actually providing building services.
    - This is to be contrasted with s. 75, which establishes a special rule regarding termination pay and severance pay liabilities where there is job loss in the context of a change in building service provider: s. 75 applies only to an "employee of the replaced provider who is engaged in providing services at the premises and whom the new provider does not employ." See Betts v Brookfield Lepage Johnson Controls Facility Management Services Ltd., 2007 CanLII 12199 (ON LRB).

Application

1. The Former Building Services Provider is Replaced

Section 10 applies where a building services provider stops providing services to a building and is "replaced" by a new provider. In order to "replace" the former building services provider, the two providers must be providing the same general category of building services at the premises. If, for example, a building owner discontinued its food service contract with A and contemporaneously entered into a security services contract with B, it would be difficult to see how B could be said to be "replacing" A at the premises.

2. An Employee of the Replaced Provider is Employed by the New Provider

As noted above, s. 10 will apply to create continuity of employment only if the new provider hires an employee of the replaced provider (subject to the time limits in s. 10(3)). One issue that arises is how s. 10 applies if either the replaced provider or the new providers falls under federal jurisdiction:

i. If the new provider is under federal labour jurisdiction, e.g., a bank, and contracts in services that were previously contracted out, does s. 10 apply?

Section 10 does not apply. The ESA 2000 only applies to employees and their employers (both replaced and new providers) who are provincially regulated, s. 3(2). Therefore, the new provider would not be required to consider the employee's length or period of employment with the replaced provider.

ii. What happens if the replaced provider is under federal labour jurisdiction and contracts the work out to a new provider under provincial labour jurisdiction?

Again, s. 10 does not apply because employment with an employer under federal jurisdiction would not be attributable to the new provider. This may arise as the reverse of the situation described above, e.g., where a bank (which is under federal labour jurisdiction) uses its own in-house staff to perform security services, but then contracts out those services to a security company.

See Rostrust Investments Inc./Investissements Rostrust Inc. v Doxtater, 2006 CanLII 41431 (ON LRB) in which the Board concluded that the continuity of employment provisions in the ESA 2000 did not apply where the former provider (Rostrust Investments Inc.) fell under provincial jurisdiction and the new provider (Public Works and Government Services Canada) fell under federal jurisdiction on the basis that s. 3(2) of the ESA 2000 specifically provides that the ESA 2000 does not apply if the employment relationship is within the jurisdiction of the federal government.

No Termination or Severance – s. 10(2)

10(2) The employment of the employee shall be deemed not to have been terminated or severed for the purposes of this Act and his or her employment with the replaced provider shall be deemed to have been employment with the new provider for the purpose of any subsequent calculation of the employee's length or period of employment.

Section 10(2) provides for "continuity of employment" for an employee when there is a change in the provider of building services at a building if the new provider employs an employee of the replaced provider (subject to the s. 10(3) rules regarding a gap between employment with the new provider and the earlier of: (1) the last day of employment with the replaced provider and (2) the date the new provider began servicing the premises). In that case, the employee is deemed not to have had his or her employment terminated or severed for the purposes of the Act and employment with the replaced provider is included in any subsequent calculation of length or period of employment with the new provider for entitlements to:

1. Vacation: Employees whose period of employment is less than five years are entitled to two weeks of vacation with pay upon completion of each 12-month vacation entitlement year - s. 33(1)(a) and employees whose period of employment is five years or more are entitled to three weeks of vacation with pay upon completion of each 12-month vacation entitlement year;
2. Pregnancy leave: An employee may be entitled to pregnancy leave if their due date is at 13 weeks after the date they commenced employment – s. 46(1);
3. Parental leave: Employees may be entitled to parental leave if they have been employed at least 13 weeks prior to commencing the leave – s. 48(1);
4. Organ donor leave: Employees may be entitled to organ donor leave if they have been employed at least 13 weeks prior to commencing the leave – s. 49.2(3);
5. Reservist leave: Employees may be entitled to reservist leave if they have been employed at least six consecutive months prior to commencing the leave – s. 50.2(3);
6. Critical Illness Leave: Employees may be entitled to critical illness leave if they have been employed for at least six consecutive months prior to commencing the leave – s. 49.4(2) and (5);
7. Domestic or Sexual Violence Leave: Employees may be entitled to domestic or sexual violence leave if they have been employed for at least 13 consecutive weeks prior to commencing the leave: s. 49.7(2);

8. Crime-Related Child Disappearance Leave: Employees may be entitled to crime-related child disappearance leave if they have been employed for at least six consecutive months prior to commencing the leave – s. 49.6(2);
9. Child Death Leave: Employees may be entitled to child death leave if they have been employed for at least six consecutive months prior to commencing the leave – s. 49.5(2);
10. Written notice of termination or pay in lieu:
    - Employees may be entitled to notice or pay in lieu (including mass notice, s. 58) if they have been employed for at least three months – s. 54; [See the discussion in the Manual at section 9.2.1 regarding the impact of s. 10 on eligibility for termination entitlements];
    - Entitlement to one to eight weeks of notice or pay in lieu depends on length of employment – s. 57;
11. Severance pay:
    - Employees may be entitled to severance pay if they have been employed for at least five years – s. 64;
    - Entitlement to up to 26 weeks of severance pay depends on length of employment – s. 65.

Vacation

The Program's policy is that the employee's length of service, for vacation with pay purposes, flows through from the replaced provider to the new provider. However, the liability for accrued vacation pay does not. This is because s. 76 of the Act requires building services providers who cease providing services at a premises, and who terminate the employment of an employee, to pay the employee all his or her accrued vacation pay (whether it was otherwise due or not) no later than the later of seven days after the termination of employment or on what would have been the employee's next pay day.

An exception to the flow-through rule, as it applies to length of service, occurs if the new building services provider for a building hires the employee more than 13 weeks after the earlier of the employee's last day of employment with the replaced provider and the day on which the new provider began servicing the premises. In this situation, the new provider is not required to recognize the employee's length of service with the replaced provider, for the purposes of determining the employee's entitlements to vacation under Part XI.

For a detailed discussion of the application of s. 76 see Part XIX, s. 76.

Part XIV Leaves of Absence

In addition to the information above regarding statutory leaves, it is important to note that there is nothing in s. 10 that would require a new building service provider to hire any employee of the replaced provider, including an employee of the replaced provider who was on a statutory leave at the time the new provider began providing services at the premises. In most cases however, where the new provider does not make a reasonable offer of employment to employees of the replaced provider, the new provider must comply with the notice and severance obligations under the Act with respect to those employees – see ESA Part XIX, s. 75. This would apply equally to employees who were on a statutory leave at the time. See ESA Part XIV, s. 53 for a discussion of rights to notice for employees who are legitimately terminated while on leave.

Termination Unrelated to Change in Providers

Where an employee's employment is terminated and severed prior to the change of providers and for reasons unrelated to that change, the question may arise as to whether s. 10 would apply. Because the purpose of s. 10 is to "undo" a common-law termination that would otherwise be triggered by the change of providers, it is the position of the Program that s. 10(2) does not apply where the termination or severance is not related in any way to the change. Thus, for example, if an employee's employment was terminated by the replaced provider for wilful misconduct but they were hired by the new provider, s. 10(2) would not apply.

Exception – s. 10(3)

10(3) Subsection (2) does not apply if the day on which the new provider hires the employee is more than 13 weeks after the earlier of his or her last day of employment with the replaced provider and the day on which the new provider began servicing the premises.

While in many "change of provider" situations, the employee's first day of employment with the new provider will follow immediately after his or her last day of employment with the replaced provider, there will also be situations where there are short interruptions in employment. Section 10(3) provides, in effect, that s. 10(2) will apply only if no more than 13 weeks separate the first day of employment with the new provider and the earlier of:

1. The employee's last day of employment with the replaced provider; and
2. The day on which the new provider began servicing the premises.

The term "last day of employment with the replaced provider" simply means the last day on which the employee is employed by the replaced provider for purposes of the ESA 2000. Bearing in mind that both active and inactive employment counts as employment for purposes of the ESA 2000 [see s. 59(1) and s. 65(2)], this will include time spent on lay-off up to the point at which a termination or severance would be triggered.

Note that for purposes of s. 10(3), the first day of the lay-off would not be considered the last day of employment with the seller. While some might argue that it should be so considered because of s. 56(5), which deems the first day of a lay-off that ends in termination to be the day on which the employee's employment is terminated, this argument ignores the fact that s. 10(3) refers to "the last day of employment", not "the day on which the employee's employment was deemed terminated"; it also ignores the fact that s. 10(2) applies for all rights under the Act that depend on how long an employee has been employed and not just for purposes of notice of termination or termination pay in lieu.

If an employee on lay-off is potentially entitled to both termination pay and severance pay, his or her last day of employment will be considered, for purposes of s. 10(3), to be the later of (a) the day on which a termination would be triggered and (b) the day on which a severance would be triggered. For example, if an employee potentially entitled to both termination pay and severance pay is put on lay-off and benefits are not maintained and none of the other conditions described in clauses 56(2)(b) or (c) of the Act are met, his or her employment would be considered terminated once more than 13 weeks had passed, and severed once 35 weeks had passed. For purposes of s. 10(3), therefore, his or her "last day of employment with the replaced provider" would be considered to be the final day of the 35th week; if the new provider hired the employee within 13 weeks of the earlier of that day and the day of the sale, there would be continuity insofar as any subsequent calculation of length of employment or period of employment was concerned.

If the employee did not have a potential entitlement to severance pay (say, because they would not have accumulated five years of employment with the employer in total as of the end of 35 weeks of lay-off, or because his or her employer did not have a payroll of at least $2.5 million) the "last day of employment" would be considered to be the final day of the 13th week of lay-off; if the new provider hired the employee within 13 weeks of the earlier of that day and the day on which the new provider began servicing the premises there would be continuity insofar as any subsequent calculation of length of employment or period of employment was concerned.

Example 1:

- If an employee were laid off one week before the changeover date and the lay-off ceased to be temporary 13 weeks later (and assuming the replaced provider had no severance obligations with respect to the employee), the employee's last day of employment would be 12 weeks after the changeover date.
- In this case, employee continued to be employed (i.e., was on a temporary lay-off) with the replaced provider as of the changeover date. In order to trigger the continuity of employment obligations in s. 10, the new provider would have to hire the employee of the replaced provider within 13 weeks of the changeover date.

Example 2:

- Employee A is placed on temporary lay-off 20 weeks before the changeover date and ceased to be on temporary lay-off for notice of termination purposes seven weeks before the changeover date but continued to be on lay-off for severance purposes until 15 weeks after the changeover date.
- In this case, the employee continued to be employed i.e., was on a lay-off that had not yet resulted in severance) with the replaced provider as of the changeover date. In order to trigger the continuity of employment obligations in s. 10, the new provider would have to hire the employee of the replaced provider within 13 weeks of the changeover date.

It should also be noted that the deemed termination date as set out in s. 56(5) has no application on any subsequent liability a new provider may have for notice or termination pay where there is continuity of employment under s. 10, because under s. 10(2), the employment would be deemed not to have been terminated, even if the employee was not hired by the new provider until after the lay-off had exceeded the period of a temporary lay-off. For example:

- Employer A loses contract for building services to employer B.
- Changeover date is June 14, 2002.
- A's employee is laid off one week before the changeover date (June 7). Temporary lay-off for notice of termination purposes ends September 6 (the point at which the employee has been on lay-off for more than 13 weeks), 12 weeks after the changeover date). Pursuant to s. 56(5) the employee's employment would be deemed to be terminated on first day of lay-off (June 7).
- However, A's last day of employment is considered to be September 6 for the purposes of s. 10.
- Section 10(2) applies because employer B hired the employee on or before September 13, the date that is13 weeks after the earlier of (1) the last day of employment with the replaced provider and (2) the changeover date).

- Employer B subsequently terminates the employee. Under s. 10(2), the employee was deemed not to have been terminated by employer A and the employee's employment with employer A is attributed to employer B.

Predecessor Acts – s. 10(4)

10(4) For the purposes of subsection (2), employment with the replaced provider includes any employment attributed to the replaced provider under this section or under a provision of a predecessor Act dealing with building services providers.

This provision was introduced with the ESA 2000. Section 10(4) ensures the flow-through of length or period of employment attributed to a replaced provider under the provisions of the ESA 2000 or the former Employment Standards Act. (The first continuity of employment provision in the context of building service providers was proclaimed into force on January 1, 1993, but it applied in respect of changes in providers that occurred after June 4, 1992.)

Example:

- Provider A hires employee on September 1, 1990
- Provider B takes over contract, and hires employee on January 1, 1994
- Provider C takes over contract and hires employee on January 1, 2002
- Provider D takes over contract and hires employee on January 1, 2006

In this example, pursuant to s. 10(4), the employee's employment with contractors A, B and C will be treated as if it was employment with contractor D for purposes of those rights under the Act that depend on length or period of employment.

Note: Under the former Employment Standards Act, the change in providers from A to B and B's hiring of the employee resulted in the employee's employment with A being attributed to B, because the change occurred after June 4, 1992. The changeover from B to C and C's hiring of the employee occurred after the current Act had come into force, and it resulted in the employment with B, including employment with A that was attributed to B under the former Act, being attributed to C. Likewise, the changeover from C to D and D's hiring of the employee resulted in the employment with C, including employment with A and B that was attributed to C, being attributed to D.

ESA Part V - Payment of Wages

Part V of the Employment Standards Act, 2000 (Payment of Wages) is intended to ensure that employees receive wages for work performed. This Part regulates the payment, manner and place of payment of wages, deductions from wages, and the priority of wage claims over other unsecured creditors. It also establishes obligations with respect to the provision of statements of wages and outlines the information required on such statements.

The provisions regarding vacation statement obligations previously contained in s. 12(1)(d) of this Part of the ESA 2000 were repealed by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18, which came into force on November 26, 2002. They were replaced with new vacation statement obligations set out in s. 41.1 of Part XI (Vacation with Pay).

Lastly, a new requirement to provide a statement of wages paid when employment ends was added by the GEA 2002 (s. 12.1 (new)).

ESA Part V Section 11 – Payment of Wages

Payment of Wages - s. 11(1)

11(1) An employer shall establish a recurring pay period and a recurring pay day and shall pay all wages earned during each pay period, other than accruing vacation pay, no later than the pay day for that period.

Subsection 11(1) requires employers to:

- Establish regular pay periods and pay days, and
- Pay all wages earned in each pay period no later than the pay day associated with the pay period.

The regular pay day could be weekly, bi-weekly, semi-monthly, monthly or any specified period. An employer may establish different recurring pay days for different employees, and for different components of the wage package, e.g., sales commissions, overtime.

Floating Pay Days

The question has arisen as to whether an employer is in compliance with s. 11 where the contract establishes a recurring pay day but further provides that if that recurring day should fall on a weekend or a statutory holiday that the following business day is considered the recurring pay day. The Program's position is that s. 11 requires the establishment of a fixed period of time and a fixed date upon which an employee can expect to receive wages earned within the fixed period of time. The contract provision described above has the effect of creating a floating pay day that puts employees at a disadvantage as they are required to wait in certain cases for a longer period of time before receiving the wages earned in the pay period. As a consequence, Program policy is that such a contract is not in accord with the requirement in s. 11 to create a recurring pay day.

Payment Under an Overtime Averaging Arrangement

The question has arisen as to how an employer is required to pay wages to an employee who is subject to an overtime averaging arrangement: is the employer required to pay the employee straight time for every hour worked within the pay period - including those over 44 - and postpone paying only the extra "half" of any overtime pay owing until the averaging period has ended? Or is the employer required to pay straight time only up to 44 hours a week and can postpone paying the entire time-and-a-half for any overtime pay owing until after the averaging period has ended?

It is Program policy that the employer is required to pay the employee straight time for each hour worked within the pay period, including those hours over 44 and then pay the extra half of any overtime pay owing after the averaging period has ended.

For example, pursuant to ESA Part VIII, s. 22, an employee's hours of work are averaged over four work weeks and works the following hours:

- Week 1 - 56 hours

- Week 2 - 43 hours
- Week 3 - 35 hours
- Week 4 - 46 hours

Assume the employee has a weekly pay period and is subject to an overtime threshold of 44 hours.

The employee worked, on average, one hour of overtime in each week.

The employer is required to pay the employee:

- For the pay period that covers week 1: 56 hours at straight time;
- For the pay period that covers week 2: 43 hours at straight time;
- For the pay period that covers week 3: 35 hours at straight time;
- For the pay period that covers week 4: 46 hours at straight time and 4 hours at 0.5 of the employee's regular rate.

Changing the Pay Day

The requirement to establish a recurring pay period and pay day does not prevent the employer from subsequently establishing a new and different pay period or associated pay day. It should be noted, however, that in some situations such a change, if it is a substantial change in the terms and conditions of employment or a breach of a fundamental term of the employment contract, may constitute a constructive dismissal and thus potentially be a termination and a severance of employment.

Monetary Entitlements under the Employment Contract

If a contract establishes an entitlement that falls within the definition of wages, that entitlement can be enforced through s. 11, even if there would otherwise be no entitlement under the ESA 2000. For example, if an employee was exempt from overtime pay under the ESA 2000 but the contract provided for overtime pay (e.g., a premium rate to be paid once the employee worked a certain number of hours), any unpaid contractual overtime pay would be enforceable as unpaid wages under s. 11.

It is essential, for assessment or enforcement purposes, to review the terms of employment to ensure that the wages in question are earned during the pay period. For example, in the area of sales commissions or bonuses, innumerable variations exist on when in fact they are considered to have been earned and therefore due to be paid.

OHSA-related Meetings

In Ingersoll Machine & Tool Co. Ltd. v Griffin et al (August 9, 1982), ESC 1263 (Picher), Referee Picher ruled that where the former Occupational Health and Safety Act required the employer to pay employees for attendance at joint health and safety committee meetings under that Act, such payment could be enforced as wages under the predecessor provision to s. 11(1) in the former Employment Standards Act, on the basis that rights under statutes other than the Act were incorporated into the contract of employment. Note that the current Occupational Health and Safety Act, RSO 1990, c O.1 continues to provide employees with the right to be paid for time associated with such meetings and therefore such wages are likewise recoverable under the ESA 2000.

Payment for Time for Voting

Under the Municipal Elections Act, 1996, SO 1996, c 32, and the Election Act, RSO 1990, c E.6, an employee who is qualified to vote has the right to three consecutive hours for the purpose of voting during the period the polls are open. Those acts do not require the employer to give employees three hours off during working hours, but if an employee's working hours are such that the employee does not have three consecutive hours outside of their shift during the period the polls are open, the employer must give the employee time off to ensure that they do have three consecutive hours to vote. Both statutes require the employer to pay the employee for such time off work. Under ESA Part I, s. 1, wages are defined to include "monetary remuneration payable by an employer to an employee under the terms of an employment contract, oral or written, express or implied." The Program's position is that the right to any paid time off to vote is a statutory term of the employment contract and that payment can accordingly be enforced as wages under s. 11.

Method of Payment – s. 11(2)

11(2) An employer shall pay an employee's wages,

- a) by cash;
- b) by cheque payable only to the employee; or
- c) by direct deposit in accordance with subsection (4); or
- d) by any other prescribed method of payment.

This section requires payment of all wages in cash, by cheque, direct deposit in accordance with s. 11(4) and any other prescribed method of payment.

Payment of wages is to be made in cash (legal tender in Canada) or by cheque that is negotiable for legal tender. If payment is made by cheque, the cheque must be payable only to the employee. If payment is made by direct deposit, the payment must be made to an account in the employee's name to which only the employee and persons authorized by the employee have access. In addition, the account must be in an office or facility of a financial institution that is a reasonable distance from the employee's workplace unless otherwise agreed to by the employee, see s. 11(4). There are currently no additional methods of payment prescribed by regulation.

There is nothing to prevent an employment contract providing for additional non-wage forms of compensation, e.g., food, bus or subway tickets or merchandise to an agreed value, provided the employment standards (e.g., minimum wage standards) have been met. However, note that benefits such as transportation, food, bonuses or other assistance could not replace the required payment of wages by cash, by cheque or by direct deposit. See Peter Muscat General Contracting v Buttigieg (September 7, 1978), ESC 543 (Davis). Also note that the enforcement of non-wage payments of this nature would lie beyond the Program's jurisdiction.

Place of Payment by Cash or Cheque - s. 11(3)

11(3) If payment is made by cash or cheque, the employer shall ensure that the cash or cheque is given to the employee at his or her workplace or at some other place agreeable to the employee.

Section 11(3) requires that wages paid by cash or cheque must be given to the employee at the workplace or an alternate location agreed upon by the employee. Such an agreement must be in writing as required under ESA Part I, s. 1(3). In the absence of such an agreement, payment must be made at the workplace.

Under ESA Part III, s. 7, an employee's agent (e.g., trade union) may agree on behalf of the employee to an agreement under this provision to designate some other place for the payment of wages.

Direct Deposit - s. 11(4)

11(4) An employer may pay an employee's wages by direct deposit into an account of a financial institution if,

(a) the account is in the employee's name;

(b) no person other than the employee or a person authorized by the employee has access to the account; and

(c) unless the employee agrees otherwise, an office or facility of the financial institution is located within a reasonable distance from the location where the employee usually works.

Under s. 11(4), an employer choosing a direct deposit payment arrangement may only deposit wages to an account at a financial institution:

- If the account is in the employee's name;
- Provided that only the employee or a person authorized by the employee has access to the account; and
- If an office or facility of the financial institution is located within a reasonable distance from the workplace, unless the employee agrees in writing otherwise.

In order to make payments by direct deposit, it is necessary that the employee have an account at a financial institution to which only they (or person authorized by the employee) have access. An employer may make having such an account a condition of hire and where an employee is subsequently directed to open an account and refuses, the employer may terminate the employee without running afoul of the reprisal provisions of the ESA 2000. This is because in such a case, the employee is not engaging in any activity that is protected by the anti-reprisal provisions. In particular, there is no right under the Act to not open an account or to not be paid by direct deposit. The employer would of course be required to comply with the notice of termination and severance provisions in ESA Part XV.

As noted, unless otherwise agreed to by the employee, the selected financial institution must have an office or facility located within a reasonable distance to the workplace where the employee generally works. If the employer wishes to make direct deposits to a financial institution that does not have an office or facility within a reasonable distance to the workplace, the employee's agreement is required. The agreement must be in writing as required under ESA Part I, s. 1(3). No agreement is required where an office or facility of the financial institution is within a reasonable distance of the employee's workplace.

Where a complaint is filed asserting that an employer has unilaterally chosen a financial institution that does not have an office or facility within a reasonable distance from the employee's place of work, an employment standards officer will make a determination based on such factors as travel time, available modes of travel and the actual distance.

Section 11(4)(c) refers to an office or facility of the financial institution. It is the Program's view that office or facility refers to a location that can facilitate an employee's routine banking transactions related to receiving wages. As routine banking transactions can be made at an automated teller machine (ATM), this would be an acceptable facility provided it is the chosen financial institution's ATM and it is within a reasonable distance from the workplace. A loans or investment office of the selected financial institution that did not have the capability of handling routine banking transactions would not be considered an acceptable office or facility.

If Employment Ends - s. 11(5)

11(5) If an employee's employment ends, the employer shall pay any wages to which the employee is entitled to the employee not later than the later of,

(a) seven days after the employment ends; and

(b) the day that would have been the employee's next pay day.

Under s. 11(5), any wage entitlements owing to an employee whose employment has ended must be paid out no later than the later of seven days after employment has ended and the next regular pay day. In allowing the employer to choose the later of seven days after the employment ended and the regular pay day following the date the employment ended, the employer has some flexibility to use regular processes (e.g., the employer's computerized payroll system rather than having to cut a manual check) to make the final payment to the employee.

In this regard it should be noted that the pay day referred to in paragraph (b) is not necessarily the pay day that covers the period to the date of termination, but is rather the very next pay day to fall after the date employment ends.

Example:

- Employee's employment is terminated on January 22
- Employee is paid on January 31 for the wages earned in the pay period January 1 to 15, and paid on February 15 for the wages earned in the pay period January 16 to 31 (i.e., the pay day for the pay period that would have included January 22 would be February 15)
- Employee is entitled to payment of any outstanding wages on the date that is the later of:
    - Seven days after the termination date - January 29 (seven days after January 22) and
    - The next pay day - January 31

The employee in this example will therefore be entitled to payment of any outstanding wages on January 31, not February 15.

Finally, it should also be noted that s. 11(5) does not relieve the employer in any way of its obligation to pay the wages earned in any given pay period on the regular pay day for that pay period as per s. 11(1).

Example:

- Pay day for the pay period September 12 to 25 is October 2

- Employee’s employment is terminated on September 30 (i.e., after the pay period is completed but prior to the pay day for that pay period)

Under s. 11(1), the employer must still issue a pay cheque as usual on October 2 for the wages earned in the pay period ending on September 25.

And, in addition, s. 11(5) will require payment of any other outstanding wages to which the employee was entitled on termination (e.g., the wages earned September 26 to 30, any termination pay in lieu of notice, severance pay, vacation pay and public holiday pay for a substitute holiday that had not been taken) on October 7, the day that is the later of seven days after the termination, or October 2, the next pay day following the termination.

ESA Part V Section 12 - Statement Re Wages

Statement Re Wages - s. 12(1)

12. (1) On or before an employee's pay day, the employer shall give to the employee a written statement setting out,

(a) the pay period for which the wages are being paid;

(b) the wage rate, if there is one;

(c) the gross amount of wages and, unless the information is provided to the employee in some other manner, how that amount was calculated;

(d) REPEALED;

(e) the amount and purpose of each deduction from wages

(f) any amount with respect to room or board that is deemed to have been paid to the employee under subsection 23(2); and

(g) the net amount of wages being paid to the employee.

Section 12 creates a requirement that ensures an employee receives, at the time wages (other than vacation pay) are paid, a detailed statement that demonstrates how his or her gross and net wages have been calculated. It is not necessary that all the information required in s. 12 be contained in a single document; the written statement may consist of one or more documents. The Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18 ("GEA 2002") repealed s. 12(1)(d), which set out the vacation statement obligations. Those obligations are now set out in ESA Part XI, s. 41.1.

Even though an employee may be aware in one way or another of the details concerning his or her pay and despite the fact that the details may remain unchanged from pay period to pay period, a written wage statement is required on or before each pay date.

Tips and other gratuities do not fall within the definition of wages. Therefore, the ESA does not require employers to include information about tips and other gratuities on wage statements.

It is Program policy that an employer can provide the written statement by way of a secure internet accessible database and be in compliance with s. 12(1), even though an individual wage statement is not personally sent in any format to the employee, if the employees have a reasonable opportunity to access the database and a printer (and know how to use them) on or before their payday. If the employee works at a location other than the employer's workplace (for example, an employee of a temporary help agency who is providing services at a client's office), the employer may comply with s. 12(1) if the employee is provided with access to a computer and printer at the client's place of business.

The written statement must contain the following information:

Pay period for which the wages are being paid

Pursuant to s. 12(1)(a), the written statement must state the pay period for which the wages are being paid. This requirement is satisfied if the statement identifies, in a way understandable to the employee, the pay period to which the statement pertains. This would typically be by showing the start and end dates of the pay period, but other ways of identifying the pay period might also be used, such as, for example, by indicating that the pay period is period #2 in the 26 pay periods for this year.

Wage rate, if there is one

Under s. 12(1)(b), the written statement must contain the wage rate, if there is one. This would include all "special" rates of pay, e.g., overtime rate, premium rate or shift rate in addition to the "regular" rate.

Gross amount of wages andhow that amount was calculated

Under s. 12(1)(c), the written statement must contain the gross amount of wages and, unless the information is provided in some other manner, how that amount was calculated. This requirement is satisfied if the wage statement shows:

- The amount of the gross wages earned; and
- The formula for the calculation of gross wages earned. If the information regarding the calculation of gross wages earned is provided in some other manner, the employer is obliged to establish evidence to show how this has been done.

Amount and purpose of each deduction from wages

Under s. 12(1)(e), the written statement must contain a description of each deduction and the amount.

Any amount with respect to room or board that is deemed to have been paid to the employee under s. 23(2)

Under s. 12(1)(f), the written statement must contain any amount with respect to room or board that is deemed to have been paid to the employee under ESA Part X, s. 23(2). Where this clause applies, the prescribed amount of room and board is deemed to be wages paid to the employee. See O Reg 285/01, s. 5(4), s. 19(2) and s. 25(5) for the prescribed amount.

Net amount of wages being paid

Under s. 12(1)(g), the written statement must contain the net amount of wages bein paid to the employee.

Same - s. 12(2) REPEALED - GEA, 2002, November 26, 2002

12(2) The statement need not include the information described in clause (1)(d) if the employer pays vacation pay in accordance with subsection 36(3).

Prior to the repeal of s. 12(2) and s. 12(1)(d) by the GEA 2002, which came into force on November 26, 2002, s. 12(2) provided that the information regarding vacation pay detailed in the former s. 12(1)(d) did not need to appear in the wage statement for a pay period in which one or more vacation days were taken, if the employer was paying vacation pay in accordance with ESA Part XI, s. 36(3) as it read prior to amendment by the GEA 2002.

Section 12(2) was replaced with ESA Part XI, s. 41.1(5). Section 41.1(5) similarly provides that the vacation statement obligations set out in ESA Part XI, s. 41.1 do not apply if the employer is paying vacation pay that accrues in each pay period on the pay day for that pay period, and provides a statement of wages that sets out vacation pay separately from the other wages being paid or provides the employee with a separate statement setting out the amount of vacation pay being paid in accordance with s. 36(3) as amended by the GEA 2002.

Electronic Copies - s. 12(3)

12(3) The statement may be provided to the employee by electronic mail rather than in writing if the employee has access to a means of making a paper copy of the statement.

Section 12(3) permits an employer to provide a wage statement to an employee using a confidential electronic mail system to convey the information, instead of a paper document. However, an employer may only provide a statement by electronic mail where the employee has "access to the means of making" a paper copy of the document.

Under s. 12, it is the employer's responsibility to ensure that a wage statement is provided. Where the employee's "access to a means of making a paper copy" is outside the employer's control, the employer will not be able to ensure the provision of a statement; therefore, "access to a means" must be interpreted to mean "at the workplace".

Some examples of situations where this section's requirements will not be met include:

- The employee has no access to computer equipment and software at the workplace to print a copy of the document;
- The employee is unable to access computer equipment and software necessary at the workplace on the day that the wage statement is due under s. 12(1);
- The employee is not provided with an electronic mail account at the workplace;
- The employee has access to the necessary equipment at the workplace, but is not trained to use it;
- The employee must request another individual at the workplace, other than the employee's manager, to produce a copy of the document.

Confidentiality will be a reasonable expectation with regard to the employee's ability to make a copy of his or her own wage statement under s. 12(3).

See the discussion above at s. 12(1) for a discussion of wage statements that are provided via a secure internet accessible database.

ESA Part V Section 12.1 - Statement Re Wages on Termination

12.1 On or before the day on which the employer is required to pay wages under subsection 11(5), the employer shall provide the employee with a written statement setting out,

(a) the gross amount of any termination pay or severance pay being paid to the employee;

(b) the gross amount of any vacation pay being paid to the employee;

(c) unless the information is provided to the employee in some other manner, how the amounts referred to in clauses (a) and (b) were calculated;

(d) the pay period for which any wages other than wages described in clauses (a) or (b) are being paid;

(e) the wage rate, if there is one;

(f) the gross amount of any wages referred to in clause (d) and, unless the information is provided to the employee in some other manner, how that amount was calculated;

(g) the amount and purpose of each deduction from wages;

(h) any amount with respect to room or board that is deemed to have been paid to the employee under subsection 23(2); and

(i) the net amount of wages being paid to the employee.

This section was added to the Employment Standards Act, 2000 by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18, which came into force on November 26, 2002. Section 12.1 requires employers to provide a statement with respect to wages (including vacation pay) paid on termination of employment on or before the day on which the employer is required to pay wages under s. 11(5). It also requires the employer to provide information in the statement as to how the gross amounts of termination pay, severance pay, vacation pay and any other wages in addition to those amounts was calculated, unless that information is provided in some other way by the employer.

ESA Part V Section 13 - Deductions, etc.

Deductions, etc. - s. 13(1)

13(1) An employer shall not withhold wages payable to an employee, make a deduction from an employee's wages or cause the employee to return his or her wages to the employer unless authorized to do so under this section.

Section 13(1) establishes a general rule prohibiting an employer from:

- Withholding wages that an employee has earned;
- Making a deduction from an employee's wages;
- Causing the employee to return their wages to the employer, except where the employer is permitted to do so under this section.

For the balance of this chapter, reference will generally be made only to deductions, but the discussion should be understood as covering an employer's withholding of wages and an employer causing wages to be returned to the employer as well.

Note that pursuant to O Reg 285/01, s. 3.1, s. 13 of the Employment Standards Act, 2000 does not apply to an employer who participates in an Ontario Municipal Employees Retirement System ("OMERS") pension plan under the Ontario Municipal Employees Retirement System Act, 2006, SO 2006, c 2, but only with respect to the fees that a by-law made under s. 28 of that Act requires the employee to pay. See

The purpose of s. 13(1) is to protect the employee from improper interference with their earnings by ensuring that an employer who owes wages is not in the position of being both a claimant against the employee and an arbiter of the validity of the claim. The exceptions to the general prohibition against deductions in s. 13(1), as set out in ss. 13(2) and 13(3), underline this principle by permitting deductions where a statute of Ontario or Canada, a court order, or the employee's written authorization permit the deduction. In such cases, someone other than the employer, such as a legislature, a court, or the employee, has determined that the employee owes the money to be deducted.

It is important to note that what s. 13(1) prohibits is deductions from wages, i.e., deductions from the monetary remuneration that an employee is entitled to under their employment contract. The contract may provide a formula for calculating an employee's wage entitlement and that formula may involve a deduction being made at some point in calculating what the employee's wage entitlement is; however, such a deduction is not a deduction from wages, but rather a step taken in calculating what wages are due. For example, an employment contract may provide that the employee will be entitled to a yearly bonus that is calculated as $X amount per unit of productivity minus the amount of shrinkage and shortages that take place during the year. While the bonus constitutes wages within the meaning of the definition in the Act, no deduction is being made from wages in this case; rather, the deduction is part of the calculation that is necessary to determine the amount of wages. The distinction between a deduction from wages and a deduction that is a step in the calculation of what wages are owing is a longstanding one. See Sagar v Ridehalgh & Sons Ltd., [1931] 1 Ch 310*,* Becker Milk Company of Canada Limited v Ure (December 14, 1985), ESC 2002 (Egan) and Fruitman v Stephenson's Rent All Inc., 2000 CanLII 3317 (ON LRB).

However, it should also be noted that a deduction made in the course of calculating what wages are due, unlike a valid deduction from wages, must not produce a result that is less than the minimum wage or, where overtime hours are worked, less than an employee's overtime pay entitlement under the ESA 2000.

Thus, if the employment contract provides a formula that involves a deduction in order to calculate what the employee's wages are, it would be a violation of the minimum wage provisions if the employee ends up receiving less than the minimum wage. Note, however, that compliance with the minimum wage is determined on a pay period basis, not on a per hour basis.

Also note that compliance with the limits on hours of work must be determined on the basis of actual hours of work, and not on provisions in the employment contract that might in some circumstances deem the employee to have worked less time than they in fact did.

Examples

An employee has a regular work week of nine hours per day, five days per week, with shifts beginning at 9 a.m. each day. Their regular rate is $17.00 per hour. However, under the terms of the employment contract, if they punch in more than five minutes but less than 15 minutes late, the wages with respect to the first scheduled hour of work (9 a.m. to 10 a.m.) are calculated as if they had worked only 45 minutes, even if the employee worked, for example, 54 minutes in that hour. If the employer pays the employee $767.13 for the week in accordance with the contract (based on 44 hours and 45 minutes, with the 45 minutes paid at the rate of one and a half times the regular rate), there will be an overtime pay violation; as there were actually 54 minutes of overtime worked, the employee should have been paid $770.95.

Consider the slightly different example of an employee with a regular work week of eight hours a day, five days a week, and a regular rate of $17 per hour. If the employment contract provides that the employee will be paid for only 45 minutes if they punch in more than five minutes but less than 15 minutes late, and the employee punches in six minutes late, there will be no violation if the employee receives only $675.75 for the week. While the employee was paid for only 45 minutes even though they actually worked 54 minutes out of the first scheduled hour on the day they were late, they received all the monetary remuneration that was due to them under the contract and the calculation of wages under the contract does not result in any violation of the hours of work, overtime or minimum wage provisions of the Act. Note that $675.75 when divided by 39.9, the number of actual hours worked in the week, produces $16.94, which is in excess of the minimum wage.

What if the employee in the preceding example was just being paid minimum wage, which at the time of writing was $15.00? If the employer treats the employee as having worked only 39.75 hours in the week in question and pays the employee $596.25 for the week, there will be a violation of the minimum wage requirements, because $596.25 divided by 39.9 (the employee's total hours for the week) equals $14.94, which is less than the minimum wage. The employer should have paid the employee $598.50 (39.9 x 15).

Deductions for overpayment of wages

In addition, referees under the former Employment Standards Act have held that the employer may deduct wages paid in error in the past from an employee's pay cheque. As the referee pointed out in All-Way Transportation Services Ltd v Fountain (June 6, 1979), ESC 627 (Brent) when an employee is overpaid, they were never entitled to the amount that the employer seeks to deduct, so it cannot be regarded as wages payable in the first place.

In some cases, an overpayment may have arisen from a failure to make an authorized deduction. For example, an employee may have provided the employer with a written authorization to deduct a specific sum from each pay cheque in respect of the company benefit plan. Where the employer inadvertently fails to make the deduction, resulting in an overpayment to the employee, the employer may recover the monies paid out in error without obtaining any additional authorization to do so.

In cases where the employer has made an overpayment, it can recover those monies from the employee's wages, whether they are regular wages, vacation pay or termination pay.

Note that although ESA Part XV, s. 60(1)(b) requires the employee to be paid no less than their regular wages during the notice period that this provision is intended to protect the employee’s right to continue to earn their regular wages - it does not conflict with the employer’s right to recover an overpayment of wages.

Note, however, that where an employer intentionally pays an employee more than the Act entitles the employee to, this is not an overpayment but rather a payment that they are entitled to under their contract of employment. Such an amount would, therefore, fall within the definition of wages. The employer cannot deduct the amount of such a payment from subsequent earnings without a written authorization for deduction by the employee. Further, if there is a written authorization for deduction, but it refers only to deductions for overpayments, the authorization cannot be used, as the payment was not in fact an overpayment. See Ozorak v Econome and 802710 Ontario Inc. (April 20, 1999), 4320-97-ES (ON LRB) where the employer intentionally paid an employee for a public holiday that the employee was not entitled to under the former Employment Standards Act.

An advance payment of wages may be deducted. In 473321 Ontario Limited, c.o.b. Malkat Peking v Cohen (April 3, 1984), ESC 1602 (Swan) the referee noted that just as amounts that are due and actually paid by an employer before termination may be taken into account in determining the payment due on termination, so may amounts that were expressly paid as an advance on amounts to become due in the future. 431650 Ontario o/a Eglinton Fine Foods v Lombardo (April 9, 1985), ESC 1821 (Egan) should also be noted. The claimant was given four weeks' notice when he was entitled to eight weeks. He obtained another job immediately after this four-week period. The applicant argued that the earnings of the employee from the new employer during the second four-week period of notice to which he was entitled by statute should discharge his obligation for payment in lieu of notice to the extent of those earnings. Citing s. 8 of the former Employment Standards Act, the referee rejected this argument, holding that none of the enabling factors in the regulations applied.

Tips and other gratuities are excluded from the definition of wages. Therefore, s. 13(1) does not apply to deductions from tips and other gratuities. Please see the discussion at ESA Part V.1, s. 14.2(1) for information on deductions from tips and other gratuities.

Statute or Court Order - s. 13(2)

13(2) An employer may withhold or make a deduction from an employee's wages or cause the employee to return them if a statute of Ontario or Canada or a court order authorizes it.

Section 13(2) sets out the exceptions to s. 13(1) that permit an employer to make deductions against an employee's wages where the deduction is authorized by a statute of Ontario or Canada, or a court order. Section 13(2) is subject to s. 13(4).

Tips and other gratuities are excluded from the definition of wages. Therefore, s. 13(2) does not apply to deductions from tips and other gratuities made pursuant to statute or court order. See the discussion on ESA Part V.1, s. 14.3 for more information on deductions from tips and other gratuities made pursuant to statute or court order.

Deductions authorized by statute

The most frequently encountered deductions authorized by statute are for income tax, Canada Pension Plan (“CPP”) contributions and employment insurance (“EI”) premiums.

In addition to authorizing deductions for EI premiums, the Employment Insurance Act, SC 1996, c 23, requires a deduction from wages payable to an employee as a result of a court order or arbitration award made against the employer where the employer has reason to believe that the employee received EI benefits for the same period to which the order or award relates. The deducted amount must be remitted to the Receiver General.

An employment standards officer should check with the Canada Revenue Agency if an employee alleges that deductions made by the employer in purported compliance with income tax, CPP or EI legislation were not authorized.

It sometimes occurs that an employer who failed to deduct amounts for income tax, CPP contributions or EI premiums (because, for example, the employer incorrectly treated the employee as an independent contractor), seeks to catch up by deducting the amounts that should have been deducted in the past all at once (sometimes going back several years) from the employee's current regular wages or termination pay. Both s. 21(4) of the Canada Pension Plan, RSC 1985, c C-8 and s. 82(6) of the Employment Insurance Act the EI legislation address this situation by limiting the catch-up to one additional deduction for each pay period (i.e., the deduction that would currently be required for the pay period plus one further pay period's deductions) and prohibiting any catch-up for amounts that should have been deducted more than 12 months previously.

These limitations equally apply to the employee's final pay cheque at the end of an employment relationship, even though it means that there will be no further opportunity for the employer to "make up" for the missed deductions. See Firlotte v Angus operating as Blythe Farm (May 30, 1995), ESC 95-101 (Wacyk).

One question that might arise is whether a deduction authorized pursuant to a regulation would be permitted under s. 13(2). For example, in the context of the Employment Protection for Foreign Nationals Act, 2009, employers are generally prohibited from recovering or attempting to recover from a foreign national any cost incurred by the employer in the course of arranging to become or attempting to become an employer of the foreign national. This prohibition does not apply with respect to costs that are prescribed. Ontario Regulation 348/15 prescribes such costs; it permits employers who employ a foreign national in Ontario under an employment contact made pursuant to the federal government's Seasonal Agricultural Worker Program ("SAWP") to recover from the foreign national costs of air travel and of work permits, if the contract allows these deductions. If these permitted costs were deducted from wages, it would not constitute a violation of s. 13 since the regulation specifically authorizes the employer's cost recovery.

Deductions authorized by court order

Section 13(2) allows deductions pursuant to a court order.

This provision states that an employer may make a deduction from an employee's wages "if a . . . court order authorizes it." It is Program policy that a deduction is allowed under s. 13(2) only if a court order explicitly states that a deduction may be made from wages. This can include wages held in trust where an employer has filed an application for review under ESA Part XXIII, s. 116. It is not enough that the employer is in possession of a court judgment declaring that the employee owes a debt to their employer; there must be a court order specifically providing that the debt can be satisfied by way of a deduction from wages.

Note that Program policy previously provided that there was no requirement for the court to specifically authorize a deduction from wages; however, in accordance with more recent decisions, it is now Program policy that there must be a specific authorization. See for example, Minnema Farms Ltd v Demaat, 2014 CanLII 668 (ON LRB).

Many (though not all) deductions that are lawful under s. 13(2) involve court ordered garnishment of wages. Note however, that under s. 7 of the Wages Act, RSO 1990, c C.44, 80 per cent of an employee's net wages (i.e., gross wages less tax, EI and CPP) are exempt from garnishment. If the garnishment is for the enforcement of a support order, only 50 per cent of net wages are exempt. A judge issuing a garnishment order has discretion to decrease or decrease the percentage of the net wages that are exempt. Program staff should not attempt to provide advice concerning the Wages Act, which is administered by the Ministry of the Attorney General. Persons with enquiries about that Act should be directed to the Crown Law Office-Civil Division of that Ministry.

Employee Authorization - s. 13(3)

13(3) An employer may withhold or make a deduction from an employee's wages or cause the employee to return them with the employee's written authorization.

Section 13(3) permits an employer to withhold wages, make a deduction from wages or have an employee return wages if the employee has provided a written authorization to do so. Note that ss. 13(4) and 13(5) set out specific exceptions to s. 13(3).

As provided in s. 13(3), an authorization must be in writing to be valid; an oral authorization is not sufficient. The following decisions under the former Employment Standards Act are relevant: 509245 Ontario Ltd. c.o.b.a. Yates Electric v Groulx and Heighington (November 21, 1985), ESC 1987 (Brown) and Crick c.o.b. Keith's Restaurant v Popko et al (December 14, 1982), ES 1344 (Egan).

However, in Consolidated Press Company Limited v Leko (November 10, 1983), ESC 1511 (Aggarwal), also a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, a deduction was allowed in the absence of a written authorization. The claimant had verbally agreed to a monthly deduction for parking, and had accepted cheques marked on that basis for three years. The referee noted that according to Black's Law Dictionary, a written instrument is merely evidence of a contract. He found, therefore, that where a clear, express, bona fide contract establishing the employee's obligation to pay through payroll deductions existed, and had been implemented for a long time, the mere absence of a formal written authorization should not make such deductions illegal. Apparently, the referee was concerned that the claimant was attempting to use the section as an instrument of fraud, rather than as a shield against fraud by the employer, which is its intent. The case, however, is contrary to Program policy and should not be followed.

It should be noted that in another case under the former Employment Standards Act, Tavares and Sgromo c.o.b. Mr. Submarine, Thunder Bay, Ontario v Coppola et al (April 13, 1982), ESC 1197 (Aggarwal), the same referee held that the similar acceptance of a pay cheque every two weeks without objection with full knowledge and understanding that the deductions had been made for cash shortages did not amount to written authorization.

A written authorization must in fact specify that a deduction from wages is authorized. For example, in 555149 Ontario Limited c.o.b.a. Discount Car and Truck Rentals v Mason (March 20, 1985), ESC 1809 (Davis), the employee signed the following statement: "I ... agree to pay Discount Car Rentals the amount of 5,000.00 in monthly instalments of 200.00 ... per month for the damage of the car." The referee held that while this document was an acknowledgement of a debt and an undertaking to liquidate it by monthly instalments, it did not authorize the employer to make a deduction from wages. A similar finding regarding an agreement to pay for damages done to the employer's car was made in Windsor Wholesale Produce Limited v Donnelly et al (August 30, 1984), ESC 1712 (Gorsky). Both of these cases were decided under the former Employment Standards Act. Note that had the referees in either case concluded that there was an authorization to deduct from wages, the exception in s. 13(5) may have applied to prohibit the deduction in any event. That subsection makes an exception to allowing deductions that are authorized in writing if the wages are being deducted for faulty work.

Terms and conditions outlined in a policy manual do not constitute a written authorization. Such a manual might create a liability, but it is not an authorization by the employee to deduct from wages. See the following decisions under the former Employment Standards Act: Highbury Ford Sales Ltd. v Richards (May 5, 1986), ESC 2101 (Bryant) and 307855 Ontario Limited o/a the 54 Restaurant v Vlahovich (January 27, 1986), ESC 2031 (Adamson).

Employees sometimes enter into wage assignments in which the employee agrees that their wages may be paid over to another party. Such assignments are generally prohibited under the Wages Act. A wage assignment is therefore not generally considered a valid authorization to deduct wages under the ESA.

However, there is an exception to this prohibition found in s. 7(8) of the Wages Act which provides that wage assignments by employees to credit unions to which the Credit Unions and Caisses Populaires Act, RSO 1990, c C.44, applies are valid. As a result, if an employee enters into an agreement with such a credit union, whereby the credit union is authorized in writing to garnish the employee's wages if they default on a loan, and the employee does default, the employer may honour the assignment to the credit union. The wage assignment will, in that case, be considered a valid written authorization and the employer will not be in contravention of s. 13(1) if it abides by the wage assignment and forwards a portion of the employee's wages to the credit union. Note, however, that the Wages Act provision that exempts 80% of an employee's net wages from garnishment also applies to wage assignments to credit unions. That percentage can be increased or decreased by court order.

A second exception to the prohibition against wage assignments arises where the assignee is the Crown because the Wages Act doesn't apply to the Crown. As a result, assignments made under the Ontario Disability Support Program Act, 1997, SO 1997, c 25, Sch B are not prohibited by the Wages Act because the payee under that Program is Her Majesty the Queen in right of Ontario as represented by the Minister of Community and Social Services (i.e., the Crown). An assignment made under that Program would therefore be considered a valid written authorization for a deduction from wages. Note that what is determinative is whether the Program is a provincial government program. For example, an assignment made under the Ontario Works Act, 1997, SO 1997, c 25, Sch A, in which the assignment is made in favour of either a municipality or another delivery agent, would be prohibited under the Wages Act because the assignee is not the Crown.

A written authorization from an employee allowing a deduction from wages if the employee quits would not be valid where the employee resigns but is regarded by law as having been constructively dismissed. Despite the fact that the employee has quit, the law treats such a quit as if it were a termination by the employer. A constructive dismissal may be found to have occurred where:

1. The employer makes a substantial adverse change in the terms and conditions of employment without the employee's consent;
2. The employer breaches a fundamental term of the employment contract;
3. The employer tries to force the employee to quit by "making life miserable" for them; or
4. The employer gives the employee an ultimatum, offering the "choice" of either quitting or being fired.

For the purposes of the Act, the employee in these circumstances would not be found to have quit, but rather to have been constructively dismissed. Thus, the situation is not covered by the terms of the deduction authorization.

Finally, under Program policy, such issues as inequality of bargaining power of the parties at the time the authorization was given, or the fact that the employer may be attempting to redress what they consider to be a shortcoming in the legislation as it is currently written, are not relevant to a consideration of the validity of a written authorization. Further, it is considered of no importance that:

1. The authorization may require the employee to provide more notice of termination than the employer must give under the Act;
2. The employee must give notice during the first three months of employment, when the employer is not required to do so under the Act;
3. Some of the deduction to be made will come from vacation pay monies; or

4. The employee may not receive at least minimum wage after the deduction: compliance with minimum wage must be determined by consideration of gross wages, prior to any deduction allowable under the Act.

Exception - s. 13(4)

13(4) Subsections (2) and (3) do not apply if the statute, order or written authorization from the employee requires the employer to remit the withheld or deducted wages to a third person and the employer fails to do so.

Section 13(4) provides that where a deduction may be made from wages under s. 13(2) or s. 13(3) as required by statute, court order or as allowed by an employee's written authorization and such statute, order or authorization requires the employer to remit the wages deducted or withheld to a third person, and the employer fails to do so, the deduction will not be valid.

For example, an employer may make statutory deductions for income tax, CPP or EI, but fail to remit the funds on the employee's behalf to the Canada Revenue Agency. Where it is found that funds were withheld or deducted from the employee's wages but not remitted to the third party, this will be a violation of s. 13(4) and the officer may, in addition to other enforcement action under the Act, issue an order to pay under ESA Part XXII, s. 103, to effectively return the unremitted funds to the employee.

Exception - s. 13(5)

13(5) Subsection (3) does not apply if,

(a) the employee's authorization does not refer to a specific amount or provide a formula from which a specific amount may be calculated;

(b) the employee's wages were withheld, deducted or required to be returned,

- i. because of faulty work,
- ii. because the employer had a cash shortage, lost property or had property stolen and a person other than the employee had access to the cash or property, or
- iii. under any prescribed conditions; or

(c) the employee's wages were required to be returned and those wages were the subject of an order under this Act.

Section 13(5) prohibits an employer from withholding wages, making deductions from wages or causing an employee to return wages in certain circumstances, even though the employer has a written authorization from the employee to make the deduction in accordance with s. 13(3).

Written authorization does not refer to a specific amount or formula

Under s. 13(5)(a) the written authorization must set out either the specific amount to be withheld, deducted or returned, or provide a formula that enables the employee to calculate the specific amount.

In Superior Service Station Maintenance Ltd. v Edward et al (November 2, 1977), ESC 457 (Springate), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, a job application form contained an authorization for deductions. However, the referee held that it constituted a blanket authorization for deduction of unliquidated damages obtained by the employer as a condition precedent to employment, and as such was unenforceable.

In fact, other referees have held, and it is consistent with the policy of the Program, that any blanket authorization under which an employee purports to authorize deductions of unspecified amounts is invalid. However, if the employee has affirmed the applicability of the authorization to a particular deduction, that is, when the employee can better appreciate its specific nature and order of magnitude, it may be valid for the purposes of s. 13(5)(b)(i) and (ii). See Georgetown Motors Ltd. v Coleman (December 12, 1986), ESC 2203 (Adamson) and Ronyx Corporation Limited v Ritenburg (March 19, 1984), ESC 1593 (Sheppard). For example, if an employee signs a blanket authorization for the deduction of the price of merchandise that the employee purchases from the employer, the authorization will be valid provided that the employee subsequently acknowledges purchasing merchandise for the amount in question.

Another issue is the validity of an authorization purporting to allow an amount to be deducted from wages if the employee does not provide the employer with notice in the event that they quit. Program policy is that if the authorization is specific as to the amount of notice required of the employee and as to the amount to be deducted if that notice is not provided, it will meet the requirements of the Act, and will be valid.

Accordingly, an authorization to deduct for failure to give sufficient notice or simply notice, without an actual amount of notice specified, will not be valid. Further, a reference to a deduction for damages or any amounts owing at the time of resignation will be insufficient for lack of specificity. Although an actual dollar figure is not required, the authorization must clearly demonstrate the employee's agreement to the deduction of a precise amount (e.g., one week's pay, the first week's pay or the last week's pay) would be sufficiently specific, as would final vacation pay, even if the amount is not precisely quantifiable when the authorization is signed.

Also, a written authorization respecting failure to give notice of resignation would be invalid if the amount to be deducted constituted a penalty rather than a genuine attempt to pre-estimate damages. For example, an amount that would be a penalty rather than a genuine pre-estimate is the following:

An employee works as a security guard. The employer has employees on-call to fill in for the employee when he is unable to work. The employee signs a written authorization that he will forfeit his last two weeks' wages and all his vacation pay if he resigns without giving four weeks' written notice. In that situation, the amount to be withheld is clearly all out of proportion with the damages that the employer might reasonably be expected to suffer if the employee resigned without notice or with less than four weeks' notice. The employer has an ample pool of employees on call from which it can quickly obtain a replacement.

Deduction is made for faulty work

Section 13(5)(b)(i)prevents employers from making deductions from an employee's wages because of the employee's mistakes, even if the employee has authorized the deduction in writing. Without such protection, an employee could be charged by way of wage deduction for every item or piece of work spoiled or rejected. Employers who want to recover damages due to employees' faulty work may choose to sue for damages in court, but they cannot make deductions from the employees' wages. Referees in decisions under the former Employment Standards Act have held that no deduction could be made in the following circumstances on grounds that they constituted faulty work:

1. The claimant continued to drive a company car that was overheated, thus causing severe damage - see Hughended Holdings Limited o/a Metro Courier Express v Morrison et al (April 14, 1986), ESC 2090 (Adamson);
2. The claimant damaged a vehicle when moving it at the employer's place of business - see Cavalcade Ford Mercury Sales Ltd. v Crewson (June 7, 1979), ESC 628 (Johnston);
3. A salesperson damaged a car while backing it into the showroom - see Georgetown Motors Ltd. v Coleman.

The Program has also taken the position that:

- No deductions can be made from the wages of an employee who executes credit card transactions improperly, thus causing revenue loss to the employer. Bungled credit card transactions are considered faulty work rather than cash shortages.
- No deductions can be made as part of a safety financial penalty system policy wherein a deduction is made - whether from the employee involved or from all employees - if an employee is injured in a workplace incident and as a result incurs medical aid expenses or a loss of work time.

The Program also takes the position that the prohibition against wage deductions for faulty work in s. 13(5)(b)(i) applies not to just past or present faulty work, but to anticipated future faulty work as well. For example, employers are prohibited from making a wage deduction and putting the amount of the deduction towards an indemnity fund to pay for any damages or deductible owing due to the employee's anticipated future mistakes.

Further, the Program takes the position that the prohibition extends to prohibit deductions from one employee for the faulty work of another employee. For example, employers are prohibited from making wage deductions and putting the amount of the deduction towards an indemnity fund to pay for damages arising from any employee's faulty work.

Deduction is for cash shortages/loss of property/property stolen

Under s. 13(5)(b)(ii), an employer is prohibited from withholding wages, making a deduction from wages or requiring an employee to return wages for cash shortages, loss of property or stolen property where any person other than the employee had access to the cash or property, even if the employee has authorized the deduction in writing. This could include situations where a customer leaves a restaurant without paying the bill or where a customer leaves a gas station without paying the bill after pumping gas for their car. The "dine and dash" or “gas and dash” can be considered a cash shortage and, in such cases, the customer, not the restaurant employee or gas station employee, had exclusive control over the cash in question.

If another employee had access to the cash register at the same time as a claimant, no withholding, deduction or return of wages can be made. Therefore, if another employee had access to the cash register at times other than the claimant's shift and only the claimant had access during their shift, a deduction can be made. As the referee in Fraser o/a Becker's Milk v Oliver (January 24, 1980), ESC 694 (Bigelow) explained, under the former Employment Standards Act, the phrase "where a person other than the employee has access to the cash or property" should be interpreted to mean "where a person other than the employee has access to the cash or property during the employee's tour of duty as custodian of the cash or property". This intent has not changed under the ESA 2000.

Deduction was made under prescribed conditions

Section 13(5)(b)(iii) prohibits an employer from withholding wages, making deductions from wages, or requiring wages to be returned even with the employee's written authorization under any conditions prescribed by regulations. At the time of writing, no regulations prescribing conditions had been made.

Wages that were the subject of an order under the Act were required to be returned

Under s. 13(5)(c), a written authorization from an employee purporting to authorize the return to the employee's employer wages that were the subject of an order to pay would not be valid.

ESA Part V Section 14 - Priority of Claims

Priority of Claims - s. 14(1)

14(1) Despite any other Act, wages shall have priority over and be paid before the claims and rights of all other unsecured creditors of an employer, to the extent of $10,000 per employee.

This provision is similar in effect to s. 14 of the former Employment Standards Act. It should be noted that the Employment Standards Act, 2000 increased the maximum amount of wages that are given priority from $2,000 to $10,000 per employee.

Section 14(1) prevails over other provincial acts to the extent that they purport to grant a different level of priority for the employee wages, or to grant priority over wages to some competing claim.

For example, s. 3 of the Wages Act, RSO 1990, c W.1, states that wages have priority over the claims of other execution creditors to the extent of three months' wages per employee. Section 14 prevails over that provision. It is important to note that "wages" under the Wages Act means "wages or salary" in a strict sense, as opposed to the broader definition of "wages" contained in s. 1 of the ESA 2000.

In matters of insolvency, s. 14(1) gives wages, as defined in s. 1, priority over all unsecured creditors of the employer (including the Crown) to the extent of $10,000 for each employee.

Section 14(1) does not give wages priority over the claims of secured creditors, such as trade creditors or suppliers. A secured creditor is one with an interest in the debtor's property to secure payment or performance of an obligation. The instrument that creates the security may take the form of a debenture, mortgage, assignment of book debts or accounts receivable, or a general security agreement ("GSA"). See Re Campeau Corporation and Provincial Bank of Canada et al., 1975 CanLII 429 (ON SC), where the court held that it was not the intention of the legislature, in enacting s. 14 of the former Employment Standards Act, to interfere with the rights of secured creditors. This intention has not changed under the ESA 2000.

Section 14(1) does not, by itself, create any lien or charge upon an employer's assets as do the "deemed trust" provisions for vacation pay contained in s. 40. The decision in Beecroft v. Watt (1986), 1 RFL 3(d) 231 (Ont Prov Ct), cited to support this principle, refers to ss. 14 and 15 of the former Employment Standards Act, the wording of which is very similar to s. 14(1) of the ESA 2000.

It should also be noted that because "wages" under the ESA 2000 includes vacation pay, the amount of vacation pay deemed to be held in trust under s. 40(1) will be included in the $10,000 amount that is given priority under s. 14(1). However, the deemed trust status under s. 40(1) confers a greater priority over other creditors with respect to the vacation pay component of the $10,000 than the priority afforded under s. 14(1). See ESA Part XI, s. 40(1) for a discussion of the deemed trust under s. 40(1).

Exception - s. 14(2)

14(2) Subsection (1) does not apply with respect to a distribution under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Canada) or other legislation enacted by the Parliament of Canada respecting bankruptcy or insolvency.

Section 14(2) states that the priority of wage claims provided in s. 14(1) over claims of other unsecured creditors of an employer does not apply to distributions made under federal bankruptcy and insolvency legislation.

ESA Part V.1 – Employee Tips and Other Gratuities

Part V.1 prohibits employers from withholding their employees' tips or other gratuities, making a deduction from their employees' tips or other gratuities, and causing their employees to return or give their tips or other gratuities to the employer, except in specified circumstances.

ESA Part V.1 Section 14.1 – Definition – REPEALED

ESA Part V.1 Section 14.2 – Prohibition re Tips or Other Gratuities

Prohibition re Tips or Other Gratuities - s. 14.2(1)

14.2(1) An employer shall not withhold tips or other gratuities from an employee, make a deduction from an employee's tips or other gratuities or cause the employee to return or give his or her tips or other gratuities to the employer unless authorized to do so under this Part.

Scheme of Part V.1

Part V.1 prohibits, an employer from withholding an employee's tips or other gratuities, making a deduction from them, or causing the employee to return or to give them to the employer, with the following exceptions:

- a statute of Ontario or Canada or a court order authorizes it (s. 14.3), or
- the employer collects and redistributes tips or other gratuities among some or all of the employer's employees (s. 14.4)

Where an employer contravenes this prohibition, the remedy is set out in s. 14.2(2): the employer must pay the amount that was unlawfully withheld/deducted/returned/given. This payment is to be made in favour of the employee(s) to whom the customer intended to give the tip. The amount owing is enforceable under the ESA as if it were wages owing to the employee(s).

Note that the employment standard established by Part V.1 provides protection only with respect to an employer withholding an employee's tips and other gratuities, making deductions from an employee's tips or other gratuities or causing an employee to return or give tips or other gratuities to the employer. See subsection 1(1) for the definition of "tip or other gratuity" for a discussion on the test for determining whether a payment is an employee's "tip or other gratuity." Part V.1 does not empower Employment Standards Officers to enforce the terms of an employer's tip pool; it does not create statutory entitlements for other employees who may share in the proceeds of a redistribution of a tip pool but claim they did not receive what they may have been entitled to under the terms of the tip pool.

To illustrate: s. 14.4 allows employers to withhold or make a deduction from an employee's tips or other gratuities or cause the employee to return or give them to the employer if the employer collects and redistributes tips or other gratuities among some or all of its employees, subject to certain exceptions established under that subsection. Take an example where an employer has a tip pool policy that provides for a portion of waiters' tips to be distributed to all kitchen staff. One night, the employer withheld a percentage of the waiters' tips as per usual but only redistributed them to the cooks and kept the amount that otherwise would have gone to the dishwashing employees. Assuming this employer does not have the right to participate in the tip pool, the employer has contravened s. 14.2(1). The contravention does not stem from the fact the employer did not adhere to the terms of its tip pool. It stems from the fact that the employer, having withheld the waiters' tips, did not redistribute some of them in accordance with s. 14.4. In this example, the employer did not have the right to participate in the tip pool and as such would have had to distribute all of the withheld tips to employees in order to fit itself within the s. 14.4 exception and avoid a contravention of s. 14.2(1). The remedy is as per s. 14.2(2): the amounts unlawfully withheld from each waiter (i.e. the amount the employer kept) is a debt owing to each waiter and the amounts owing are enforceable under the Act as if the debts were "wages". The dishwashing employees do not have an enforceable claim under the ESA for any amounts they may have otherwise received if the tips were redistributed in accordance with the tip pool policy.

Employers are not required under the ESA to provide employees with written statements regarding tips or other gratuities.

Subsection 14.2(1)

This provision prohibits employers from withholding an employee's tips or other gratuities, making a deduction from employees' tips or other gratuities, or causing employees to return or to give their tips or other gratuities to the employer unless authorized to do so under Part V.1.

For the balance of this chapter, reference is generally made only to an employer withholding employees' tips or other gratuities, but the discussion should be understood as also addressing an employer making a deduction from employees' tips or other gratuities as well as an employer causing employees' tips or other gratuities to be returned or to be given to the employer.

See s. 1(1) for the definition of the term "tips or other gratuities".

The only circumstances in which an employer may withhold an employee's tips or other gratuities as authorized under Part V.1 are:

- a statute of Ontario or Canada or a court order authorizes it (s. 14.3), or
- the employer collects and redistributes tips or other gratuities among some or all of the employer's employees (s. 14.4)

Outside of these circumstances, employers are prohibited under the Act from withholding their employees' tips or other gratuities. Among other things, this means that employers are prohibited from withholding their employees' tips or other gratuities for things such as breakage, spillage, losses or damage. Employees cannot provide written authorization or any other form of consent to have their tips or other gratuities withheld. (Note that, in this respect, the prohibition against withholding tips or other gratuities is different than the prohibition against deductions that applies to wages in s. 13 of the Act.)

Enforcement - s. 14.2(2)

14.2(2) If an employer contravenes subsection (1), the amount withheld, deducted, returned or given is a debt owing to the employee and is enforceable under this Act as if it were wages owing to the employee.

This provision states that where an employer contravenes s. 14.2(1) (i.e. by withholding an employees' tips or other gratuities in circumstances other than the two that are permitted by s. 14.3 or s. 14.4), the amount of the unlawfully withheld tips or other gratuities is a debt owing to the employee(s) and is to be treated as if it were "wages" under the ESA for purposes of enforcement. Treating the debt in this context as if it were "wages" is necessary for enforcement purposes because tips and other gratuities are not "wages" as per the s. 1(1) definition of "wages". Without this treatment, the tips or other gratuities owing to the employee would not enforceable under the ESA.

As stated above under "Scheme of Part V.1", only the employee whose tips or other gratuities were withheld, deducted, returned or given has a remedy under the ESA (i.e e. the employee(s) to whom the customer made or left a tip). There is no remedy under the ESA for other employees who may be on the receiving end of a distribution of a tip pool and who, for example, do not receive tip redistribution in accordance with the tip pool.

Although tips and other gratuities are to be treated as if they were wages owing to the employee for the purposes of enforcement, they are not to be treated as wages for any other purposes under the ESA. Accordingly, an order to pay wages for tips and other gratuities owing to an employee will not attract vacation pay.

ESA Part V.1 Section 14.3 – Statute or Court Order

Statute or Court Order - s. 14.3(1)

14.3(1) An employer may withhold or make a deduction from an employee's tips or other gratuities or cause the employee to return or give them to the employer if a statute of Ontario or Canada or a court order authorizes it.

This provision allows employers to withhold or make a deduction from an employee's tips or other gratuities or cause the employee to return or give them to the employer if a statute of Ontario or Canada or a court order authorizes it.

This provision must be read in conjunction with the exception in s. 14.3(2), which states that this provision does not apply if the statute or order requires the employer to remit the withheld, deducted, returned or given tips or other gratuities to a third person and the employer fails to do so.

Statute of Ontario or Canada

The most frequently encountered deductions authorized by statute are for income tax, Canada Pension Plan (CPP) contributions and employment insurance (EI) premiums. An Employment Standards Officer should check with the Canada Revenue Agency if an employee alleges that deductions made by the employer in purported compliance with income tax, CPP or EI legislation were not authorized.

Court Order

This provision states that an employer may withhold or make a deduction from an employee's tips or other gratuities "if a . . . court order authorizes it." It is Program policy that a withholding or deduction is allowed under s. 14.3(1) only if a court order explicitly authorizes it. It is not enough that the employer is in possession of a court judgment declaring that the employee owes a debt to his or her employer.

Exception - s. 14.3(2)

14.3(2) Subsection (1) does not apply if the statute or order requires the employer to remit the withheld, deducted, returned or given tips or other gratuities to a third person and the employer fails to do so.

Section 14.3(2) provides that the authority in subsection (1) for an employer to withhold or make a deduction from an employee's tips or other gratuities if a statute or court order authorizes it does not apply if the statute or court order requires the employer to remit the amounts to a third person and the employer fails to do so.

For example, an employer may make statutory deductions for income tax, CPP or EI but fail to remit the funds on the employee's behalf to the Canada Revenue Agency as required. 1), Where the employer fails to remit the deducted tips or other gratuities, the requirement in ss. 14.3(2) is not met and the deduction is not permitted pursuant to ss. 14.3(1). As such, the employer is in violation of s. 14.2(1) since the deduction was not authorized under this Part. Per s. 14.2(2) the amount deducted is a debt owing to the employee and is enforceable under the ESA as if it were wages owing to the employee.

ESA Part V.1 Section 14.4 – Pooling of Tips or Other Gratuities

Pooling of Tips or Other Gratuities - s. 14.4(1)

14.4(1) An employer may withhold or make a deduction from an employee's tips or other gratuities or cause the employee to return or give them to the employer if the employer collects and redistributes tips or other gratuities among some or all of the employer's employees.

employees' tips or other gratuities if the employer collects and redistributes them among some or all of the employer's employees. (This is commonly referred to as a "tip pool".)

Tip pools include what is referred to as "tip outs", which are payments made from a tip-earning employee to a non tip-earning employee pursuant to their employer's policy. For example, an employer's policy may require a waiter to "tip out" a certain percentage of the waiter's tips or sales to the bartender who prepared drinks for the waiter.

This provision must be read in conjunction with subsections 14.4 (2) - (5), which place some restrictions on the ability of employers, directors and shareholders to participate in the redistribution under subsection 14.4(1).

The question may arise as to how much time the employer has to redistribute the tips or other gratuities before it can be said that the employer has failed to do so and is therefore in contravention of s. 14.2. There is no requirement in the Act for employers to establish a recurring period and day for the distribution of tips and other gratuities to employees. It is Program policy that the employer has a reasonable period of time to distribute the tips. What is reasonable will depend on the circumstances.

The criteria in this provision are not met unless "the employer collects and redistributes tips or other gratuities among some or all of the employer's employees". This means, for example, that where the only person to share in the tip pool is the sole proprietor who owns the business, there will be a violation of s. 14.2(1) because the tips that were withheld were not redistributed among some or all of the sole proprietor's employees.

Other than the limitations on participation in the tip pool that are established in subsections 14.4 (2) - (5) for the purposes of determining whether the withholding of tips is authorized under subsection 14.4(1), the Act does not regulate tip pools. For example, the Act:

- does not require a tip pool to be in the workplace,
- does not regulate who will participate in a tip pool,
- does not address the specific distribution within the tip pool (e.g., the percentage or amount received by employees),
- does not regulate how and when an employer can change the tip pool arrangement,
- does not require that tip pool arrangements be in writing,

- does not require that there be written agreements from employees in order for an employer to withhold an employee's tips for purposes of redistributing them as part of a tip pool.

It is Program policy that in order to be redistributing tips or other gratuities under this subsection, employers are required to distribute tips and other gratuities to employees in the form of cash, cheque or direct deposit (including Interac e-transfer). It is Program policy that providing prepaid credit cards to employees does not constitute a redistribution of tips or other gratuities within the meaning of this section.

Exception to Pooling of Tips or Other Gratuities - s. 14.4(2)

14.4(2) An employer shall not redistribute tips or other gratuities under subsection (1) to such employees as may be prescribed.

As of the publication date, no employees are prescribed.

Employer, etc. Not to Share in Tips or Other Gratuities - s. 14.4(3)

14.4(3) Subject to subsections (4) and (5), an employer or a director or shareholder of an employer may not share in tips or other gratuities redistributed under subsection (1).

Subject to ss. 14.4(4) and (5), employers, or directors or shareholders of an employer, are prohibited from sharing in the proceeds of a tip pool redistribution.

However, the Act does not prohibit employers, or directors or shareholders of an employer from keeping any tips or other gratuities that they earn themselves (e.g., tips or other gratuities that a customer intended them to receive). For example, a director of a company that operates a bar often works as a bartender at the bar. The Act does not prohibit the director from keeping tips that were left by a customer in such circumstances that a reasonable person would be likely to infer were intended for the director.

Exception - Sole proprietor, Partner - s. 14.4(4)

14.4(4) An employer who is a sole proprietor or a partner in a partnership may share in tips or other gratuities redistributed under subsection (1) if he or she regularly performs to a substantial degree the same work performed by,

(a) some or all of the employees who share in the redistribution; or

(b) employees of other employers in the same industry who commonly receive or share tips or other gratuities.

Subsection 14.4(3) prohibits employers from sharing in the proceeds of a tip pool redistribution, subject to the exception set out in this subsection.

This subsection provides that an employer who is a sole proprietor or a partner in a partnership may share in the proceeds of a tip pool redistribution if the sole proprietor or partner regularly performs to a substantial degree the same work that is performed by:

- some or all of the employees who share in the redistribution, or

- employees of other employees in the same industry who commonly receive or share tips or other gratuities.

“Regularly Performs to a Substantial Degree”

"Regularly" implies that the performance of the work is routine and predictable.

"[T]o a substantial degree" implies that the performance of the work takes up a considerable amount of the sole proprietor or partner's time.

The issue of whether a sole proprietor or a partner in a partnership regularly performs to a substantial degree the same work is determined on a case-by-case basis considering all of the relevant factors, including how routinely they perform the work and the predictability of its performance.

For example, if a sole proprietor who works eight hours per day waited tables every day for five hours during the lunch rush and the dinner rush, the Program would take the position that the sole proprietor was regularly performing those duties to a substantial degree.

However, if a partner acted as a bartender only when there was an unexpected rush of customers or when an employee called in sick and if neither of those events were a regular occurrence, the performance of these duties may not be considered regular because they are performed on an irregular and unpredictable basis. Similarly, if a partner who works 10 hours per day acted as a bartender for one hour per shift, these duties may not be considered performed to a substantial degree.

The Same Work Performed by Some or All of the Employees Who Share in the Redistribution

A sole proprietor or partner may share in the tip pool if they regularly perform to a substantial degree the same work as some or all of their employees who share in the tip pool.

For example, if the employees who receive a portion of the tip pool are hosts, servers, cooks and dishwashers, a sole proprietor or partner could share in the tip pool if they regularly performed the duties of hosts, servers, cooks or dishwashers, or a combination thereof, to a substantial degree.

The Same Work Performed by Employees of Other Employers Who Commonly Receive Tips or Share in Tip Redistribution

A sole proprietor or partner who does not regularly perform to a substantial degree the same work performed by some or all of the employees who share in the tip pool may nevertheless share in it if they regularly perform to a substantial degree the same work performed by employees of other employers in the same industry who commonly receive or share tips or other gratuities.

For example, a sole proprietor operates a restaurant in which the sole proprietor is the only bartender. Every day the sole proprietor spends six out of ten working hours bartending. The sole proprietor would be able to share in the tip pool because the sole proprietor regularly performs to a substantial degree the work of a bartender and bartenders in other restaurants commonly receive tips or share in the redistribution of tips or other gratuities.

Exception - Director, Shareholder - s. 14.4(5)

14.4(5) A director or shareholder of an employer may share in tips or other gratuities redistributed under subsection (1) if he or she regularly performs to a substantial degree the same work performed by,

(a) some or all of the employees who share in the redistribution; or

(b) employees of other employers in the same industry who commonly receive or share tips or other gratuities.

Subsection 14.4(3) prohibits directors and shareholders of an employer from sharing in the proceeds of a redistribution of a tip pool, subject to the exception set out in this subsection.

This subsection provides that a director or shareholder of an employer may share in the proceeds of a redistribution of a tip pool if the director or shareholder regularly performs to a substantial degree the same work that is performed by:

- some or all of the employees who share in the redistribution or
- employees of other employers in the same industry who commonly receive or share tips or other gratuities.

“Regularly Performs to a Substantial Degree”

"Regularly" implies that the performance of the work is routine and predictable.

"[T]o a substantial degree" implies that the performance of the work takes up a considerable amount of the director or shareholder's time. The issue of whether a director or a shareholder regularly performs to a substantial degree the same work is to be determined on a case-by-case basis considering all of the relevant factors, including how routinely they perform the work and the predictability of its performance.

For example, if a shareholder who works eight hours per day waited tables every day for five hours during the lunch rush and the dinner rush, the Program would take the position that the shareholder was regularly performing those duties to a substantial degree.

However, if a director acted as a bartender only when there was an unexpected rush of customers or when an employee called in sick and if neither of those events were a regular occurrence, the performance of these duties may not be considered regular because they are performed on an irregular and unpredictable basis. Similarly, if a director who works 10 hours per day acted as a bartender for one hour per shift, these duties may not be considered performed to a substantial degree.

The Same Work Performed by Some or All of the Employees Who Share in the Redistribution

A director or shareholder may share in redistribution of the tip pool if they regularly perform to a substantial degree the same work as some or all of their employees who are part of the tip pool.

For example, if the employees who receive a portion of the tip pool are hosts, servers, cooks and dishwashers, a director or shareholder could share in the tip pool if they regularly perform the duties of hosts, servers, cooks or dishwashers, or a combination thereof to a substantial degree.

The Same Work Performed by Employees of Other Employers Who Commonly Receive Tips or Share in their Redistribution

A director or shareholder who does not regularly perform to a substantial degree the same work performed by some or all of the employees who share in the tip pool may nonetheless share in it if they regularly perform to a substantial degree the same work performed by employees of other employers in the same industry who commonly receive or share tips or other gratuities.

For example, a director works at a restaurant in which the director is the only bartender. Every day the director spends six of ten working hours bartending. The director would be able to share in the tip pool because the director is regularly performing to a substantial degree the work of a bartender and bartenders in other restaurants commonly receive tips or other gratuities.

ESA Part V.1 Section 14.5 – Transition – Collective Agreements

Section 14.5 establishes transitional rules for situations where a collective agreement that was in effect when Part V.1 came into force contains provisions re: tips and other gratuities that conflict with Part V.1.

Part V.1 came into force on June 10, 2016.

Transition - Collective Agreements - s. 14.5(1)

14.5(1) If a collective agreement that is in effect on the day section 1 of the Protecting Employees' Tips Act, 2015 comes into force contains a provision that addresses the treatment of employee tips or other gratuities and there is a conflict between the provision of the collective agreement and this Part, the provision of the collective agreement prevails.

This subsection states that a term of a collective agreement that was in force on June 10, 2016 that addresses the treatment of employee tips or other gratuities will prevail over Part V.1 if there is a conflict.

For example, if a collective agreement that was ratified in June 2013 and in force on June 10, 2016 contained a provision that required employees to give half of all tips earned to the employer for the employer to keep, that provision would prevail even though such an arrangement would otherwise be prohibited under Part V.1.

Same - Expiry of Agreement - s. 14.5(2)

14.5(2) Following the expiry of a collective agreement described in subsection (1), if the provision that addresses the treatment of employee tips or other gratuities remains in effect, subsection (1) continues to apply to that provision, with necessary modifications, until a new or renewal agreement comes into effect.

This subsection states that where a collective agreement described in subsection (1) expires but the collective agreement provision addressing the treatment of employee tips or other gratuities remains in effect, subsection (1) (which allows that collective agreement provision to prevail over Part V.1 if there is a conflict) continues to apply with necessary modifications until a new or renewal collective agreement comes into effect.

For example, a collective agreement was ratified in June 2013 and in force June 1, 2016 that contained a provision that required employees to give half of all tips earned to the employer for the employer to keep. The collective agreement expired on August 1, 2016 and the provisions that address the treatment of tips or other gratuities remained in effect until the new agreement came into effect on October 1, 2016. That provision prevailed over Part V.1 until October 1, 2016 even though such an arrangement would otherwise be prohibited under Part V.1.

Same - Renewed or New Agreement - s. 14.5(3)

14.5(3) Subsection (1) does not apply to a collective agreement that is made or renewed on or after the day section 1 of the Protecting Employees' Tips Act, 2015 comes into force.

This subsection provides that subsection (1), which allows provisions in a collective agreement that conflict with Part V.1 to prevail, does not apply to collective agreements made or renewed on or after June 10, 2016.

In other words, terms of collective agreements that came into effect on or after June 10, 2016 that address the treatment of employee tips or other gratuities must comply with Part V.1 of the Act.

ESA Part VI - Records

Part VI of the Act (Records) imposes certain obligations on employers to create detailed records pertaining to the employment of each employee, and to retain those records over specified periods of time. These records may serve as evidence in the event of a complaint under the Act. The obligations with respect to keeping records of vacation time and pay in paragraph 6 of s. 15(1) and paragraph 5 of s. 15(5) of the Act were repealed and replaced by those set out in a new section (s. 15.1) by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18 ("GEA 2002") which came into force on November 26, 2002. In addition, the GEA 2002 amended the record-keeping obligations to add a requirement to keep records of the information provided in statements to employees upon the termination of employment in accordance with s. 12.1 (new).

ESA Part VI Section 15 – Records

Records – s. 15(1)

15(1) An employer shall record the following information with respect to each employee, including an employee who is a homeworker:

1. The employee's name and address.

2. The employee's date of birth, if the employee is a student and under 18 years of age.

3. The date on which the employee began his or her employment.

3.1 The dates and times that the employee worked.

3.2 If the employee has two or more regular rates of pay for work performed for the employer and, in a work week, the employee performed work for the employer in excess of the overtime threshold, the dates and times that the employee worked in excess of the overtime threshold at each rate of pay.

4. The number of hours the employee worked in each day and each week.

5. The information contained in each written statement given to the employee under subsection 12 (1), section 12.1, subsections 27 (2.1), 28 (2.1), 29 (1.1) and 30 (2.1) and clause 36 (3) (b).

Section 15(1) sets out the specific information that an employer is required to record and keep concerning the employment of each employee. This provision was amended by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017 c 22 amended this provision by adding new record keeping obligations in paragraphs 3.1 and 3.2.

The employer can choose their format for records, as the ESA 2000 does not provide specific formatting requirements. Instead, the ESA 2000 sets out what information must be captured and the time periods during which it must be maintained and kept readily available for inspection.

Accurate and complete records may provide evidence of compliance with other parts of the ESA 2000, although they are not necessarily conclusive. Where an employer has not made and kept complete records, the employment standards officer will be required to make a determination with respect to such issues as the employee's rate of pay and hours worked, etc., on the best evidence available.

In W.G. Wilson Transportation Inc. o/a Modern Cab v Aubertin (August 25, 1987), ESC 2259 (Aggarwal) Referee Aggarwal determined that where an employer fails to keep accurate records of hours worked by an employee, a record kept by the employee may provide the basis for calculating hours worked. The employer's argument that the employee's records are "self-serving" should be disregarded.

The employer's obligations in s. 15(1) are clear and specific. They shall record the following information with respect to all employees, including homeworkers:

1. Name and address
2. Date of birth, if employee is a student and under 18 – note that age is relevant under the ESA 2000 for the purposes of student minimum wage – see ESA Part IX, s. 23.1
3. Date employment commenced (start date)

3.1 The dates and times that the employee worked subject to the exception in s. 15(3)

- Section 15(3) – the requirement in s. 15(1), para. 3.1 does not apply to salaried employees if:
    - the employer records the number of excess hours in a regular work week and the number of hours in excess of eight hours per day; or
    - the number of hours in excess of the regular number of hours in the employee's regular work day;

3.2. If the employee has two or more regular rates of pay in a work week and performs work in excess of the overtime threshold, the dates and time the employee worked in excess of the overtime threshold at each rate of pay.

4. Number of hours worked by the employee in each day and each week subject to the following exceptions:
    - Section 15(3) – the requirement in s. 15(1), para. 4 does not apply to salaried employees if:
        - the employer records the number of excess hours in a regular work week and
        - the number of hours in excess of 8 hours per day; or the number of hours in excess of the regular number of hours in the employee's regular work day or

        - ESA Part VII, ss. 17 to 19 and ESA Part VIII (Overtime Pay) do not apply to the employee.
    - Section 11(3) of O Reg 285/01: an employer does not have to keep records of the number of hours worked in each day and each week by homemakers who are paid in accordance with O Reg 285/01, s. 11(2).
    - Section 23 of O Reg 285/01: an employer does not have to keep records of the number of hours worked in each day and each week by residential care workers.
5. The information contained in each employee's wage statement under ESA Part V, ss. 12(1) and 12.1, statements with respect to substitute public holidays under ESA Part X, ss. 27(2.1), 28(2.1), 29(1.1) and 30(2.1), and/or separate vacation pay statement as required under ESA Part XI, s. 36(3)(b).

Note the ESA does not require employers to keep records regarding tips and other gratuities. Furthermore, because tips and other gratuities do not fall within the definition of wages, there is no obligation for an employer to include information regarding tips and other gratuities on wage statements.

Homeworkers – s. 15(2)

15. (2) In addition to the record described in subsection (1), the employer shall maintain a register of any homeworkers the employer employs showing the following information:

1. The employee's name and address.

2. The information that is contained in all statements required to be provided to the employee described in clause 12(1)(b).

3. Any prescribed information.

This provision applies to employers of homeworkers. Under s. 15(2), an employer must maintain a register of any homeworker tthey employ. In addition to the requirements for records under s. 15(1), this register must contain the following information:

1. Homeworker's name and address
2. Wage rate (if there is one), and
3. Any information prescribed by the regulations (as of the time of writing, there is no prescribed information.)

Exception – s. 15(3)

15(3) An employer is not required to record the information described in paragraph 3.1 or 4 of subsection (1) with respect to an employee who is paid a salary if,

(a) the employer records the number of hours in excess of those in his or her regular work week and,

- i. the number of hours in excess of eight that the employee worked in each day, or
- ii. if the number of hours in the employee's regular work day is more than eight hours, the number in excess; or

(b) sections 17 to 19 and Part VIII (Overtime Pay) do not apply with respect to the employee.

Section 15(3) relieves an employer from the requirement to record the dates and times the employee worked and all daily and weekly hours worked by employees who are paid a salary as defined in s. 15(4) if:

1. The employer records the employee's weekly and daily excess hours of work; or
2. The provisions for overtime pay in ESA Part VII, ss. 17 to 19 (the provisions regarding maximum hours of work, time free from work and exceptional circumstances) and ESA Part VIII (Overtime Pay) do not apply to the employee.

Meaning of Salary – s. 15(4)

15(4) An employee is considered to be paid a salary for the purposes of subsection (3) if,

(a) the employee is entitled to be paid a fixed amount for each pay period; and

(b) the amount actually paid for each pay period does not vary according to the number of hours worked by the employee, unless he or she works more than 44 hours in a week.

This provision defines "salary" for the purposes of the record-keeping requirements of s. 15(3).

Where an employee receives a fixed payment for each pay period for services rendered to the employer, and where the payment does not vary by the number of hours the employee works (unless the hours are in excess of 44 hours per week), they are considered under s. 15(4) to be in receipt of a salary.

Section 15(4)(a) does not mean, however, that the pay per pay period can never change. For example, an employee would still be deemed to be a "salaried" employee where the employee receives a raise resulting from a change to the employment contract. In other words, an employee will be considered to be paid a salary, even though the salary may change, provided the change is long term rather than a consequence of a weekly fluctuation in hours worked.

Retention of Records – s. 15(5)

15(5) The employer shall retain or arrange for some other person to retain the records of the information required under this section for the following periods:

1. For information referred to in paragraph 1 or 3 of subsection (1), three years after the employee ceased to be employed by the employer.

2. For information referred to in paragraph 2 of subsection (1), the earlier of,

- i. three years after the employee's 18th birthday, or
- ii. three years after the employee ceased to be employed by the employer.

3. For information referred to in paragraph 3.1, 3.2, or 4 of subsection (1) or in subsection (3), three years after the day or week to which the information relates.

4. For information referred to in paragraph 5 of subsection (1), three years after the information was given to the employee.

Under s. 15(5), an employer must retain records or arrange for another person to retain them for stipulated three-year periods. Note that the retention periods with respect to vacation time and pay records is five years and are set out in s. 15.1.

It should also be noted that it is the responsibility of the employer to record and retain information for record-keeping purposes. Where an employer makes an arrangement for another person, such as a bookkeeper or accountant, to retain the records, the employer's responsibility to create the records is not removed. Further, an employer must also ensure that the records are readily available for inspection by an employment standards officer even where another person retains them – see the discussion at ESA Part VI, s. 16.

A manager's claim for wages cannot be disallowed simply because one of his duties was to properly complete records, including his own. In 634429 Ontario Limited c.o.b.a. Great Scott's Restaurant v Mayo et al (January 2, 1987), ESC 2204 (Bryant), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act,

Referee Bryant stated "Under section 11 of the ... Act the employer is responsible for maintaining accurate records relating to the employee's performance of work." See also Village of West Lorne v Orchard (February 15, 1985), ESC 1787 (Brown).

Employment standards officers should note that any information they give to an employer regarding the retention periods of records must be limited to the requirements of the ESA 2000. Some records may be required by other legislation, either federal or provincial, (e.g., the federal Income Tax Act) for longer time periods.

Occasionally, enquiries are received as to whether the Program or Director of Employment Standards will authorize the destruction of records after the stipulated three-year periods. The response should be that the ESA 2000 requires records to be maintained for certain periods and is not contravened if records are not kept beyond the expiry of those time periods. The ESA 2000, however, does not empower the Director to authorize the destruction of records.

Register of Homeworkers – s. 15(6)

15(6) Information pertaining to a homeworker may be deleted from the register three years after the homeworker ceases to be employed by the employer.

This provision permits an employer to remove information concerning the employment of a homeworker in their employ, from the register, three years after the homeworker's employment has ended.

Retain Documents Re Leave – s. 15(7)

15(7) An employer shall retain or arrange for some other person to retain all notices, certificates, correspondence and other documents given to or produced by the employer that relate to an employee taking pregnancy leave, parental leave, family medical leave, organ donor leave, family caregiver leave, critical illness leave, child death leave, crime-related child disappearance leave, domestic or sexual violence leave, sick leave, family responsibility leave, bereavement leave, emergency leave during a declared emergency or an infectious disease emergency or reservist leave for three years after the day on which the leave expired.

This provision was amended effective March 19, 2020 as a result of the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Infectious Disease Emergencies), 2020 to include a reference to infectious disease emergency leave.

It was previously amended effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018 to reflect new Part XIV Leaves of Absence that replaced personal emergency leave – sick leave, family responsibility leave and bereavement leave.

Section 15(7) requires an employer to retain (or arrange for some other person to retain) all notices, certificates, correspondence and other documents relating to any leave taken by an employee under ESA Part XIV Leaves of Absence. The documents must be retained for a period of three years after the end of the leave. The employer must also ensure that these documents are readily available for inspection by an employment standards officer, upon request, in keeping with ESA Part VI, s. 16.

The documents that must be retained include the following:

Pregnancy Leave:

- Section 46(4)(a): written notice to take pregnancy leave
- Section 46(4)(b): medical certificate stating due date, if requested
- Section 46(5): written notice to change pregnancy leave start date
- Section 46(6)(a): written notice of the day pregnancy leave began or is to begin because of a complication, birth, still-birth or miscarriage
- Section 46(6)(b)(i): medical certificate if requested: unable to work, due date
- Section 46(6)(b)(ii): medical certificate if requested: due date, actual date of birth, still-birth or miscarriage
- Section 47(2): written notice to end pregnancy leave early
- Section 47(3): written notice to change end date of pregnancy leave
- Section 47(4): written notice to resign from employment on or before end of pregnancy leave

Parental Leave:

- Section 48(4): written notice to take parental leave
- Section 48(5): written notice to change parental leave start date
- Section 48(6): written notice provided after commencing parental leave where the child comes into the employee's custody, care and control for the first time earlier than expected
- Section 49(2): written notice to end parental leave early
- Section 49(3): written notice to change parental leave end date
- Section 49(4): written notice to resign from employment on or before end of parental leave

Family Medical Leave:

- Section 49.1(8): written notice to take family medical leave
- Section 49.1(9): written notice provided after commencing family medical leave
- Section 49.1(10): medical certificate if requested: individual has a serious medical condition with a significant risk of death occurring within a period of 26 weeks
- Section 52.1: written agreement (if there was one) of the employer allowing an employee to return to work during a week they took leave (note: a s. 52.1 agreement does not have to be in writing)

Organ Donor Leave:

- Sections 49.2(14): medical certificate(s), if requested
- Section 49.2(11): written notice to end organ donor leave early
- Section 49.2(12): written notice to take or extend organ donor leave
- Section 49.2(13): written notice provided after commencing or extending organ donor leave

Family Caregiver Leave:

- Section 49.3(6): written notice to take family caregiver leave
- Section 49.3(7): written notice provided after commencing family caregiver leave
- Section 49.3(8): copy of medical certificate, if requested

Critical Illness Leave:

- Section 49.4(17): written notice to take leaveand a written plan indicating the weeks in which the leave will be taken
- Section 49.4(18): written notice provided after commencing leaveand a written plan indicating the weeks in which the leave will be taken
- Section 49.4(19): written request to change when leave will be taken and employer's written permission, or employee's written notice of the change
- Section 49.4(20): copy of medical certificate, if requested

Sick Leave:

- Sections 50(3) and (4): any documents advising employer that sick leave will be, is being or has been taken
- Section 50(6): any document provided to the employer as evidence to support employee's entitlement to the leave

Family Responsibility Leave:

- Sections 50.0.1(4) and (5): any documents advising employer that family responsibility leave will be, is being or has been taken
- Section 50.0.1(7): any document provided to the employer as evidence to support employee's entitlement to the leave

Bereavement Leave:

- Sections 50.0.2(4) and (5): any documents advising employer that bereavement leave will be, is being or has been taken
- Section 50.0.2(7): any document provided to the employer as evidence to support employee's entitlement to the leave

Personal Emergency Leave (repealed – in effect prior to January 1, 2019):

- Previous sections 50(3) and (4): any documents advising employer that personal emergency leave will be, is being or has been taken
- Previous section 50(12): any document provided to the employer as evidence to support employee's entitlement to the leave

Declared Emergency Leave:

- Sections 50.1(2) and (3): any documents advising employer that declared emergency leave will be, is being or has been taken
- Section 50.1(4): any document provided to the employer as evidence to support employee's entitlement to leave

Infectious Disease Emergency Leave:

- Sections 50.1(2) and (3): any documents advising employer that infectious disease emergency leave will be, is being or has been taken
- Section 50.1(4.1): any document provided to the employer as evidence to support employee's entitlement to leave

Reservist Leave:

- Sections 50.2(5) and (6): written notice advising the employer that reservist leave will be or is being taken, see also s. 50.2(1) for the requirement for notice to be in writing
- Section 50.2(7): any document provided to the employer as evidence to support employee's entitlement to the leave
- Section 50.2(9): written notice of intention to end the leave, see also s. 50.2(1) for the requirement for notice to be in writing

Child Death Leave:

- Sections 49.5(7) and (8): written notice that child death leave will be, is being or has been taken and a written plan indicating the weeks in which the leave will be taken
- Section 49.5(9): written request to change when leave will be taken and employer’s written permission or employee’s written notice of the change
- Section 49.5(10): any document provided to the employer as evidence to support employee's entitlement to the leave

Crime-Related Child Disappearance Leave:

- Sections 49.6(11) and (12): any documents advising employer that crime-related child disappearance leave will be, is being or has been taken
- Section 49.5(13):written request to change when leave will be taken and employer’s written permission or employee’s written notice of the change
- Section 49.5(14): any document provided to the employer as evidence to support employee's entitlement to the leave

Domestic or Sexual Violence Leave

- Sections 49.7(10) and (11): any documents advising employer that domestic or sexual violence leave per s.49.7(4)(a) (the 10 day entitlement) will be, is being or has been taken (note that the employee is not required to provide notice in writing under this subsection)

- Sections 49.7(13) and (14): written notice that domestic or sexual violence leave per s.49.7(4)(b) (the 15 week entitlement) will be, is being or has been taken
- Section 49.7(15): any document provided to the employer as evidence to support employee's entitlement to the leave
- Further, note that per s. 49.7(17), the employer is required to protect the confidentiality of records either given to the employer by the employee or produced by the employer. The release of these records is subject to the limits of s. 49.7(14).

All Leaves (Excluding Reservist Leave except where noted):

- Section 51(1): written election to opt out of benefit plan(s) during leave
- Section 51(3): written notice of employee's intention not to pay employee's contribution(s) to benefit plan(s) - includes Reservist Leave during period of postponement under s. 53(1.1)
- Sections 51.1(1), (2): any written agreement regarding deferral of vacation - includes Reservist Leave

Retention of Agreements Re Excess Hours – s. 15(8)

15(8) An employer shall retain or arrange for some other person to retain copies of every agreement that the employer has made with an employee permitting the employee to work hours in excess of the limits set out in subsection 17(1) for three years after the last day on which work was performed under the agreement.

Section 15(8) requires employers to retain copies of agreements to work excess daily or weekly hours for three years after the last day on which work was performed under the agreement. The employer must retain or arrange for another person to retain these records. The employer must also ensure that the copies are readily available for inspection by an employment standards officer, upon request, in keeping with the requirements of ESA Part VI, s. 16.

Retention of Disconnecting From Work Policies – s. 15(8.1)

15 (8.1) An employer shall retain or arrange for some other person to retain copies of every written policy on disconnecting from work required under Part VII.0.1 for three years after the policy ceases to be in effect.

Subsection 15(8.1) was added to the ESA effective December 2, 2021. This provision requires employers to retain copies of every written policy on disconnecting from work required under Part VII.0.1 for three years after the policy ceases to be in effect. The employer must retain or arrange for another person to retain these records. The employer must also ensure that the copies are readily available for inspection by an employment standards officer, upon request, in keeping with the requirements of ESA Part VI, s. 16.

Retention of Averaging Agreements – s. 15(9)

15(9) An employer shall retain or arrange for some other person to retain copies of every averaging agreement that the employer has made with an employee under clause 22(2)(a) for three years after the last day on which work was performed under the agreement.

Section 15(9) requires employers to retain copies of agreements to average hours of work that were made under ESA Part VIII, s. 22(2)(a) for the purpose of calculating overtime pay entitlements for three years after the last day on which work was performed under the agreement. The employer must retain or arrange for another person to retain these records. The employer must also ensure that the copies are readily available for inspection by an employment standards officer, upon request, in keeping with the requirements of ESA Part VI, s. 16.

ESA Part VI Section 15.1 - Record Re Vacation Time and Vacation Pay

Record Re Vacation Time and Vacation Pay - s. 15.1(1)

15.1(1) An employer shall record information concerning an employee's entitlement to vacation time and vacation pay in accordance with this section.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017 c 22, effective January 1, 2018, amended this provision to add record keeping obligations with respect to the vacation pay earned in each vacation entitlement period. Section 15.1 should be read together with ESA Part XI, s. 41.1, which sets out employees' rights to a statement of the information recorded under this section.

Content of Record - s. 15.1(2)

15.1(2) The employer shall record the following information:

1. The amount of vacation time, if any, that the employee had earned since the start of employment but had not taken before the start of the vacation entitlement year.

2. The amount of vacation time that the employee earned during the vacation entitlement year.

3. The amount of vacation time, if any, taken by the employee during the vacation entitlement year.

4. The amount of vacation time, if any that the employee had earned since the start of employment but had not taken as of the end of the vacation entitlement year.

4.1 The amount of vacation pay that the employee earned during the vacation entitlement year and how that amount was calculated.

5. The amount of vacation pay paid to the employee during the vacation entitlement year.

6. The amount of wages on which the vacation pay referred to in paragraph 5 was calculated and the period of time to which those wages relate.

Section 15.1(2) sets out the record keeping requirements for both vacation time and pay with respect to each completed vacation entitlement year as follows:

- Vacation time earned since the date of hire but not taken before the start of the vacation entitlement year
- Vacation time earned during the vacation entitlement year
- Vacation taken during the vacation entitlement year
- Balance of vacation time remaining at the end of the vacation entitlement year
- Vacation pay earned during vacation entitlement year and how the amount was calculated (effective January 1, 2018 - see s. 15.1(7) for transitional provisions)
- Vacation pay paid during the vacation entitlement year, and
- The amount of wages on which the vacation pay paid during the vacation entitlement year was calculated and the period of time to which those wages relate.

Additional Requirement, Alternative Vacation Entitlement Year - s. 15.1(3)

15.1(3) If the employer establishes an alternative vacation entitlement year for an employee, the employer shall record the following information for the stub period:

1. The amount of vacation time that the employee earned during the stub period.

2. The amount of vacation time, if any, that the employee took during the stub period.

3. The amount of vacation time, if any, earned but not taken by the employee during the stub period.

3.1 The amount of vacation pay that the employee earned during the stub period and how that amount was calculated.

4. The amount of vacation pay paid to the employee during the stub period.

5. The amount of wages on which the vacation pay referred to in paragraph 4 was calculated and the period of time to which those wages relate.

Section 15.1(3) establishes the recordkeeping obligations with respect to vacation time and pay earned and taken in a stub period as follows:

- Vacation time earned during the stub period
- Vacation time taken during the stub period
- Amount of vacation time earned but not taken during the stub period
- Vacation pay earned during stub period and how that amount was calculated (effective January 1, 2018 - see s. 15.1(7) for transitional provisions)
- Vacation pay paid to the employee during the stub period, and
- The amount of wages on which the vacation pay paid during the stub period was calculated and the period of time to which those wages relate.

When Information to Be Recorded - s. 15.1(4)

15.1(4) The employer shall record information under this section by a date that is not later than the later of,

a) seven days after the start of the next vacation entitlement year or the first vacation entitlement year, as the case may be; and

b) the first pay day of the next vacation entitlement year or of the first vacation entitlement year, as the case may be.

Section 15.1 (4) requires the employer to make a record of the information regarding vacation time and pay for each vacation entitlement year and stub period no later than seven days after the completion of the vacation entitlement year or stub period, or the first pay day following the completion of the vacation entitlement year or stub period, whichever is later.

Retention of Records - s. 15.1(5)

15.1(5) The employer shall retain or arrange for some other person to retain each record required under this section for five years after it was made.

Similar to the record retention obligations established under s. 15(5), it is the employer's responsibility to retain the information recorded under s. 15.1. The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017 c 22, effective January 1, 2018, amended this provision to increase the record retention period for records made under this section from three years to five years after they are made. The records may be retained by either the employer or some other person as arranged by the employer.

Note that if the employer does arrange for some other person to retain the records, this does not relieve the employer of the requirement to create the records.

Exception - s. 15.1(6)

15.1(6) Paragraphs 5 and 6 of subsection (2) and paragraphs 4 and 5 of subsection (3) do not apply with respect to an employee whose employer pays vacation pay in accordance with subsection 36(3).

Section 15.1(6) exempts employers from the obligation to record vacation pay paid during the vacation entitlement year and stub period, the amount of wages on which vacation pay were calculated and the period to which those wages relate, if the employer pays vacation pay in accordance with ESA Part XI, s. 36(3) (as amended). Under s. 36(3) an employer and employee may agree that the vacation pay that accrues over each pay period will be paid on the pay day for that pay period. In that case, the employer is required to provide the employee with a statement of the vacation pay paid either as part of the statement of wages provided under ESA Part V, s. 12(1), as per s. 36(3)(a), or separately as per s. 36(3)(b).

However, s. 15(1), paragraph 5 states that the employer is required to record the information provided to the employee in a statement given to the employee under s. 12(1) or s. 36(3)(b). An employer pays vacation pay in accordance with s. 36(3) if the statement of wages provided under s. 12(1) includes the amount of vacation pay paid or the employer provides a separate statement of vacation pay as per s. 36(3)(b).

As a result, where the employer pays vacation pay in accordance with s. 36(3), the employer is relieved by s. 15.1(6) of the requirement to make a record with respect to vacation pay paid and the wages on which it was calculated and the period to which those wages relate for a vacation entitlement year or stub period, but the employer must still record the vacation pay information provided on each pay day for each pay period either as part of the s. 12(1) statement of wages or on a separate statement as per s. 36(3)(b) in accordance with paragraph 5 of s. 15(1).

Transition – s. 15.1(7)

15.1(7) Subsections 15.1 (2) and (3), as they read immediately before the day section 9 of Schedule 1 to the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 came into force, continue to apply with respect to vacation entitlement years and stub periods that began before that day.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 SO 2017, c 22 added this provision, effective January 1, 2018. Section 15.1(7) is the transitional provision for the application of the new record keeping obligations for vacation pay earned during a vacation entitlement year in para 4.1 of s. 15.1(2) and the vacation pay earned during a stub period in para 3.1 of s. 15.1(3).

It provides that these new record keeping obligations do not apply to any vacation entitlement year or stub period that began before January 1, 2018.

ESA Part VI Section 16 - Availability

16 An employer shall ensure that all of the records and documents required to be retained under sections 15 and 15.1 are readily available for inspection as required by an employment standards officer even if the employer has arranged for another person to retain them.

Section 16 is intended to prevent unnecessary delays in the production of an employer's records during an investigation under the Act. An employer is expected to produce records made under ss. 15 and 15.1 promptly upon request by an employment standards officer, whether the employer is in possession of the records, or has arranged for another person to retain them.

Where an employer has arranged for another person to retain the records at a location other than the workplace, it remains the employer's responsibility to produce them, within a reasonable period of time, upon the request of an employment standards officer.

ESA Part VII - Hours of Work and Eating Periods

The original limits on working hours of women and children and youths created in 1884 were motivated by health and safety concerns. Although the 1944 legislation retained the health and safety emphasis, a greater emphasis was placed on job creation and the desire to spread work as the armed forces returned to the civilian labour force. The hours of work provisions in the Employment Standards Act, 2000 allow workplace parties, with some Ministry oversight, to arrange work schedules to suit their needs. The amendments that came into force on March 1, 2005 contain measures that increase employee and employer awareness of their hours of work rights and obligations. Provisions that ensure that employees receive hours free from work in between shifts and on a daily and weekly or bi-weekly basis continue to apply.

ESA Part VII Section 17 – Limit on Hours of Work

Section 17 was amended and sections 17.1, 17.2 and 17.3 were repealed effective April 3, 2019 as a result of the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 (ROCA), which removed the requirement to obtain approval of the Director of Employment Standards to exceed the limit on weekly hours of work.

The discussion of these provisions as they existed prior to April 3, 2019 has been maintained in this publication since employees may still file a complaint relating to a situation that arose prior to the ROCA amendments. That text appears at the end of this section, in red, to highlight that the discussion reflects the pre-April 3, 2019 language of sections 17, 17.1, 17.2 and 17.3.

Limit on Hours of Work – s. 17(1)

17(1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), no employer shall require or permit an employee to work more than,

(a) eight hours in a day or, if the employer establishes a regular work day of more than eight hours for the employee, the number of hours in his or her regular work day; and

(b) 48 hours in a work week.

Section 17(1) sets out the daily and weekly maximum hours that an employer may require or allow an employee to work:

- Daily maximum: eight hours per day or, if there is an established work day that is longer than eight hours, the number of hours in that work day.
- Weekly maximum: 48 hours per work week.

This provision allows employees to refuse to work hours in excess of eight per day, or in excess of the number of hours in a longer established regular work day, and 48 hours in a work week.

The limits on hours of work in s. 17(1) are subject to the following exceptions:

- Section 17(2), which allows employees to agree in writing to work hours in excess of the s. 17(l)(a) daily limit;
- Section 17(3), which allows employees to agree in writing to work hours in excess of the s. 17(1)(b) weekly limit;

- Where there are exceptional circumstances as set out in s. 19.

Note also that the limit on daily hours of work contained in s. 17(1)(a) does not apply to certain employees hired before September 4, 2001, who entered into arrangements to work hours in excess of those in their regular work day. See O Reg 285/01, s. 32.1.

Regular Work Day of More than Eight Hours

The daily maximum number of hours of work an employer can require or allow an employee to work is eight or, if the employer establishes a regular work day of more than eight hours for the employee, the number of hours in their regular work day.

While the ESA 2000 does not explicitly set out the maximum number of hours a regular work day can be, the ability to establish a regular work day longer than eight hours remains subject to the weekly hours of work limit in s. 17(1)(b), as well as the requirement for daily rest contained in ESA Part VII, s. 18.

"Regular work day" is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1(1) to mean "with respect to an employee who usually works the same number of hours each day, means a day of that many hours". Because the word "usually" is used, an employee does not have to work the same number of hours every work day to establish a regular work day. A regular work day can be established so long as an employee ordinarily works a set number of hours.

An employer may establish a schedule where employees work different numbers of hours on different days of the week. For example, employees work 10 hours Mondays to Thursdays and eight hours on Fridays. It is Program policy that the regular work day from Monday to Thursday is 10 hours and eight hours on Friday. Note that the employer will have to pay overtime pay for four hours in this example (assuming the employee has a 44-hour overtime threshold).

Changing What the Regular Work Day Is

The ESA 2000 does not prohibit an employer from adjusting the regular work day on occasion. That is, so far as the ESA 2000 is concerned, the employer may establish a different regular work day than what it had previously established.

For example, consider an employer that has the following schedule:

- Monday: 10 hours
- Tuesday: 10 hours
- Wednesday: 10 hours
- Thursday: 8 hours
- Friday: 8 hours

The employer wishes to establish the following amended schedule:

- Monday: 11 hours
- Tuesday: 11 hours
- Wednesday: 10 hours
- Thursday: 8 hours
- Friday: 8 hours

The ESA 2000 does not prohibit the employer from establishing a new regular work day of 11 hours for Mondays and Tuesdays.

Furthermore, the employer may want to return to the original schedule after, for example, several months. Nothing in the ESA 2000 prohibits this further change to the schedule.

However, the definition of regular work day contemplates that the employee usually works a specific number of hours on a particular day. The more frequently the employer changes the schedule in relation to a particular day of the week, the less likely it is that the employee could be said to have a usual number of hours on a particular day of the week. In other words, the facts may reveal that there is no regular work day, in which case the daily limit in s. 17(1)(a) for that employee will be eight – subject to the exceptions to this limit set out in s. 17(2) and s. 19.

Note also that while the ESA 2000 does not prohibit the employer from changing the regular work day, there may be restrictions against doing so in an employee's employment contract. In this case, it may amount to a breach of the employment contract for the employer to change the regular work day, which may give rise to a constructive dismissal under the ESA 2000 or at common law.

"Work Week"

ESA Part I, s. 1 defines "work week" as:

(a) a recurring period of seven consecutive days selected by the employer for the purpose of scheduling work, or

(b) if the employer has not selected such a period, a recurring period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

In ascertaining the recurring period of seven consecutive days established by the employer for the purpose of scheduling work, if any, an employment standards officer may consider such information as work schedules, time cards and pay periods, although these are not necessarily the same as the work week. In the absence of the employer having established a recurring period of seven consecutive days for the purpose of scheduling work, a default work week of Sunday to Saturday will apply.

Determining the Number of Hours Worked by an Employee – O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1

O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1 sets out the circumstances in which work is deemed to be performed or not deemed to be performed. This provision is essential in determining the number of hours of work under this Part. Note that O Reg 285/01, s. 22 sets out special rules regarding when work is not deemed to be performed for residential care workers.

O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1 provides as follows:

1.1(1) Subject to subsection (2), work shall be deemed to be performed by an employee for the employer,

(a) where work is,

(i) permitted or suffered to be done by the employer, or

(ii) in fact performed by an employee although a term of the contract of employment expressly forbids or limits hours of work or requires the employer to authorize hours of work in advance; or

(b) where the employee is not performing work and is required to remain at the place of employment,

(i) waiting or holding himself or herself ready for call to work, or

(ii) on a rest or break-time other than an eating period.

1.1(2) Work shall not be deemed to be performed for an employer during the time the employee,

(a) is entitled to,

(i) take time off work for an eating period,

(ii) take at least six hours or such longer period as is established by contract, custom or practice for sleeping and the employer furnishes sleeping facilities, or

(iii) take time off work in order to engage in the employee's own private affairs or pursuits as is established by contract, custom or practice; or

(b) is not at the place of employment and is waiting or holding himself or herself ready for call to work.

See the detailed discussion of these provisions in O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1.

Exception: Hours in a Day – s. 17(2)

17(2) An employee's hours of work may exceed the limit set out in clause (1)(a) if the employee has made an agreement with the employer that he or she will work up to a specified number of hours in a day in excess of the limit and his or her hours of work in a day do not exceed the number specified in the agreement.

Section 17(2) permits employers and employees to agree, in writing, that the employee will work up to a specified number of hours in excess of the daily limit set out in s. 17(1)(a) – see ESA Part 1, s. 1(3) and s. 1(3.1) for a discussion of agreements in writing.

Section 17(2) must be read in conjunction with s. 17(5), which provides that s. 17(2) agreements are not valid unless:

- The employer, before the agreement is made, gives the employee a copy of a document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards that describes the rights of employees and obligations of employers under the hours of work and overtime pay provisions. The document must be the most recent version published by the Director;

  and

- The agreement contains a statement by the employee acknowledging receipt of the document. The statement must indicate that the employer represented that the document is the most recent version published by the Director.

In addition, the agreement must clearly set out what is being agreed upon. It must be written with sufficient clarity for the parties to know precisely what they are agreeing to. If one of the parties drafted the agreement, and a particular term is ambiguous and the parties disagree about what the term means, the term will be construed against the parties who drafted the agreement – this is called the contra proferentem rule. The parties must have entered into the agreement voluntarily. Please see ESA Part I, s. 1(3) for a more detailed discussion of the issue of voluntary consent.

Agreements to work excess daily hours can specify the exact number of hours that the employee is agreeing to work, the exact number of hours over and above the daily limit, or they can specify an upper limit (e.g., "up to 10 hours a day").

This section contemplates both "one-off" agreements, where the employee agrees in writing to work excess daily hours on a single occasion, and more open-ended "as required" agreements, where the employee agrees in writing to work a specified number of excess daily hours whenever required by the employer. For example, a retail employer preparing for the busy Christmas season may ask an employee to agree to "with two days' notice, work up to 12 hours a day during the months of November and December of this year."

Agreements under s. 17(2) to work excess daily hours and agreements under s. 17(3) to work excess weekly hours are two separate agreements, although they can be embodied in the same document.

Note that there may be some circumstances in which what appears to be a single agreement with respect to excess daily hours by necessary implication includes an agreement with respect to excess weekly hours, and vice versa. For example, an employee regularly works nine hours a day, five days a week. On the fifth day of the week, the employee agrees in writing to exceed the daily limit and work four additional hours. By necessary implication, the employee has also agreed to work in excess of 48 hours in that work week, and the employee will be permitted to work those excess hours. Or the same employee, who regularly works nine hours a day, whose employer operates only five days a week, enters into an agreement to work up to 60 hours per work week when required – in these circumstances, the employee, by necessary implication, has also agreed to work excess daily hours.

In attempting to facilitate opportunities to work excess hours, employers have inquired as to whether a signature on a sign-up sheet for additional hours might be considered a valid written agreement under s. 17(2). The Program's view is that such a document would be valid if all of the following conditions are met:

- The employee has been given the most recent information document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards;
- The sign-up sheet clearly states that the employee has been given what they are told is the most recent such document;
- The sign-up sheet clearly states that the employee is agreeing to work a specified number or up to a specified number of excess hours;
- The employee initials or signs the sheet; and
- The employee in so initialing or signing understands that they were signifying their assent to the statements on the sign-up sheet.

The requirement regarding the Director's information document in s. 17(5) does not apply to employees who are represented by a trade union – see s. 17(9)(b). Furthermore, different rules regarding the Director's information document apply to employers who entered into agreements with employees to work excess daily hours under the provisions of the ESA 2000 before March 1, 2005, the date on which the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004, SO 2004, c 21 came into force. In particular, because the agreements were entered into under a scheme when the requirement of s. 17(5) was not in force, the conditions for a valid agreement in s. 17(5) do not apply to such employers. See s. 17(9). (Pursuant to a now-repealed provision – ss. 17(10) – the employer was required to provide the information document to employees by June 1, 2005.)

In the absence of a valid written agreement, the daily limit on hours of work in s. 17(1)(a) applies, and the employer may not require or even permit an employee to work excess daily hours, unless exceptional circumstances within the meaning of ESA Part VII, s. 19 are present.

Agreements to work excess daily hours can generally be revoked by employees with two weeks' written notice and generally with reasonable notice by employers – see ss. 17(6) and (7), respectively. It is, however, the Program's position that in situations where an agreement to work excess hours is made pursuant to a collective agreement, the ability to revoke the agreement to work excess hours must be made in accordance with the terms of the collective agreement and the Labour Relations Act, 1995, SO 1995, c 1, Sch A, where applicable. Generally, this means that unilateral revocation is not possible during the operation of the collective agreement.

Employers are required to retain a copy of every excess daily (and weekly) hours agreement it has made with its employees for three years after the last day on which work was performed under each agreement – see ESA Part VI, s. 15(8).

Exception: Hours in a Work Week – s. 17(3)

17(3) An employee's hours of work may exceed the limit set out in clause (1)(b) if the employee has made an agreement with the employer that he or she will work up to a specified number of hours in a work week in excess of the limit and his or her hours of work in a work week do not exceed the number of hours specified in the agreement.

Subsection 17(3) was amended effective April 3, 2019 by the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 (ROCA). The ROCA removed the previous requirement to obtain approval of the Director of Employment Standards to exceed the limit on weekly hours of work.

Section 17(3) permits employees' hours of work to exceed the weekly limit of 48 hours in a work week if the employee enters into an agreement with the employer providing that the employee will work up to a specified number of hours in a work week, and the employees' hours of work do not exceed the number of hours specified in the agreement. The agreement must be in writing to be valid – see ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and (3.1) for a discussion of agreements in writing.

In a non-unionized workplace, each employee has the right on an individual basis to enter into agreements to work excess weekly hours. For employees represented by a trade union, the written agreement may be embodied in the collective agreement, a memorandum of agreement or an addendum to an agreement. All bargaining unit members are bound by such an agreement. In this regard, see the discussion of ESA Part III, s. 7.

This section must be read in conjunction with s. 17(5), which provides that s. 17(3) agreements are not valid unless:

- The employer, before the agreement is made, gives the employee a copy of a document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards that describes the rights of employees and obligations of employers under the hours of work and overtime pay provisions. The document must be the most recent version published by the Director.

and

- The agreement contains a statement by the employee acknowledging receipt of the document. The statement must indicate that the employer represented that the document is the most recent version published by the Director.

In addition, the agreement must clearly set out what is being agreed upon. It must be written with sufficient clarity for the parties to know precisely what they are agreeing to. The parties must have entered into the agreement voluntarily. Please see ESA Part I, s. 1(3) for a more detailed discussion of the issue of voluntary consent.

Agreements to work excess weekly hours can specify the exact number of hours that the employee is agreeing to work, the exact number of hours over and above the weekly limit, or they can specify an upper limit (e.g., "up to 60 hours a week").

This section contemplates both "one-off" agreements, where the employee agrees in writing to work excess weekly hours on a single occasion, and more open-ended "as required" agreements, where the employee agrees in writing to work a specified number of excess weekly hours whenever required by the employer. For example, a retail employer preparing for the busy Christmas season may ask an employee to agree to "with two days' notice, work up to 60 hours a week during the months of November and December of this year."

Agreements under s. 17(2) to work excess daily hours and agreements under s. 17(3) to work excess weekly hours are two separate agreements, although they can be embodied in the same document.

Note that there may be some circumstances in which what appears to be a single agreement with respect to excess daily hours by necessary implication includes an agreement with respect to excess weekly hours, and vice versa. For example, an employee regularly works nine hours a day, five days a week. On the fifth day of the week, the employee agrees in writing to exceed the daily limit and work four additional hours. By necessary implication, the employee has also agreed to work in excess of 48 hours in that work week, and the employee will be permitted to work those excess hours. Or if the same employee, who regularly works nine hours a day and whose employer operates only five days a week, enters into an agreement to work up to 60 hours per work week when required, that employee by necessary implication, has also agreed to work excess daily hours.

In attempting to facilitate opportunities to work excess hours, employers have inquired as to whether a signature on a sign-up sheet for additional hours might be considered a valid written agreement under s. 17(3). The Program's view is that such a document would be valid if all of the following conditions are met:

- The employee has been given the most recent information document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards;
- The sign-up sheet clearly states that the employee has been given what they are told is the most recent such document;
- The sign-up sheet clearly states that the employee is agreeing to work a specified number or up to a specified number of excess hours;
- The employee initials or signs the sheet; and

- The employee in so initialing or signing understands that they were signifying their assent to the statements on the sign-up sheet.

The requirement regarding the Director's information document in s. 17(5) does not apply to employees who are represented by a trade union – see s. 17(9)(b). Furthermore, different rules regarding the Director's information document apply to employers who entered into agreements with employees to work excess weekly hours before March 1, 2005, the date the amendments to the ESA 2000 requiring that the Director's information document be given to employees came into force – see s. 17(9).

In the absence of a valid written agreement, the weekly limit on hours of work in s. 17(1)(b) applies, and the employer may not require or even permit an employee to work excess weekly hours, unless exceptional circumstances within the meaning of s. 19 are present.

Agreements to work excess weekly hours can generally be revoked by employees with two weeks' written notice – see s. 17(6). Agreements to work excess weekly hours can generally be revoked by employers with reasonable notice – see s. 17(7).

The general right to revoke agreements is limited where the agreement is made between a union and the employer. It is the Program's position that in situations where an agreement to work excess hours is made pursuant to a collective agreement, the ability to revoke the agreement to work excess hours must be made in accordance with the terms of the collective agreement and the Labour Relations Act, 1995 where applicable. Generally, this means that unilateral revocation is not possible during the operation of the collective agreement.

Employers are required to retain a copy of every excess weekly and daily hours agreement it has made with its employees for three years after the last day on which work was performed under each agreement – see ESA Part VI, s. 15(8).

Transition: Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 – Impact on pre-existing Director Approvals

Effective April 3, 2019, the excess weekly hours scheme was changed as a result of the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 (ROCA). Prior to the ROCA amendments, the weekly maximum of 48 hours could be exceeded only if there was a written agreement between the employee and employer and the employer had received the approval of the Director of Employment Standards (or, pursuant to a limited exception, in situations where Director approval was pending and certain conditions were met).

As of April 3, 2019, the Director's approval is no longer necessary; excess weekly hours can be worked if the employee and employer entered into a valid written agreement to exceed the limit on weekly hours of work and meet the other required conditions.

One question that might arise is what effect the ROCA amendments had on Director's approvals that were issued pre-ROCA with a post-ROCA expiry date that were in force on April 3, 2019. As of April 3,2019, the Director's approval ceased to have any effect and the valid written agreement between the employer and the employee became determinative of the arrangement.

There may be circumstances where the terms of the agreement between the employee and the employer differ from those that were contained in the Director approval. For example, take the situation of an employee and employer who entered into a written agreement stating that the employee would work up to 65 hours per week but, the Director of Employment Standards provided an approval only for up to 60 hours per week. Prior to April 3, 2019, the employee would have been permitted to work no more than 60 hours per week. On April 3, 2019, the day the ROCA received Royal Assent, the Director's approval ceased to have any effect and the agreement between the parties is what determines the arrangement. As such, the employee in this example would be permitted to work up to 65 hours per week as of April 3, 2019. (Note, of course, that there must continue to be compliance with all hours of work requirements, including those for daily and weekly rest contained in Part VII of the ESA 2000.)

Note also that employees may revoke a written agreement to work excess weekly (or daily) hours by providing two weeks' written notice to the employer. The employer may revoke such agreements by giving reasonable notice to the employee. See ss. 17(6) and (7) for more information.

s. 17(4) – REPEALED

Document Re Employee Rights – s. 17(5)

17(5) An agreement described in subsection (2) or (3) is not valid unless,

(a) the employer has, before the agreement is made, provided the employee with a copy of the most recent document published by the Director under section 21.1; and

(b) the agreement contains a statement in which the employee acknowledges that he or she has received a document that the employer has represented is the most recent document published by the Director under section 21.1.

Section 17(5) provides that an employee's agreement to work excess daily hours or excess weekly hours is not valid unless two conditions are met. These are intended to ensure and provide assurance to the Ministry that employees know their rights before signing agreements to work excess hours. Note that the conditions are in addition to the general requirements regarding agreements, i.e., that they be in writing, pursuant to ESA Part 1, s. 1(3) and s. 1(3.1), and that they meet the requirements regarding issues such as voluntariness and specificity.

The two conditions are that an employee's agreement to work excess daily hours pursuant to s. 17(2) or excess weekly hours pursuant to s. 17(3) is not valid unless:

- The employer, before the agreement is made, gives the employee a copy of the most recent document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards that describes the rights of employees and obligations of employers under the hours of work and overtime provisions. The copy provided to the employee may be either a paper copy or an electronic copy. See ESA Part VII, s. 21.1 for information regarding this information document. This condition will not be met if the employer gives the information document to the employee after the agreement is signed.

  and

- The agreement contains a statement by the employee acknowledging receipt of the document. The statement must indicate that the employer represented that the document is the most recent version published by the Director.

These two conditions do not apply to employees who are represented by a trade union – see s. 17(9)(b) below.

Different rules regarding the Director's information document apply to employers who entered into agreements with employees to work excess weekly hours under the ESA 2000 as it stood before the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 came into force on March 1, 2005. Because these agreements were entered into before s. 17(5) was in force, the conditions in s. 17(5) do not apply to such employers. See s. 17(9). However, employers who had such agreements were required by now-repealed s. 17(10) to provide the information document to employees by June 1, 2005.

If either of the conditions in s. 17(5) are not met, the agreement to work excess daily or weekly hours is not valid. And because a valid written agreement is required in order for an employer to require or even permit an employee to work excess hours, if either condition is not met, the employer will be in violation of the ESA 2000 if any excess hours are worked (unless, of course, "exceptional circumstances" within the meaning of s. 19 are present).

Agreements under s. 17(2) to work excess daily hours and agreements under s. 17(3) to work excess weekly hours are two separate agreements, although they can be contained within the same document. If they are in the same document and the conditions in s. 17(5) are not met, both agreements are invalid, and the employee cannot be required or permitted to work either excess daily hours or excess weekly hours. If the agreements are separate, both agreements must contain the statement described in s. 17(5)(b). If, for example, only the excess daily hours agreement contains the statement, then the excess weekly hours agreement will not be valid.

The Director's information document needs to be provided only once, even if the excess daily hours agreement and the excess weekly hours agreement are made at different times, provided that the Director did not publish a revised information document after the earlier agreement was made but before the later agreement was made.

Example:

An employer gives the most recent Director's information document to an employee on May 1, 2017, and the employee provides a written agreement to work excess daily hours on May 2, 2017. The agreement states that the employee was told by the employer that the information document she was provided with is the most recent one published. One month later, the employer asks the employee if she would be willing to work excess weekly hours and she indicates that she would. No revised information document has been published, and the employer tells the employee that the document provided to her on May 1, 2017 is still the most recent document published by the Director. The employee then provides a written agreement to work excess weekly hours; it states that the employee has been given an information document that the employer told her was the most recent one published. Since there was no new information document published between May 1, 2017 and the making of the excess weekly hours agreement one month later, and the agreement contains an acknowledgement that the employee has received what the employer has represented is the most recent document, the condition in s. 17(5)(b) is met.

As mentioned above, the two conditions contained in s. 17(5) are in addition to the other requirements regarding agreements. One of these requirements is there must be informed consent by the employee. There may be circumstances where, despite the conditions in s. 17(5) being met, there is not informed consent. For example, if the employee cannot read or understand the information document, was not given an explanation, and was not otherwise aware of their rights, then even though the conditions of s. 17(5) have been met, the agreement will not be valid because the element of informed consent is absent. Accordingly, the employee will not be permitted to work the excess hours.

Revocation by Employee – s. 17(6)

17(6) An employee may revoke an agreement described in subsection (2) or (3) two weeks after giving written notice to the employer.

This section requires that an employee provide an employer with at least two weeks' written notice before withdrawing from an agreement made under s. 17(2) to work excess daily hours or from an agreement made under s. 17(3) to work excess weekly hours. Note that special rules on revocability apply to agreements to work excess daily hours under O Reg 285/01, s. 32 and arrangements regarding daily hours under O Reg 285/01, s. 32.1.

The employee must give the notice in writing; verbal notice will not meet the requirement of this section. Note that where the agreement has been made by the union on behalf of the employee, that the employee has no individual right to revoke the agreement. See the discussion at section 7.

Further, it is the Program's position that in situations where an agreement to work excess hours is made pursuant to a collective agreement, the ability to revoke the agreement to work excess hours must be made in accordance with the terms of the collective agreement and the Labour Relations Act, 1995 where applicable. Generally, this means that unilateral revocation is not possible during the operation of the collective agreement.

Where employees are able to revoke an agreement and provide the employer with the proper notice, the hours of work limits in s. 17(1) will again apply once the two-week notice period to revoke the agreement to work excess hours has expired, and the employer will no longer be able to require or permit an employee to work beyond those limits subject to exceptional circumstances as set out in ESA Part VII, s. 19.

Section 32 of O Reg 285/01, s. 32 provides:

32. (1) Despite subsection 17(6) of the Act, an agreement under subsection 17(2) of the Act that was made at the time of the employee's hiring and that has been approved by the Director is irrevocable unless both the employer and the employee agree to its revocation.

(2) The Director may impose conditions in granting an approval.

ESA Part XXVII, ss. 141(9) and (10) provide:

141. (9) An employer may not require an employee who has made an agreement approved by the Director under a regulation made under paragraph 9 of subsection (1) to work more than 10 hours in a day, except in the circumstances described in section 19.

(10) If an employee has agreed to work hours in excess of those referred to in clause 17(1)(a) and hours in excess of those referred to in clause 17(1)(b), the fact that the Director has approved the agreement in accordance with a regulation made under paragraph 9 of subsection (1) does not prevent the employee from revoking, in accordance with subsection 17(6), that part of the agreement dealing with the hours in excess of those referred to in clause 17(1)(b).

Together these sections provide that despite s. 17(6), employees who were hired on or after September 4, 2001, and who agreed in writing at the time of hiring to work hours in excess of the daily maximum cannot unilaterally withdraw from the agreement, even with two weeks' notice, if the Director of Employment Standards approved the agreement. The agreement can be revoked only if the employer and employee both agree, in writing, to revoke it.

Note that this exception to the revocability of agreements applies only to agreements to work excess daily hours. These employees retain the right under s. 17(6) to revoke, with two weeks' written notice, agreements to work excess weekly hours.

Note also that employees who are party to these approved agreements to work excess daily hours cannot be required to work more than 10 hours a day except in exceptional circumstances as set out in ESA Part VII, s. 19 – see ESA Part XVII s. 141(9).

Revocation by Employer – s. 17(7)

17(7) An employer may revoke an agreement described in subsection (2) or (3) after giving reasonable notice to the employee.

This section requires an employer to provide an employee with reasonable notice if it wishes to withdraw from an agreement regarding excess daily hours made under s. 17(2) or from an agreement regarding excess weekly hours made under s.17(3). Note that agreements under O Reg 285/01, s. 32 and arrangements under O Reg 285/01, s. 32.1 can be revoked only if both the employer and employee wish to revoke them.

The notice is not required to be in writing. Unlike the notice requirement in s. 17(6), verbal notice will suffice, although employers may wish to put the notice in writing in order to avoid misunderstandings.

Whether the notice provided by an employer is reasonable will depend upon the circumstances of each case. The Program does not view reasonable notice in the context of revoking an excess hours agreement under the ESA 2000 to be the same as reasonable notice as that term is used in the context of notice of termination under the common law, and, as such, the principles applied at common law are not necessarily applicable here.

Factors for consideration when determining whether the length of notice is reasonable may include:

- How long the agreement has been in effect;
- How much in advance of the agreed upon expiry date (if any) the revocation will take effect; and
- The reason for the revocation: did the employer lose a contract for work, suffer equipment breakdowns or a shortage of materials needed to perform the work? Was the agreement withdrawn in favour of a different agreement?

It is the Program's position that in situations where an agreement to work excess hours is made pursuant to a collective agreement, the ability to revoke the agreement to work excess hours must be made in accordance with the terms of the collective agreement and the Labour Relations Act, 1995 where applicable. Generally, this means that unilateral revocation is not possible during the operation of the collective agreement.

Once an excess hours agreement is revoked, the hours of work limits in s. 17(1) will once again apply, and the employer will no longer be able to require or permit an employee to work beyond those limits, subject to exceptional circumstances as set out in ESA Part VII, s. 19.

It is the Program's view that an agreement to work excess hours under s. 17(2) or s. 17(3) does not require an employer to provide employees with excess hours; it only allows for excess hours be worked, permitting an employer to require an employee to work any excess hours the employer chooses to provide. An agreement under s. 17(2) or s. 17(3) is in no way a guarantee of wages and there is no basis for a claim by an employee of a violation of the ESA 2000 (e.g., insufficient notice of a constructive dismissal) if excess hours are not provided.

Transition: Certain Agreements – s. 17(8)

17(8) For the purposes of this section,

(a) an agreement to exceed the limit on hours of work in a day set out in clause (1)(a) of this section as it read on February 28, 2005 shall be treated as if it were an agreement described in subsection (2);

(b) an agreement to exceed the limit on hours of work in a work week set out in clause (1)(b) of this section as it read on February 28, 2005 shall be treated as if it were an agreement described in subsection (3); and

(c) an agreement to exceed the limit on hours of work in a work week set out in clause (2)(b) of this section as it read on February 28, 2005 shall be treated as if it were an agreement described in subsection (3).

Section 17(8) is a transitional provision relating to amendments that were made to the hours of work provisions effective March 1, 2005.

This provision establishes how agreements to work excess hours that were entered into under the provisions of the ESA 2000 before the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 came into force on March 1, 2005 are to be treated.

On February 28, 2005, the relevant provisions read as follows:

Section 17 of the ESA 2000:

(1) Subject to subsection (2), no employer shall require or permit an employee to work more than,

(a) eight hours in a day or, if the employer establishes a regular work day of more than eight hours for the employee, the number of hours in his or her regular work day; or

(b) 48 hours in a work week.

(2) An employer may permit an employee to work up to a specified number of hours in excess of an amount set out in subsection (1) if,

(a) the employee agrees to work those hours; and

(b) the employee will not work more than 60 hours or such other number of hours as are prescribed in a work week.

Section 31 of O Reg 285/01:

(1) An employer may permit an employee to work up to a specified number of hours in excess of the limit on hours of work set out in clause 17(2)(b) of the Act if,

(a) the employee agrees to work those hours; and

(b) the Director approves the agreement.

(2) The Director's approval under clause (1)(b) may be granted with respect to an employer or with respect to a class of employers.

Accordingly:

- Valid agreements to work in excess of the daily hours limit made under the pre-March 1, 2005 hours of work rules that have not expired or been revoked continue to be valid agreements to work hours in excess of the daily limit.
- Valid agreements to work in excess of the weekly hours limit, to a maximum of 60 hours in a week, made under the pre-March 1, 2005 hours of work rules that have not expired or been revoked continue to be valid agreements to work hours in excess of the weekly limit.
- Valid agreements to work in excess of 60 hours in a week made under the pre-March 1, 2005 hours of work rules that have not expired or been revoked continue to be valid agreements to work hours in excess of the weekly limit.

While the agreements that were entered into under the authority of s. 17(2) and O Reg 285/01, s. 31 as they read on February 28, 2005 ("old agreements") are treated as if they are agreements made under the current s. 17 ("new agreements"), thereby negating the need for employers to enter into another agreement with employees when the amendments to the ESA 2000 came into force, the rules regarding the Director's information document are different. See the discussion of s. 17(9) below, and note that now-repealed s. 17(10) required employers who were party to such an agreement to provide the information document to employees by June 1, 2005. Otherwise, agreements entered into pre- or post-March 1, 2005 were treated the same. Prior to the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 (ROCA) amendments, all employers who had agreements with employees (regardless of the date the agreement was entered into) had to seek approval from the Director before the employee could work more than 48 hours per work week.

For information on transitions with regards to excess weekly hour agreements and Director approvals in place on April 3, 2019 when the ROCA amendments to the ESA came into force, please see the discussion at s. 17(3)

Document Re Employee Rights – Exceptions – s. 17(9)

17(9) Subsection (5) does not apply in respect of,

(a) an agreement described in subsection (8); or

(b) an agreement described in subsection (2) or (3) in respect of an employee who is represented by a trade union.

This section sets out two exceptions to the application of s. 17(5). Section 17(5) provides that agreements to work excess daily or weekly hours are not valid unless:

- The employer, before the agreement is made, gives the employee a copy of a document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards that describes the rights of employees and obligations of employers under the hours of work and overtime pay provisions. The document given to the employee must be the most recent version of the document.

  and

- The agreement contains a statement by the employee acknowledging receipt of the document. The statement must indicate that the employer represented that the document is the most recent version published by the Director.

See above for a discussion of s. 17(5).

Section 17(9) provides that the s. 17(5) requirement does not apply to:

An agreement described in s. 17(8)

The agreements described in s. 17(8) are those agreements that were entered into under the provisions of the ESA 2000 before the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 came into force on March 1, 2005. Because the agreements were entered into at a time when the requirement of s. 17(5) was not in force, the conditions for a valid agreement in s. 17(5) do not apply.

Note however that now-repealed s. 17(10) required employers who were party to an agreement described in s. 17(8) to provide the information document to employees by June 1, 2005.

Excess daily or weekly hours agreements that are entered into by employees who are represented by a union

The two conditions for a valid agreement that are set out in s. 17(5) do not apply to agreements made in respect of employees who are represented by a trade union.

s. 17(10) – REPEALED

s. 17(11) – REPEALED

The Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 (ROCA) amended the excess weekly hours scheme effective April 3, 2019 by removing the requirement for the Director's approval of agreements to exceed the limit on weekly hours of work. The provisions that are currently in force are discussed in the section above. The text below, which appears in red, is the legislative text and the associated operational policy as it applied prior to April 3, 2019. This discussion is being maintained in this publication since employees may still file a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the below provisions were in force. The text appears in red to highlight that the below sets out the pre-April 3, 2019 language of sections 17, 17.1, 17.2 and 17.3 and is not current as of April 3, 2019.

ESA Part VII Section 17 – Limit on Hours of Work

Limit on Hours of Work – s. 17(1)

17(1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), no employer shall require or permit an employee to work more than,

(a) eight hours in a day or, if the employer establishes a regular work day of more than eight hours for the employee, the number of hours in his or her regular work day; and

(b) 48 hours in a work week.

Section 17(1) sets out the daily and weekly maximum hours that an employer may require or allow an employee to work:

- Daily maximum: eight hours per day or, if there is an established work day that is longer than eight hours, the number of hours in that work day.
- Weekly maximum: 48 hours per work week.

This provision allows employees to refuse to work hours in excess of eight per day, or in excess of the number of hours in a longer established regular work day, and 48 hours in a work week.

The limits on hours of work in s. 17(1) are subject to the following exceptions:

- Section 17(2), which allows employees to agree in writing to work hours in excess of the s. 17(l)(a) daily limit;
- Section 17(3), which allows employees to work hours in excess of the s. 17(1)(b) weekly limit if they agree to do so in writing and the employer has received an approval from the Director of Employment Standards;
- Section 17(4), which allows employees to work hours in excess of the s. 17(1) weekly limit - but only up to the lesser of 60 hours, the number of hours specified in the agreement, or the number of hours specified in the application pending the disposition of the application for approval, if certain conditions are met;
- Where there are exceptional circumstances as set out in s. 19.

Note also that the limit on daily hours of work contained in s. 17(1)(a) does not apply to certain employees hired before September 4, 2001, who entered into arrangements to work hours in excess of those in their regular work day. See O Reg 285/01, s. 32.1 for a discussion of the details of this exemption.

Regular Work Day of More than Eight Hours

The daily maximum number of hours of work an employer can require or allow an employee to work is eight or, if the employer establishes a regular work day of more than eight hours for the employee, the number of hours in their regular work day.

Employers can establish a regular work day in excess of eight hours without the approval of the Director of Employment Standards. While the ESA 2000 does not explicitly set out the maximum number of hours a regular work day can be, the ability to establish a regular work day longer than eight hours remains subject to the weekly hours of work limit in s. 17(1)(b), as well as the requirement for daily rest contained in ESA Part VII, s. 18.

"Regular work day" is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1(1) to mean "with respect to an employee who usually works the same number of hours each day, means a day of that many hours". Because the word "usually" is used, an employee does not have to work the same number of hours every work day to establish a regular work day. A regular work day can be established so long as an employee ordinarily works a set number of hours.

An employer may establish a schedule where employees work different numbers of hours on different days of the week. For example, employees work 10 hours Mondays to Thursdays and eight hours on Fridays. It is Program policy that the regular work day from Monday to Thursday is 10 hours and eight hours on Friday. Note that the employer will have to pay overtime pay for four hours in this example.

Changing What the Regular Work Day Is

The ESA 2000 does not prohibit an employer from adjusting the regular work day on occasion. That is, so far as the ESA 2000 is concerned, the employer may establish a different regular work day than what it had previously established.

For example, consider an employer that has the following schedule:

- Monday: 10 hours
- Tuesday: 10 hours
- Wednesday: 10 hours
- Thursday: 8 hours
- Friday: 8 hours

The employer wishes to establish the following amended schedule:

- Monday: 11 hours
- Tuesday: 11 hours
- Wednesday: 10 hours
- Thursday: 8 hours
- Friday: 8 hours

The ESA 2000 does not prohibit the employer from establishing a new regular work day of 11 hours for Mondays and Tuesdays.

Furthermore, the employer may want to return to the original schedule after, for example, several months. Nothing in the ESA 2000 prohibits this further change to the schedule.

However, the definition of regular work day contemplates that the employee usually works a specific number of hours on a particular day. The more frequently the employer changes the schedule in relation to a particular day of the week, the less likely it is that the employee could be said to have a usual number of hours on a particular day of the week. In other words, the facts may reveal that there is no regular work day, in which case the daily limit in s. 17(1)(a) for that employee will be eight – subject to the exceptions to this limit set out in s. 17(2) and s. 19.

Note also that while the ESA 2000 does not prohibit the employer from changing the regular work day, there may be restrictions against doing so in an employee's employment contract. In this case, it may amount to a breach of the employment contract for the employer to change the regular work day, which may give rise to a constructive dismissal under the ESA 2000 or at common law.

Pre-Employment Standards Act, 2000 Schedules

Employers who had established a regular work day that is longer than eight hours prior to proclamation of the ESA 2000, and that was in effect upon proclamation of the ESA 2000, are considered by the Program to have established a regular work day of more than eight hours for the purposes of s. 17(1)(a). Employers who wish to establish a regular work day of more than eight hours after proclamation of the ESA 2000, as noted above, are not prohibited by the ESA 2000 from doing so, although they may be constrained from doing so by considerations such as constructive dismissal, collective agreements, etc.

Work Week

ESA Part I, s. 1 defines “work week” as:

(a) a recurring period of seven consecutive days selected by the employer for the purpose of scheduling work, or

(b) if the employer has not selected such a period, a recurring period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

In ascertaining the recurring period of seven consecutive days established by the employer for the purpose of scheduling work, if any, an employment standards officer may consider such information as work schedules, time cards and pay periods, although these are not necessarily the same as the work week. In the absence of the employer having established a recurring period of seven consecutive days for the purpose of scheduling work, a default work week of Sunday to Saturday will apply.

Determining the Number of Hours Worked by an Employee – O Reg 285/01, s. 6

O Reg 285/01, s. 6 sets out the circumstances in which work is deemed to be performed or not deemed to be performed. This provision is essential in determining the number of hours of work under this Part. Note that O Reg 285/01, s. 22 sets out special rules regarding when work is not deemed to be performed for residential care workers.

O Reg 285/01, s. 6 provides as follows:

6(1) Subject to subsection (2), work shall be deemed to be performed by an employee for the employer,

(a) where work is

(iii) permitted or suffered to be done by the employer, or

(iv) in fact performed by an employee although a term of the contract of employment expressly forbids or limits hours of work or requires the employer to authorize hours of work in advance;

(b) where the employee is not performing work and is required to remain at the place of employment,

(iii) waiting or holding himself or herself ready for call to work, or

(iv) on a rest or break-time other than an eating period.

6(2) Work shall not be deemed to be performed for an employer during the time the employee,

(a) is entitled to,

(iv) take time off work for an eating period,

(v) take at least six hours or such longer period as is established by contract, custom or practice for sleeping and the employer furnishes sleeping facilities, or

(vi) take time off work in order to engage in the employee's own private affairs or pursuits as is established by contract, custom or practice;

(b) is not at the place of employment and is waiting or holding himself or herself ready for call to work.

Exception: Hours in a Day – s. 17(2)

17(2) An employee's hours of work may exceed the limit set out in clause (1)(a) if the employee has made an agreement with the employer that he or she will work up to a specified number of hours in a day in excess of the limit and his or her hours of work in a day do not exceed the number specified in the agreement.

Section 17(2) permits employers and employees to agree, in writing that the employee will work up to a specified number of hours in excess of the daily limit set out in s. 17(1)(a) – see ESA Part 1, s. 1(3) and s. 1(3.1) for a discussion of agreements in writing

Section 17(2) must be read in conjunction with s. 17(5), which provides that s. 17(2) agreements are not valid unless:

- The employer, before the agreement is made, gives the employee a copy of a document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards that describes the rights of employees and obligations of employers under the hours of work and overtime pay provisions. The document must be the most recent version published by the Director;

  and

- The agreement contains a statement by the employee acknowledging that they received the document. The statement must indicate that the employer represented that the document is the most recent version published by the Director.

In attempting to facilitate opportunities to work excess hours, employers have inquired as to whether a signature on a sign-up sheet for additional hours might be considered a valid written agreement under s. 17(2). The Program's view is that such a document would be valid if all of the following conditions are met:

- The employee has been given the most recent information document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards;
- The sign-up sheet clearly states that the employee has been given what they are told is the most recent such document;
- The sign-up sheet clearly states that the employee is agreeing to work a specified number or up to a specified number of excess hours;
- The employee initials or signs the sheet; and
- The employee in so initialing or signing understands that they were signifying their assent to the statements on the sign-up sheet.

The requirement regarding the Director's information document in s. 17(5) does not apply to employees who are represented by a trade union - see s. 17(9)(b). Furthermore, different rules regarding the Director's information document apply to employers who entered into agreements with employees to work excess daily hours under the provisions of the ESA 2000 before March 1, 2005, the date on which the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004, SO 2004, c 21 came into force. In particular, because the agreements were entered into under a scheme when the requirement of s. 17(5) was not in force, the conditions for a valid agreement in s. 17(5) do not apply to such employers. Instead, they are required to provide the information document to employees by June 1, 2005. See ss. 17(9) and (10).

In the absence of a valid written agreement, the daily limit on hours of work in s. 17(1)(a) applies, and the employer may not require or even permit an employee to work excess daily hours, unless exceptional circumstances within the meaning of ESA Part VII, s. 19 are present.

Agreements to work excess daily hours can generally be revoked by employees with two weeks' written notice and generally with reasonable notice by employers - see ss. 17(6) and (7), respectively. It is, however, the Program's position that in situations where an agreement to work excess hours is made pursuant to a collective agreement, the ability to revoke the agreement to work excess hours must be made in accordance with the terms of the collective agreement and the Labour Relations Act, 1995, SO 1995, c 1, Sch A, where applicable. Generally, this means that unilateral revocation is not possible during the operation of the collective agreement.

Agreements to work excess daily hours can specify the exact number of hours that the employee is agreeing to work, the exact number of hours over and above the daily limit, or they can specify an upper limit (e.g., "up to 10 hours a day").

This section contemplates both "one-off" agreements, where the employee agrees in writing to work excess daily hours on a single occasion, and more open-ended "as required" agreements, where the employee agrees in writing to work a specified number of excess daily hours whenever required by the employer. For example, a retail employer preparing for the busy Christmas season may ask an employee to agree to "with two days' notice, work up to 12 hours a day during the months of November and December of this year."

Agreements under s. 17(2) to work excess daily hours and agreements under s. 17(3) to work excess weekly hours are two separate agreements, although they can be embodied in the same document.

Note that there may be some circumstances in which what appears to be a single agreement with respect to excess daily hours by necessary implication includes an agreement with respect to excess weekly hours, and vice versa. For example, an employee regularly works nine hours a day, five days a week. On the fifth day of the week, the employee agrees in writing to exceed the daily limit and work four additional hours. By necessary implication, the employee has also agreed to work in excess of 48 hours in that work week, and, assuming that the employer had already received an excess weekly hours approval from the Director of Employment Standards that applies to the employee or that the pending approval rules in s. 17(4) apply to the employee, the employee will be permitted to work those excess hours. Or the same employee, who regularly works nine hours a day, whose employer operates only five days a week, enters into an agreement to work up to 60 hours per work week when required and the employer has an excess weekly hours approval from the Director that applies to the employee, or is operating under the "pending approval" rules in s. 17(4), the employee, by necessary implication, has also agreed to work excess daily hours.

The Ministry has produced a list of items employers and employees may wish to consider when drafting agreements. These materials can be found Ministry of Labour's web page Applications for Approval of Excess Hours or for Averaging Hours of Work as well as in the Hours of Work and Overtime Tool on the Ministry of Labour website.

Also see section ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and ESA Part 1, s. 1(3.1) for a discussion of agreements in writing.

Employers are required to retain a copy of every excess daily (and weekly) hours agreement it has made with its employees for three years after the last day on which work was performed under each agreement – see ESA Part VI, s. 15(8).

Exception: Hours in a Work Week – s. 17(3)

17(3) An employee's hours of work may exceed the limit set out in clause (1)(b) if,

(a) the employee has made an agreement with the employer that he or she will work up to a specified number of hours in a work week in excess of the limit;

(b) the employer has received an approval under section 17.1 that applies to the employee or to a class of employees that includes the employee; and

(c) the employee's hours of work in a work week do not exceed the lesser of,

(i) the number of hours specified in the agreement, and

(ii) the number of hours specified in the approval.

Section 17(3) permits employees' hours of work to exceed the weekly limit of 48 hours in a work week if three conditions are met:

- The employee has made an agreement with the employer that they will work up to a specified number of hours in a work week in excess of the limit;
- The employer has received an approval from the Director of Employment Standards under s. 17.1 that applies to the employee or to a class of employees that includes the employee; and
- The employee's hours of work in a work week do not exceed the lesser of,
    - The number of hours specified in the agreement, and
    - The number of hours specified in the approval.

Each of these conditions is discussed below. Employee made agreement that they will work up to specified number of hours in excess of limit

Pursuant to s. 17(3)(a), the first condition that must be met before an employee is allowed to work more than 48 hours in a work week is the employee must have entered into an agreement with the employer that they will work the excess hours. The agreement must be in writing to be valid – see ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and (3.1) for a discussion of agreements in writing, as well as the list of necessary and other elements of agreements at the end of that section. Also see the Ministry of Labour's web page Applications for Approval of Excess Hours or for Averaging Hours of Work for a list of items employers and employees may wish to consider when drafting agreements, as well as the Hours of Work and Overtime Tool on the Ministry of Labour website.

In a non-unionized workplace, each employee has the right on an individual basis to enter into agreements to work excess weekly hours. For employees represented by a trade union, the written agreement may be embodied in the collective agreement, a memorandum of agreement or an addendum to an agreement. All bargaining unit members are bound by such an agreement. In this regard, see the discussion of ESA Part III, s. 7.

This section must be read in conjunction with s. 17(5), which provides that s. 17(3) agreements are not valid unless:

- The employer, before the agreement is made, gives the employee a copy of a document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards that describes the rights of employees and obligations of employers under the hours of work and overtime pay provisions. The document must be the most recent version published by the Director.

  and

- The agreement contains a statement by the employee acknowledging that they received the document. The statement must indicate that the employer represented that the document is the most recent version published by the Director.

In attempting to facilitate opportunities to work excess hours, employers have inquired as to whether a signature on a sign-up sheet for additional hours might be considered a valid written agreement under s. 17(3). The Program's view is that such a document would be valid if all of the following conditions are met:

- The employee has been given the most recent information document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards;
- The sign-up sheet clearly states that the employee has been given what they are told is the most recent such document;
- The sign-up sheet clearly states that the employee is agreeing to work a specified number or up to a specified number of excess hours;
- The employee initials or signs the sheet; and
- The employee in so initialing or signing understands that they were signifying their assent to the statements on the sign-up sheet.

See the discussion of s. 17(5) below for more information.

The requirement regarding the Director's information document in s. 17(5) does not apply to employees who are represented by a trade union – see s. 17(9)(b). Furthermore, different rules regarding the Director's information document apply to employers who entered into agreements with employees to work excess weekly hours before March 1, 2005, the date the amendments to the ESA 2000 requiring that the Director's information document be given to employees came into force – see s. 17(9).

In the absence of a valid written agreement, the weekly limit on hours of work in s. 17(1)(b) applies, and the employer may not require or even permit an employee to work excess weekly hours, even if the Director of Employment Standards has issued an approval that applies to the employee, unless exceptional circumstances within the meaning of s. 19 are present.

Agreements to work excess weekly hours can generally be revoked by employees with two weeks' written notice even if the Director of Employment Standards has issued an approval that applies to the employee – see s. 17(6). Agreements to work excess weekly hours can generally be revoked by employers with reasonable notice – see s. 17(7).

The general right to revoke agreements is limited where the agreement is made between a union and the employer. It is the Program's position that in situations where an agreement to work excess hours is made pursuant to a collective agreement, the ability to revoke the agreement to work excess hours must be made in accordance with the terms of the collective agreement and the Labour Relations Act, 1995 where applicable. Generally, this means that unilateral revocation is not possible during the operation of the collective agreement.

Further, an individual employee has no right to revoke an agreement made on their behalf by the union, with or without the agreement of the employer – see the discussion in ESA Part III, s. 7.

Agreements to work excess weekly hours can specify the exact number of hours that the employee is agreeing to work, the exact number of hours over and above the weekly limit, or they can specify an upper limit (e.g., "up to 60 hours a week").

This section contemplates both "one-off" agreements, where the employee agrees in writing to work excess weekly hours on a single occasion, and more open-ended "as required" agreements, where the employee agrees in writing to work a specified number of excess weekly hours whenever required by the employer. For example, a retail employer preparing for the busy Christmas season may ask an employee to agree to "with two days' notice, work up to 60 hours a week during the months of November and December of this year."

Agreements under s. 17(2) to work excess daily hours and agreements under s. 17(3) to work excess weekly hours are two separate agreements, although they can be embodied in the same document.

Note that there may be some circumstances in which what appears to be a single agreement with respect to excess daily hours by necessary implication includes an agreement with respect to excess weekly hours, and vice versa. For example, an employee regularly works nine hours a day, five days a week. On the fifth day of the week, the employee agrees in writing to exceed the daily limit and work four additional hours. By necessary implication, the employee has also agreed to work in excess of 48 hours in that work week, and, assuming that the employer had already received an excess weekly hours approval from the Director of Employment Standards that applies to the employee, or that the pending approval rules in s. 17(4) apply to the employee, the employee will be permitted to work those excess hours. Or if the same employee, who regularly works nine hours a day and whose employer operates only five days a week, enters into an agreement to work up to 60 hours per work week when required and the employer has an excess weekly hours approval from the Director that applies to the employee, or is operating under the pending approval rules in s. 17(4), the employee, by necessary implication, has also agreed to work excess daily hours.

Employers are required to retain a copy of every excess weekly and daily hours agreement it has made with its employees for three years after the last day on which work was performed under each agreement – see ESA Part VI, s. 15(8).

Employer received approval that applies to employee or class of employees

Pursuant to s. 17(3)(b), the second condition that must be met before an employee may work more than 48 hours in a work week is the employer must be in receipt of an approval by the Director of Employment Standards under ESA Part VII, s. 17.1 that applies to the employee or to a class of employees that includes the employee.

ESA Part VII, s. 17.1 describes how employers apply for an excess weekly hours approval.

This section must be read in conjunction with ESA Part VII, s. 17.1(9), which states:

17.1(9) An approval applies to the employee or class of employees specified in the approval, and applies to every employee in a specified class whether or not the employee was employed by the employer at the time the approval was issued.

Accordingly, where an employer already has an approval from the Director of Employment Standards, an employee who falls within the class of employees set out in the approval may begin working the excess weekly hours immediately upon entering into the agreement to do so (assuming that all of the requirements for a valid agreement are met) — the employer will not be required to apply for another approval. For example, an employee will be allowed to work excess weekly hours without the employer having to obtain another approval where the employee who provides the valid written agreement:

- Was not an employee of the employer at the time the approval was issued;
- Was an employee in the class of employees the approval applies to at the time the approval was issued, but at that time had not agreed to work the excess hours; or
- Was an employee of the employer at the time the approval was issued but at that time was not working in a position the approval applies to.

This section must also be read in conjunction with s. 17(4), which allows employees to work more than 48 hours in a work week (but only up to the lesser of 60 hours, the number of hours specified in the agreement, or the number of hours specified in the application) if the employer does not receive either an approval or a refusal from the Director within 30 days of the application being served, if certain conditions are met.

Employee's Hours of Work Do Not Exceed Number of Hours in Agreement or Approval

Pursuant to s. 17(3)(c), the third condition that must be met before an employee is allowed to work more than 48 hours in a work week is that the employee's hours of work in excess of 48 will be lawful only if the excess hours do not exceed the number of hours specified in the employee's agreement or the number of hours specified in the Director's approval, whichever is less.

For example, an employee agreed to work 70 hours in a work week, but the Director issued an approval for only 60 hours. The employee can work only up to 60 hours in a work week, and the employer will be in violation of the ESA 2000 if the employee works more than 60 hours.

Conversely, an approval was issued for 65 hours that applies to a particular class of employees. Some employees in that class agreed to work up to 65 hours. Those employees are permitted to work up to 65 hours. One employee in that class agreed to work only up to 55 hours. Pursuant to s. 17(3)(c), that employee is permitted only to work up to 55 hours.

Another example is where an employee agreed to work up to 65 hours in a work week, and the employer has an approval allowing that employee to work up to 65 hours in a work week. The employee changes their mind and provides the employer with two weeks' written notice revoking that agreement, and simultaneously enters into an agreement to work up to only 50 hours in a work week. After the two-week notice period expires, that employee is, pursuant to s. 17(3)(c), permitted to work only up to 50 hours in a work week.

Same, Pending Approval – s. 17(4)

17(4) Despite subsection (3), an employee's hours of work may exceed the limit set out in clause (l)(b) even though the employer has not received the approval described in clause (3)(b), if,

(a) the employee has made an agreement described in clause (3) (a) with the employer;

(b) the employer has served on the Director an application for an approval under section 17.1;

(c) the application is for an approval that applies to the employee or to a class of employees that includes the employee;

(d) 30 days have passed since the application was served on the Director;

(e) the employer has not received a notice that the application has been refused;

(f) the employer's most recent previous application, if any, for an approval under section 17.1 was not refused;

(g) the most recent approval, if any, received by the employer under section17.1 was not revoked;

(h) the employer has posted and kept posted a copy of the application in at least one conspicuous place in the workplace where the employee works, so that it is likely to come to the employee's attention; and

(i) the employee's hours of work in a work week do not exceed any of,

- (i) the number of hours specified in the application,
- (ii) the number of hours specified in the agreement, and
- (iii) 60 hours.

This section provides an exception to the requirement in s. 17(3) that the employer have received an excess weekly hours approval from the Director before an employee is permitted to work excess weekly hours. It permits an employee to work more than 48 hours in a work week — up to a maximum of the least of 60 hours, the number of hours specified in the agreement, or the number of hours specified in the application — if the Director has not issued either an approval or a refusal of the application within 30 days of the date the application was served and other conditions are met.

This section permits excess hours to be worked pending the Director issuing an approval or a refusal if certain conditions are met. It does not "deem" an approval to have been granted. If the application is ultimately refused, the excess hours must cease when the notice of refusal is received. If the application is ultimately approved, s. 17(3), and any conditions contained in the approval, will dictate the conditions under which excess hours can be worked from that point forward.

The employee will be permitted to work more than 48 hours in a work week pending the disposal of the application only if all nine conditions set out in s. 17(4) — including the condition that the employee works no more than the least of 60 hours, the number of hours specified in the agreement, and the number of hours specified in the application - are met. If any of the nine conditions are not met, the employee will not be permitted to work more than 48 hours in a work week pending the disposition of the application.

Each of the nine conditions is discussed below.

Employee made an agreement with the employer

Pursuant to s. 17(4)(a), the first condition is the employee must have made an agreement described in s. 17(3)(a) with the employer to work excess weekly hours. In particular, note that for agreements made on or after March 1, 2005, the agreement is not valid unless the employer provided the employee with the information document described in s. 17(5) before the employee entered into the agreement, and the agreement contains a statement by the employee acknowledging that they received the document.

Employer served on the Director an application for approval

Pursuant to s. 17(4)(b), the second condition is the employer must have served the application for an approval of excess weekly hours on the Director of Employment Standards under ESA Part VII, s. 17.1 – see in particular the discussion of the issue of when an application is considered to be served if the approval application is not properly completed.

Application applies to the employee or class of employees

Pursuant to s. 17(4)(c), the third condition is the application for approval to work excess weekly hours that has been served on the Director must apply to the individual employee at issue, or to a class of employees that includes the employee.

Thirty days have passed since application was served

Pursuant to s. 17(4)(d), the fourth condition is at least 30 days must have passed since the employer served the Director with the excess weekly hours approval application. Day means a calendar day.

Note that ESA Part VII, ss. 17.1(4) and (5) contain rules regarding when service is deemed to be effective, and, accordingly, when the 30-day period begins.

Note also that s. 17(11) contains a special rule regarding when the 30-day period expires if the application is filed before March 1, 2005.

Employer has not received notice that application has been refused

Pursuant to s. 17(4)(e), the fifth condition is the employer not have received a notice from the Director that the application to work excess weekly hours has been refused.

Employer’s most recent previous application was not refused

Pursuant to s. 17(4)(f), the sixth condition is the employer's most recent previous excess weekly hours application must not have been refused. If the employer previously submitted an application that was refused for any reason, and that application was the most recent application, the employer will not be permitted to rely on s. 17(4), and the employees that are the subject of the current application cannot begin to work excess weekly hours unless and until the current application is approved. This is so whether or not the most recent previous application that was refused applied to the same employees who are the subject of the current application.

Employer’s Most Recent Approval Was Not Revoked

Pursuant to s. 17(4)(g), the seventh condition is the most recent approval (if any) that was granted by the Director must not have been revoked. Pursuant to ESA Part VII, s. 17.1(16), the Director can revoke an approval.

Employer posted a copy of the application

Pursuant to s. 17(4)(h), the eighth condition is the employer must post and keep posted a copy of the application for approval of excess weekly hours. It must be posted in at least one conspicuous place in the workplace where each employee who is going to begin working excess weekly hours pending the disposal of the application works.

Note that the application should already be posted, as posting is one requirement of the application process – see ESA Part VII, s. 17.1(6).

Employee's hours of work do not exceed number of hours in application, agreement or 60 hours

Pursuant to s. 17(4)(j), the ninth condition sets an upper limit on the number of hours per work week an employee can work pending the disposal of the application. It means that the employee cannot work more than the least of any of the following amounts:

- The number of hours specified for that employee in the application;
- The number of hours the employee agreed to; or
- 60 hours.

Because of s. 17(4)(i)(iii), the absolute limit on the number of hours per work week an employee can work pending the disposal of the application is 60, even if the employee agreed to work more than 60 hours and/or the application asks for an approval for the employee to work more than 60 hours. For example, an employee agreed to work up to 65 hours per work week, and the application asks for an approval for the class of employees to which the employee belongs to work 65 hours. While the application is pending (assuming the other conditions are met, including the 30-day wait period), the employee will be permitted to work only up to 60 hours.

Another example of the application of the ninth condition is an employee agreed to work up to 55 hours, and the application asks for an approval for the employee to work 55 hours. While the application is pending (assuming the other conditions are met, including the 30-day wait period), the employee will be permitted to work only up to 55 hours.

Document Re Employee Rights – s. 17(5)

17(5) An agreement described in subsection (2) or in clause (3)(a) is not valid unless,

(a) the employer has, before the agreement is made, provided the employee with a copy of the most recent document published by the Director under section 21.1; and

(b) the agreement contains a statement in which the employee acknowledges that he or she has received a document that the employer has represented is the most recent document published by the Director under section 21.1.

Section 17(5) provides that an employee's agreement to work excess daily hours or excess weekly hours is not valid unless two conditions are met. These are intended to ensure and provide assurance to the Ministry that employees know their rights before signing agreements to work excess hours. Note that the conditions are in addition to the general requirements regarding agreements, i.e., that they be in writing, pursuant to ESA Part 1, s. 1(3) and s. 1(3.1), and that they meet the requirements regarding issues such as voluntariness and specificity.

The two conditions are that an employee's agreement to work excess daily hours pursuant to s. 17(2) or excess weekly hours pursuant to s. 17(3)(a) is not valid unless:

- The employer, before the agreement is made, gives the employee a copy of the most recent document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards that describes the rights of employees and obligations of employers under the hours of work and overtime provisions. The copy provided to the employee may be either a paper copy or an electronic copy. See ESA Part VII, s. 21.1 for information regarding this information document. This condition will not be met if the employer gives the information document to the employee after the agreement is signed.

  and

- The agreement contains a statement by the employee acknowledging that they received the document and that the employer represent it as the most recent document the Director published.

These two conditions do not apply to employees who are represented by a trade union – see s. 17(9)(b) below.

Different rules regarding the Director's information document apply to employers who entered into agreements with employees to work excess weekly hours under the ESA 2000 as it stood before the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 came into force on March 1, 2005. Because these agreements were entered into before s. 17(5) was in force, the conditions in s. 17(5) do not apply to such employers. However, employers who had such agreements were required to provide the information document to employees by June 1, 2005. See the discussions of ss. 17(9) and (10) below.

If either of the conditions in s. 17(5) are not met, the agreement to work excess daily or weekly hours is not valid. And because a valid written agreement is required in order for an employer to require or even permit an employee to work excess hours, if either condition is not met, the employer will be in violation of the ESA 2000 if any excess hours are worked (unless, of course, "exceptional circumstances" within the meaning of s. 19 are present). This is so even if the Director has issued an approval that applies to the employee in question.

Agreements under s. 17(2) to work excess daily hours and agreements under s. 17(3) to work excess weekly hours are two separate agreements, although they can be contained within the same document. If they are in the same document and the conditions in s. 17(5) are not met, both agreements are invalid, and the employee cannot be required or permitted to work either excess daily hours or excess weekly hours. If the agreements are separate, both agreements must contain the statement described in s. 17(5)(b). If, for example, only the excess daily hours agreement contains the statement, then the excess weekly hours agreement will not be valid.

The Director's information document needs to be provided only once, even if the excess daily hours agreement and the excess weekly hours agreement are made at different times, provided that the Director did not publish a revised information document after the earlier agreement was made but before the later agreement was made.

Example:

An employer gives the most recent Director's information document to an employee on May 1, 2005, and the employee provides a written agreement to work excess daily hours on May 2, 2005. The agreement states that the employee was told by the employer that the information document they were provided with is the most recent one published. One month later, the employer asks the employee if they would be willing to work excess weekly hours and they indicate that they would. No revised information document has been published, and the employer tells the employee that the document provided to her on May 1, 2005 is still the most recent document published by the Director. The employee then provides a written agreement to work excess weekly hours; it states that the employee has been given an information document that the employer told her was the most recent one published. Since there was no new information document published between May 2, 2005 and the making of the excess weekly hours agreement and the agreement contains an acknowledgement that the employee has received what the employer has represented is the most recent document, the condition in s. 17(5)(b) is met.

As mentioned above, the two conditions contained in s. 17(5) are in addition to the other requirements regarding agreements. One of these requirements is there must be informed consent by the employee. There may be circumstances where, despite the conditions in s. 17(5) being met, there is not informed consent. For example, if the employee cannot read or understand the information document, was not given an explanation, and was not otherwise aware of what their rights are, then even though the conditions of s. 17(5) have been met, the agreement will not be valid because the element of informed consent is absent. Accordingly, the employee will not be permitted to work the excess hours.

Revocation by Employee – s. 17(6)

17.(6) An employee may revoke an agreement described in subsection (2) or in clause (3)(a) two weeks after giving written notice to the employer.

This section requires that an employee provide an employer with at least two weeks' written notice before withdrawing from an agreement made under s. 17(2) to work excess daily hours or from an agreement made under s. 17(3)(a) to work excess weekly hours. Note that special rules on revocability apply to agreements to work excess daily hours under O Reg 285/01, s. 32 and arrangements regarding daily hours under O Reg 285/01, s. 32.1.

The employee must give the notice in writing; verbal notice will not meet the requirement of this section. Note that where the agreement has been made by the union on behalf of the employee, that the employee has no individual right to revoke the agreement. See the discussion at s. 7.

Further, it is the Program's position that in situations where an agreement to work excess hours is made pursuant to a collective agreement, the ability to revoke the agreement to work excess hours must be made in accordance with the terms of the collective agreement and the Labour Relations Act, 1995 where applicable. Generally, this means that unilateral revocation is not possible during the operation of the collective agreement.

Where employees are able to revoke an agreement and provide the employer with the proper notice, the hours of work limits in s. 17(1) will again apply once the two-week notice period to revoke the agreement to work excess hours has expired, and the employer will no longer be able to require or permit an employee to work beyond those limits, even if the Director has issued an approval to work the excess hours, subject to exceptional circumstances as set out in ESA Part VII, s. 19.

Section 32 of O Reg 285/01, s. 32 provides:

32. (1) Despite subsection 17(6) of the Act, an agreement under subsection 17(2) of the Act that was made at the time of the employee's hiring and that has been approved by the Director is irrevocable unless both the employer and the employee agree to its revocation.

(2) The Director may impose conditions in granting an approval.

ESA Part XXVII, ss. 141(9) and (10) provide:

141. (9) An employer may not require an employee who has made an agreement approved by the Director under a regulation made under paragraph 9 of subsection (1) to work more than 10 hours in a day, except in the circumstances described in section 19.

(10) If an employee has agreed to work hours in excess of those referred to in clause 17(1)(a) and hours in excess of those referred to in clause 17(1)(b), the fact that the Director has approved the agreement in accordance with a regulation made under paragraph 9 of subsection (1) does not prevent the employee from revoking, in accordance with subsection 17(6), that part of the agreement dealing with the hours in excess of those referred to in clause 17(1)(b).

Together these sections provide that despite s. 17(6), employees who were hired on or after September 4, 2001, and who agreed in writing at the time of hiring to work hours in excess of the daily maximum cannot unilaterally withdraw from the agreement, even with two weeks' notice, if the Director of Employment Standards approved the agreement. The agreement can be revoked only if the employer and employee both agree, in writing, to revoke it.

Note that this exception to the revocability of agreements applies only to agreements to work excess daily hours. These employees retain the right under s. 17(6) to revoke, with two weeks' written notice, agreements to work excess weekly hours.

Note also that employees who are party to these approved agreements to work excess daily hours cannot be required to work more than 10 hours a day except in exceptional circumstances as set out in ESA Part VII, s. 19 – see ESA Part XVII s. 141(9).

Revocation by Employer – s. 17(7)

17(7) An employer may revoke an agreement described in subsection (2) or in clause (3)(a) after giving reasonable notice to the employee.

This section requires an employer to provide an employee with reasonable notice if it wishes to withdraw from an agreement regarding excess daily hours made under s. 17(2) or from an agreement regarding excess weekly hours made under s.17(3)(a). Note that agreements under O Reg 285/01, s. 32 and arrangements under O Reg 285/01, s. 32.1 can be revoked only if both the employer and employee wish to revoke them.

The notice is not required to be in writing. Unlike the notice requirement in s. 17(6), verbal notice will suffice, although employers may wish to put the notice in writing in order to avoid misunderstandings.

Whether the notice provided by an employer is reasonable will depend upon the circumstances of each case. The Program does not view reasonable notice in the context of revoking an excess hours agreement under the ESA 2000 to be the same as reasonable notice as that term is used in the context of notice of termination under the common law, and, as such, the principles applied at common law are not necessarily applicable here.

Factors for consideration when determining whether the length of notice is reasonable may include:

- How long the agreement has been in effect;
- How much in advance of the agreed upon expiry date (if any) the revocation will take effect; and
- The reason for the revocation: did the employer lose a contract for work, suffer equipment breakdowns or a shortage of materials needed to perform the work? Was the agreement withdrawn in favour of a different agreement?

It is the Program's position that in situations where an agreement to work excess hours is made pursuant to a collective agreement, the ability to revoke the agreement to work excess hours must be made in accordance with the terms of the collective agreement and the Labour Relations Act, 1995 where applicable. Generally, this means that unilateral revocation is not possible during the operation of the collective agreement.

Once an excess hours agreement is revoked, the hours of work limits in s. 17(1) will once again apply, and the employer will no longer be able to require or permit an employee to work beyond those limits, subject to exceptional circumstances as set out in ESA Part VII, s. 19.

It is the Program's view that an agreement to work excess hours under s. 17(2) or s. 17(3)(a) does not require an employer to provide employees with excess hours; it only allows for excess hours be worked, permitting an employer to require an employee to work any excess hours the employer chooses to provide, assuming, of course, in the case of excess weekly hours that an approval has been granted. An agreement under s. 17(2) or s. 17(3)(a) is in no way a guarantee of wages and there is no basis for a claim by an employee of a violation of the ESA 2000 (e.g., insufficient notice of a constructive dismissal) if excess hours are not provided.

Transition: Certain Agreements – s. 17(8)

17(8) For the purposes of this section,

(a) an agreement to exceed the limit on hours of work in a day set out in clause (1)(a) of this section as it read on February 28, 2005 shall be treated as if it were an agreement described in subsection (2);

(b) an agreement to exceed the limit on hours of work in a work week set out in clause (1)(b) of this section as it read on February 28, 2005 shall be treated as if it were an agreement described in clause (3)(a); and

(c) an agreement to exceed the limit on hours of work in a work week set out in clause (2)(b) of this section as it read on February 28, 2005 shall be treated as if it were an agreement described in clause (3)(a).

Section 17(8) is a transitional provision. It establishes how agreements to work excess hours that were entered into under the provisions of the ESA 2000 before the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 came into force are to be treated.

On February 28, 2005, the relevant provisions read as follows:

Section 17 of the ESA 2000:

(1) Subject to subsection (2), no employer shall require or permit an employee to work more than,

(a) eight hours in a day or, if the employer establishes a regular work day of more than eight hours for the employee, the number of hours in his or her regular work day; or

(b) 48 hours in a work week.

(2) An employer may permit an employee to work up to a specified number of hours in excess of an amount set out in subsection (1) if,

(a) the employee agrees to work those hours; and

(b) the employee will not work more than 60 hours or such other number of hours as are prescribed in a work week.

Section 31 of O Reg 285/01:

(1) An employer may permit an employee to work up to a specified number of hours in excess of the limit on hours of work set out in clause 17(2)(b) of the Act if,

(a) the employee agrees to work those hours; and

(b) the Director approves the agreement.

(2) The Director's approval under clause (1)(b) may be granted with respect to an employer or with respect to a class of employers.

Accordingly:

- Valid agreements to work in excess of the daily hours limit under the pre-March 1, 2005 hours of work rules that have not expired or been revoked continue to be valid agreements to work hours in excess of the daily limit for purposes of the new post-February 28, 2005 hours of work rules.
- Valid agreements to work in excess of the weekly hours limit, to a maximum of 60 hours in a week, under the pre-March 1, 2005 hours of work rules that have not expired or been revoked continue to be valid agreements to work hours in excess of the weekly limit for purposes of the post-February 28, 2005 hours of work rules.
- Valid agreements to work in excess of 60 hours in a week under the pre-March 1, 2005 hours of work rules that have not expired or been revoked continue to be valid agreements to work hours in excess of the weekly limit for purposes of the post-February 28, 2005 hours of work rules.

While the agreements that were entered into under the authority of s. 17(2) and O Reg 285/01, s. 31 as they read on February 28, 2005 ("old agreements") are treated as if they are agreements made under the current s. 17 ("new agreements"), thereby negating the need for employers to enter into another agreement with employees when the amendments to the ESA 2000 came into force, the rules regarding the Director's information document are different. See the discussions of ss. 17(9) and (10) below. Otherwise, old agreements and new agreements are treated the same. In particular, employers who have old agreements with employees must seek approval from the Director before the employee can work more than 48 hours per work week.

Document Re Employee Rights – Exceptions – s. 17(9)

17(9) Subsection (5) does not apply in respect of,

(a) an agreement described in subsection (8); or

(b) an agreement described in subsection (2) or in clause (3) (a) in respect of an employee who is represented by a trade union.

This section sets out two exceptions to the application of s. 17(5). Section 17(5) provides that agreements to work excess daily or weekly hours are not valid unless:

- The employer, before the agreement is made, gives the employee a copy of a document prepared by the Director of Employment Standards that describes the rights of employees and obligations of employers under the hours of work and overtime pay provisions. The document given to the employee must be the most recent version of the document.

  and

- The agreement contains a statement by the employee acknowledging that they received the document that the employer has represented is the most recent document the Director published.

See above for a discussion of s. 17(5).

Section 17(9) provides that the s. 17(5) requirement does not apply to:

An agreement described in s. 17(8)

The agreements described in s. 17(8) are those agreements that were entered into under the provisions of the ESA 2000 before the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 came into force on March 1, 2005. Because the agreements were entered into at a time when the requirement of s. 17(5) was not in force, the conditions for a valid agreement in s. 17(5) do not apply.

Note however that s. 17(10) requires employers who are party to an agreement described in s. 17(8) to provide the information document to employees by June 1, 2005. See the discussion of s. 17(1) below.

Excess daily or weekly hours agreements that are entered into by employees who are represented by a union

The two conditions for a valid agreement that are set out in s. 17(5) do not apply to agreements made in respect of employees who are represented by a trade union.

Transition: Document Re Employee Rights – s. 17(10)

17(10) On or before June 1, 2005, an employer who made an agreement described in subsection (8) with an employee who is not represented by a trade union shall provide the employee with a copy of the most recent document published by the Director under section 21.1.

This provision applies to employers who entered into agreements with employees described in s. 17(8), i.e., old agreements entered into under the provisions of the ESA 2000 before amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 came into force on March 1, 2005.

Section 17(9) provides that the two conditions in s. 17(5) regarding the Director's information document that must be satisfied before written agreements are valid do not apply to old agreements - see s. 17(9) above. However, s.17(10) requires employers who are a party to these old agreements to provide the employees concerned (unless represented by a union) with the most recent information document no later than June 1, 2005.

A failure by an employer who was party to an old agreement to provide the information document by June 1, 2005, while it constitutes a violation of the ESA 2000, does not invalidate the agreement, as contrasted with the result where an employer does not provide the document when an excess hours agreement is entered into on or after March 1, 2005 - see s. 17(5). However, the general proposition that agreements are not valid unless the employee gave their informed consent still applies to these old agreements. See the discussion of the requirements of written agreements at ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and s. 1(1.3).

Transition: Application for Approval Before Commencement – s. 17(11)

17(11) If the employer applies for an approval under section 17.1 before March 1, 2005, the 30-day period referred to in clause (4)(d) shall be deemed to end on the later of,

(a) the last day of the 30-day period; and

(b) March 1, 2005

This is a transitional provision. Pursuant to ESA Part VII, s. 17.1(22), employers can apply for approval of excess weekly hours agreements as of December 9, 2004, the day that the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 received Royal Assent, even though the amendments that require approvals for excess weekly hours are not effective until March 1, 2005. Applications are permitted prior to March 1, 2005 in order to facilitate a seamless transition between the old rules and the new rules.

Section 17(4) permits, in certain circumstances, an employee to work more than 48 hours a work week (up to a maximum of 60) if the employer has not received either an approval or a refusal of an excess weekly hours application within 30 days of the date the application was served. By virtue of s. 17(11), where an employer applies for an approval for excess weekly hours prior to March 1, 2005, the 30-day wait period will expire on March 1, 2005 at the earliest.

For example, an employee agreed in writing to work up to 55 hours per week for an indefinite period back in July 2003. The employer served an application for an excess weekly hours approval on the Director on January 28, 2005. As of March 1, 2005, the Director had not issued either an approval or a refusal of the application. This employee:

- Was permitted to work 55 hours a week up to and including February 28, 2005, pursuant to the provisions of the ESA 2000 that were then in force; and
- On and after March 1, 2005, continues to be permitted to work up to 55 hours per work week pursuant to the pending approval rules of s. 17(4), assuming all of the conditions in s. 17(4) are met by the employer.

ESA Part VII Section 18 – Hours Free From Work

Hours Free From Work – s. 18(1)

18(1) An employer shall give an employee a period of at least 11 consecutive hours free from performing work in each day.

This provision requires that an employee be free from performing work for a particular employer for a period of at least 11 consecutive hours in each day. This requirement is subject to s. 18(2) (employees on call) and s. 19 (exceptional circumstances).

The requirement for 11 consecutive hours off work in each day operates simultaneously with the other provisions in Part VII of the ESA 2000. For example, an employee may agree in writing to work two eight-hour shifts in a row without any break in between them, thus complying with s. 18(3), but if that results in the employee receiving less than 11 consecutive hours off in a day, the schedule will be in violation of s. 18(1) and, therefore, will not be permitted. In other words, an employee cannot agree to work hours that would result in the employee getting less than the 11 consecutive hours free from work required under s. 18(1). See Independent Paperworkers of Canada v Norampac Inc.

A Period of at Least 11 Consecutive Hours

The period of 11 hours free from work must be consecutive. That is, it must be a single period, continuous and unbroken. The word "consecutive" was added to s. 18(1) by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18, effective November 26, 2002. The amendment codified Program policy in this respect.

Each Day

A "day" in this context means a 24-hour period; it does not have to be a calendar day. The Program uses the following interpretation of day in the context of s. 18(1):

- The first day for an employee:
    - Begins at the beginning of the employee’s first shift in the work cycle*; and
    - Ends 24 hours after it began.
- The second day:
    - Begins with the first moment of work that is performed after the end of the first day. This may be immediately after the end of the first day (for example, in regular eight-hour or 12-hour shift schedules or when a day ends partway through a shift), or it may be some time after the end of the first day, depending on the type of shift schedule; and
    - Ends 24 hours after it began.
- The third and each subsequent day begins and ends in the same manner as described above with respect to the second day.

This interpretation of day means that the days do not have to be consecutive. That is, there can be gaps of time in between the end of one day and the beginning of the next day, but only if the employee did not work during that time.

This interpretation of day also means that days cannot overlap with other days for that employee. That is, the beginning of a day cannot be any earlier than the end of the previous day.

Note that the Program's policy regarding the interpretation of the word day in this section has been supported in an arbitrator's decision - see Independent Paperworkers of Canada v Norampac Inc. on the principle that it appropriately refers to the employee's actual work pattern (actual "time on" and "time off") as opposed to a calendar day or even a day as defined in a collective agreement. The arbitrator took the position that the Program's interpretation was:

. . . [C]onsistent with the evident purpose of s. 18 which is to guarantee a minimum period of time off for recreation, rest and recuperation before having to go back to work again - and to make sure that such break from work is available even when an employee is on some rotating shift system, requiring him to change periodically from days, to evenings, to night shift, and back again.

Given the vagaries and variety of scheduling systems and of individual employee circumstances, making the employment standard "employee specific" in this way, is the only way to consistently make sure that the employee gets the required amount of time off during the 24-hour period.

. . . This interpretation of "day" is not perhaps be (sic) the most obvious one. But it is one that most comprehensively and flexibly and liberally meets the statutory objective: to ensure that the employee will achieve his 11-hour break under shifting circumstances.

* A new work cycle begins after every rest period of 24 hours or longer. It is not necessarily the same period as a "work week" as defined in ESA Part 1, s. 1.

3. Examples

Example 1: Illustration Where There is a Regular Eight-Hour Shift Schedule

Employee’s schedule:

- Sunday: Off
- Monday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Tuesday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Wednesday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Thursday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Friday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Saturday: Off

The days in this employee's work cycle are:

- Day 1: Monday 8:00 am to Tuesday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 2: Tuesday 8:00 am to Wednesday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 3: Wednesday 8:00 am to Thursday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 4: Thursday 8:00 am to Friday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 5: Friday 8:00 am to Saturday 8:00 am

    - Number of consecutive hours off: 12

There are at least 11 consecutive hours off in each day. As such, this schedule meets the requirements of s. 18(1).

Example 2: Illustration Where There is a Regular 12-Hour Shift Schedule

Employee's schedule:

- Sunday: Off
- Monday: 6:00 am to 6:00 pm
- Tuesday: 6:00 am to 6:00 pm
- Wednesday: 6:00 am to 6:00 pm
- Thursday: 6:00 am to 6:00 pm
- Friday: Off
- Saturday: Off

The days in this employee's work cycle are as follows:

- Day 1: Monday 6:00 am to Tuesday 6:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 12
- Day 2: Tuesday 6:00 am to Wednesday 6:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 12
- Day 3: Wednesday 6:00 am to Thursday 6:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 12
- Day 4: Thursday 6:00 am to Friday 6:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 12

There are at least 11 consecutive hours off in each day. As such, this schedule meets the requirements of s. 18(1).

Note that while an employee with this kind of shift schedule may agree in writing to work more than twelve hours a day, thereby complying with s. 17 of the ESA 2000, their ability to do so is restricted by s. 18. For example, an employee with this kind of shift schedule may agree in writing to work an extra four hours after their regular 12-hour shift because a co-worker did not show up. While the requirements of s. 17 (which permits employees to work in excess of their regular established work day that is longer than eight hours if they agree in writing to do so) and s. 18(3) (which permits employees to work successive shifts that together total more than 13 hours if they agree in writing to do so) are met, the requirements of s. 18(1) will not be met. The employee would have worked 16 hours in a day, resulting in there being only eight consecutive hours free from work in that day.

Example 3: Illustration Where There Is an Irregular Schedule

Employee's schedule:

- Sunday: Off

- Monday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Tuesday: 12:00 pm to 8:00 pm
- Wednesday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Thursday: 2:00 pm to 10:00 pm
- Friday: 12:00 pm to 8:00 pm
- Saturday: Off

The days in this employee's work cycle are:

- Day 1: Monday 8:00 am to Tuesday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16 (from 4:00 pm Monday to 8:00 am Tuesday)
- Day 2: Tuesday 12:00 pm to Wednesday 12:00 pm (Note: The hours off between Tuesday 8:00 am and Tuesday 12:00 pm are not included in any day.)
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 12 (from 8:00 pm Tuesday to 8:00 am Wednesday)
- Day 3: Wednesday 12:00 pm to Thursday 12:00 pm (Note: Because the second day ended partway through a shift, the third day starts immediately after the end of the second day, i.e., partway through the same shift.)
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 20 (from 4:00 pm Wednesday to 12:00 pm Thursday)
- Day 4: Thursday 2:00 pm to Friday 2:00 pm (Note: The hours off between Thursday 12:00 pm and 2:00 pm are not included in any day.)
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 14 (from 10:00 pm Thursday to 12:00 pm Friday)
- Day 5: Friday 2:00 pm to Saturday 2:00 pm
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 18 (from 8:00 pm Friday to 2:00 pm Saturday)

There are at least 11 consecutive hours off in each day. As such, this schedule meets the requirements of s. 18(1).

Example 4: The "Short Shift Change"

a) Example of a Prohibited Short Shift Change

Employee’s schedule:

- Sunday: Off
- Monday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Tuesday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Wednesday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Thursday: 12:00 am to 8:00 am
- Friday: 12:00 am to 8:00 am
- Saturday: 12:00 am to 8:00 am

In this example, the employee moves from working the 8 am to 4 pm shift to working the midnight to 8 am shift in the same cycle.

The days in this employee's work cycle are as follows:

- Day 1: Monday 8:00 am to Tuesday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 2: Tuesday 8:00 am to Wednesday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 3: Wednesday 8:00 am to Thursday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 8
- Day 4: Friday 12:00 am to Saturday 12:00 am (Note: The hours off between Thursday 8:00 am and Friday 12:00 am are not included in any day)
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 5: Saturday 12:00 am to Sunday 12:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16

There is no period of 11 consecutive hours off in the third day, which is Wednesday 8:00 am to Thursday 8:00 am. During that day, which is when the short shift change occurred, the employee worked 8:00 am to 4:00 pm, was off from 4:00 pm to 12:00 am (eight hours) and then went back to work from midnight to 8:00 am. The employee received only eight consecutive hours off. This schedule does not meet the requirements of s. 18(1).

b) Example of a Permitted Short Shift Change

Employee’s schedule:

- Sunday: Off
- Monday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Tuesday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Wednesday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Thursday: 4:00 am to 12:00 pm
- Friday: 4:00 am to 12:00 pm
- Saturday: Off

In this example, the employee moves from working the 8 am to 4 pm shift to working the 4:00 am to 12:00 pm shift in the same work cycle.

The days in this employee's work cycle are as follows:

- Day 1: Monday 8:00 am to Tuesday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 2: Tuesday 8:00 am to Wednesday 8:00 am

    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 3: Wednesday 8:00 am to Thursday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 12
- Day 4: Thursday 8:00 am to Friday 8:00 am (Note: because the third day ended partway through a shift, the fourth day starts immediately after the end of the third day, i.e., partway through the same shift)
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 5: Friday 8 am to Saturday 8 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 20

There are at least 11 consecutive hours off in each day. As such, this schedule meets the requirements of s. 18(1).

Example 5: Back-to-Back Shifts

Example of a Prohibited Back-to-Back Shift in a Regular Eight-Hour Shift Schedule

Employee's schedule:

- Sunday: Off
- Monday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Tuesday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Wednesday:
    - First shift: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
    - Second shift: 4:00 pm to 12:00 am
- Thursday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Friday: 8:00 am to 4:00 pm
- Saturday: Off

In this example, the employee normally works 8 am to 4 pm, Monday to Friday. On Wednesday, the employee is asked to stay on and work an extra eight hour shift. The employee agrees in writing to receive less than eight hours off in between successive shifts that total more than 13 hours, as required by s. 18(3). However, the resulting schedule does not meet the s. 18(1) requirement to have at least 11 consecutive hours off each day.

The days in this employee's work cycle are as follows:

- Day 1: Monday 8:00 am to Tuesday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 2: Tuesday 8:00 am to Wednesday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 3: Wednesday 8:00 am to Thursday 8:00 am

    - Number of consecutive hours off: 8
- Day 4: Thursday 8:00 am to Friday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16
- Day 5: Friday 8:00 am to Saturday 8:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 16

There is no period of 11 consecutive hours off in the third day, which is day is Wednesday 8:00 am to Thursday 8:00 am. During that day, which is when the back-to-back shift occurred, the employee worked 8:00 am to 4:00 pm, then again from 4:00 pm to 12:00 pm, and was off from midnight to 8:00 am (eight hours). The employee received only eight consecutive hours off. This schedule does not meet the requirements of s. 18(1).

Exception – s. 18(2)

18(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to an employee who is on call and called in during a period in which the employee would not otherwise be expected to perform work for his or her employer.

This provision provides an exception to the requirement in s. 18(1) that an employee be given at least 11 consecutive hours free from work each day. The exception applies to an employee who is on call and is called in during a period the employee would not otherwise have been expected to work.

This "on call" exception is an exception only to the 11 consecutive hours free from work each day requirement ins. 18(1). It is not an exception to any other hours of work provisions, e.g., limits on hours of work, requirement for time off between shifts, the weekly or bi-weekly free time requirement. This means, for example, that if the hours worked while on call will result in the s. 17(1) limits on hours of work being exceeded, the employer must first get the employee's written agreement to work the excess hours.

The phrase "called in during a period in which the employee would not otherwise be expected to perform work" has been held not to include situations where the employee was asked to remain at work following the conclusion of their regular shift. In Imperial Tobacco v Bakery, Confectionary and Tobacco Workers International Union, Local 323T, (2002), 111 LAC (4th) 434 (Ont Arb Bd), although the union argued that such post-shift work was described in the collective agreement overtime provisions as "call-in" work, the arbitrator disagreed and in any case held that this could not override the meaning of the phrases "on call" and "called in to work" as used in s. 18(2). As a consequence, the exception in s. 18(2) did not apply and the parties were subject to the 11-hour daily rest requirement.

Similarly, the Program does not consider an employee who had been asked to work a "relief" shift (e.g., to pick up a shift for an employee who had called in sick) to be an employee who is on call.

The Program considers "on call" employees to refer, for example, to an employee who is required to be accessible by pager, phone or e-mail to respond to call(s) to perform work. The work so performed may include work done over the phone or by e-mail as well as work done at the employer's workplace.

Free From Work Between Shifts – s. 18(3)

18(3) An employer shall give an employee a period of at least eight hours free from the performance of work between shifts unless the total time worked on successive shifts does not exceed 13 hours or unless the employer and the employee agree otherwise.

This section requires employers to provide employees with a minimum period free from work of eight hours between successive shifts, with two exceptions. First, an employee may work successive shifts without the eight-hour free period if the total number of hours worked on the successive shifts is 13 or less. Second, the employer and employee can agree, in writing, to forego the eight hour period entirely or reduce its length – see ESA Part I, subsections 1(3) and (3.1) for more information on agreements in writing.

"Successive shifts" are two shifts following one after another, whether or not there is time off in between the shifts. It includes "split shifts", "back-to-back" shifts, as well as ordinary daily shifts. Section 18(3) may also apply when an employee is on an "on call" shift. In that case, the employee is not at the workplace but is holding himself or herself ready for a call to work - see the discussion of this term in subsection (2) above. Note that when employees are on call the first point in an "on call period" in which the employee actually performs work will mark the commencement of a successive shift and any time actually worked while the employee is on call will count towards the maximum 13 hours of work that may be performed.

The requirement for rest in between shifts operates simultaneously with the other provisions in Part VII of the ESA 2000. For example, an employee may agree in writing to work two eight-hour shifts in a row without any break in between them, thus complying with s. 18(3), but if that results in the employee receiving less than 11 consecutive hours off in a day as required by s. 18(1), the schedule will be in violation of s. 18(1) and, therefore, will not be permitted.

On a similar note, the other provisions in Part VII continue to apply even if one of the two exceptions to the application of s. 18(3) apply. For example, an employee may work their regular six-hour shift, then be asked by the employer to stay on for another six-hour shift. While the requirement for the eight-hour period free from work between shifts will not apply (because the time worked on successive shifts is 13 hours or less), the hours of work limit in s. 17(1), for example, do apply and the employer must get the employee's written agreement to work excess daily hours.

Some have argued that s. 18(3) is redundant of s. 18(1), in that it does not require any rest period that s. 18(1) does not already require. The following example demonstrates how that is not the case:

Section 18(1) requires 11 hours off per day. Section 18(3) requires eight hours off between shifts when consecutive shifts exceed 13 hours.

Employee’s schedule:

- Monday:
    - First shift: 6:00 am to 10:00 am
    - Second shift: Monday 9:00 pm to Tuesday 7:00 am
- Tuesday: 2:00 pm to 6:00 am

Days in employee’s work cycle:

- Day 1: Monday 6:00 am to Tuesday 6:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 11 hours
- Day 2: Tuesday 6:00 am to Wednesday 6:00 am
    - Number of consecutive hours off: 7 hours (between 7:00 am and 2:00 pm) and 11 hours (between Tuesday 6:00 pm to Wednesday 6:00 am)

Day 1 and day 2 comply with s. 18(1) because the employee has at least 11 hours off each day. Day 2 does not comply with s. 18(3), because the total number of hours worked during the 10 hour shift (which started on day 1 and finished on day 2) and the following four hour shift exceeds 13 hours, yet there are only seven hours off between the two shifts. Unless there is a written agreement as per s. 18(3), there will be a violation of s. 18(3). Section 18(3) is not concerned with what happens in a day, it only deals with time off between shifts, regardless of which day those shifts fall on.

Weekly or Bi-weekly Free Time Requirements – s. 18(4)

18(4) An employer shall give an employee a period free from the performance of work equal to,

(a) at least 24 consecutive hours in every work week; or

(b) at least 48 consecutive hours in every period of two consecutive work weeks.

Section 18(4) of the Act establishes weekly or bi-weekly free time requirements for employees. The free time periods must be at least either:

- 24 consecutive hours in every work week; or
- 48 consecutive hours in every two consecutive work weeks.

Every period of two consecutive "work weeks"

The reference to two consecutive work weeks indicates a "rolling" two work week period. Program policy originally viewed each period of two work weeks as separate and distinct with no overlap. However, the language of the section indicates that free time is to be "in every period of two work weeks". Program policy now is that in each and every period of two work weeks, the employer must provide an employee a period free from the performance of work of at least 48 consecutive hours. For example, if an employer provides employees with a period free from the performance of work on a bi-weekly basis, there must be a period of at least 48 consecutive hours in which the employee is free from work in work weeks 1 and 2, in work weeks 2 and 3, in work weeks 3 and 4, and so forth.

Any time an employee is free from the performance of work can be used to satisfy the requirement of s. 18(4). For example, time an employee is off work because they are off on a public holiday, on sick, family responsibility or bereavement leave, on short-term disability, or on vacation can all be used to satisfy this requirement.

A "work week" is defined in s. 1(1) of the ESA 2000 as:

"work week" means,

(a) a recurring period of seven consecutive days selected by the employer for the purpose of scheduling work, or

(b) if the employer has not selected such a period, a recurring period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

See ESA Part I, s. 1 for a discussion of the definition of "work week".

There is no provision for employees to agree to forego their required weekly or bi-weekly free time. However, the right to the free time can be overridden in s. 19 exceptional circumstances.

Switching between Compliance with the Weekly and Bi-weekly Free Time Requirements

The issue has arisen as to whether an employer is permitted under this section to switch back and forth from complying with the weekly free time requirement in some weeks to complying with the bi-weekly free time requirement in other weeks, and vice versa.

Nothing in this subsection prohibits the practice of "switching". However, the manner in which the switch must be effected in order to be in compliance with s. 18(4) will result in a schedule that provides the employee with, on average, no less than 24 hours free from the performance of work in every work week.

For example:

The employer starts its schedule by complying with the bi-weekly free time requirement:

- Week 1: 0 hours off
- Week 2: 48 hours off
- Week 3: 0 hours off

The employer then wants to switch to comply with the weekly free time requirement. It creates this schedule:

- Week 4: 24 hours off
- Week 5: 24 hours off
- Week 6: 24 hours off

This schedule is NOT in compliance with s. 18(4). As stated above, the reference in s. 18(4)(b) to "every two consecutive work weeks" is a rolling two work week period; every two work weeks must contain at least 48 hours of free time in order to comply with the biweekly free time requirement. In this example, Week 1 and Week 2 and Week 3 are all subject to the biweekly free time requirement. This means that:

- With respect to Week 1: there must be at least 48 hours free from work in the weeks of Week 1 and Week 2. The requirement is met in the example.
- With respect to Week 2: there must be at least 48 hours free from work in the weeks of:
    - Week 1 and Week 2, and
    - Week 2 and Week 3.

The requirement is met in the example.

- With respect to Week 3: there must be at least 48 hours free from work in the weeks of:
    - Week 2 and Week 3, and
    - Week 3 and Week 4.

Because only 24 hours free time were provided in the two-week period of Week 3 and Week 4, the employer has not complied with s. 18(4) in this example. In order to effect the switch from complying with the biweekly free time requirement to the weekly free time requirement after Week 3, the employer must schedule at least 48 hours off in Week 4.

ESA Part VII Section 19 - Exceptional Circumstances

Exceptional Circumstances - s. 19

19 An employer may require an employee to work more than the maximum number of hours permitted under section 17 or to work during a period that is required to be free from performing work under section 18 only as follows, but only so far as is necessary to avoid serious interference with the ordinary working of the employer's establishment or operations:

1. To deal with an emergency.

2. If something unforeseen occurs, to ensure the continued delivery of essential public services, regardless of who delivers those services.

3. If something unforeseen occurs, to ensure that continuous processes or seasonal operations are not interrupted.

4. To carry out urgent repair work to the employer's plant or equipment.

This provision allows employers to require employees to work more daily or weekly hours than are permitted under s. 17 or to work during a free period (daily, in between shifts and weekly or bi-weekly) as required by s. 18, in any of the four specified circumstances, but only so far as is necessary to avoid serious interference with the ordinary working of the employer's establishment or operations.

Hours worked pursuant to s. 19 while s. 19 is in operation are not counted towards the normal limits in s. 17, nor are they taken into account when determining whether the requirements for free periods under s. 18 have been met. (Note, however, that hours worked while s. 19 is in operation will count for the purposes of determining whether any overtime pay is owing.)

Emergency

An employer may require an employee to work hours in excess of those permitted under s. 17 or during a free period required under s. 18 to deal with an emergency, but only so far as is necessary to avoid serious interference with the ordinary working of the employer's establishment or operations.

For example, a fire in the workplace or a natural disaster may constitute an emergency.

Unforeseen Occurrence Affecting Public Services

An employer may require an employee to work hours in excess of those permitted under s. 17 or during a free period required under s. 18, but only so far as is necessary to avoid serious interference with the ordinary working of the employer's establishment or operations, if:

- An unforeseen event occurs; and
- The unforeseen event threatens to disrupt the continued delivery of essential public services.

The phrase "essential public services" refers to services that are provided to the public at large and which may be considered "essential" because they are necessary for an employer to prevent situations that could result in, for example:

- Danger to life, health or safety;

- The destruction or serious deterioration of machinery, equipment or premises;
- Serious environmental damage; or
- Disruption of the administration of the courts.

An example of an essential public service would include the provision of an uninterrupted public power supply if a disruption could result in any of the situations listed above. For example, if a power disruption would threaten patient care at hospitals and nursing homes, an uninterrupted supply of power would be considered an essential public service since it is necessary to prevent danger to the life, health and safety of patients.

This exception applies "regardless of who delivers those [essential public] services". As such, this provision could apply to employees who work for private companies that deliver public services (for example, privately run ambulance or road-clearing services, or a business that provides food to hospitals).

Unforeseen Occurrence Affecting Continuous Processes or Seasonal Operations

An employer may require an employee to work hours in excess of those permitted under s. 17 or during a free period required under s. 18, but only so far as is necessary to avoid serious interference with the ordinary working of the employer's establishment or operations if:

- An unforeseen event occurs; and
- The unforeseen event threatens to disrupt continuous processes or seasonal operations.

Urgent Repair to Plant or Equipment

An employer may require an employee to work hours in excess of those permitted under s. 17 or during a free period required under s. 18, but only so far as is necessary to avoid serious interference with the ordinary working of the employer's establishment or operations, if the employee is needed to carry out urgent repair work to the employer's plant or equipment.

An example of such a situation may be where management determines, whether or not in the course of routine maintenance, that repairs are urgently required to be done to machinery and a delay in carrying out the repairs will result in serious damage.

When Section 19 Will Not Apply

Section 19 is intended to allow employers to require employees to work hours in excess of the usual limits or during required rest periods only in exceptional circumstances. It is not intended to allow employers to require extra work of employees to address, for example, problems that arise because of inadequate business planning, or changes in business cycles (e.g., a fluctuation in the level of demand for the employer's product).

ESA Part VII Section 20 - Eating Periods

Eating Periods - s. 20(1)

20(1) An employer shall give an employee an eating period of at least 30 minutes at intervals that will result in the employee working no more than five consecutive hours without an eating period.

This section imposes an obligation upon an employer to provide an eating period of at least 30 minutes timed so that no employee works longer than five consecutive hours without receiving an eating period. This requirement is subject to the exception set out in s. 20(2).

Unless the employee receives an uninterrupted 30 minutes, he or she is not considered to have received his or her entitlement under s. 20(1). However, note that under s. 6(2)(a)(i) of O Reg 285/01, work performed during the time employees are entitled to take time off work for an eating period (i.e., where the employee decides on his or her own initiative to work during the eating period even though he or she is entitled to the time off to eat) is deemed not to be performed. See O Reg 285/01, s. 6 for a discussion of this provision.

It is the Program's policy that s. 20 of the Employment Standards Act, 2000 and s. 6 of O Reg 285/01 allows employers to require employees to take their eating periods in a designated place (e.g., on the employer's premises) and to be "on call" (i.e., available to return to work) while on the eating period. Unless the employee is actually required to work during the eating period (i.e., he or she is interrupted by a work demand before the period is completed), the employee will be considered to have received the eating period entitlement for the purposes of s. 20.

Further, it is the Program's policy that the Act does not require employers to schedule a particular time for the employee to take as the eating period. For example, in a retail shop that has only one employee working during a shift, the employer may tell the employee to take his/her eating period when there are no customers for a stretch of time. If the employee has an uninterrupted period of 30 minutes during the requisite five-hour period, there will be compliance with s. 20. If an employee is interrupted at any point during the 30-minute period, the eating period is considered not to have been provided, and a new uninterrupted 30-minute period must be given during the requisite five-hour period. See subsection (2) below for a discussion on splitting up the eating period under s. 20(2).

It should also be noted that there is no obligation upon an employer under the Act to provide any break (e.g., coffee breaks) in addition to the eating period requirement of s. 20(1).

Exception - s. 20(2)

20(2) Subsection (1) does not apply if the employer and the employee agree, whether or not in writing, that the employee is to be given two eating periods that together total at least 30 minutes in each consecutive five-hour period.

This section provides an exception to the eating period requirement in s. 20(1). It provides that instead of the requirement in s. 20(1), an employer and employee may agree to an alternative eating period arrangement whereby the employee receives two eating periods that together total at least 30 minutes within a period of five consecutive hours. Agreements under this section need not be in writing. Unlike the requirement in s. 20(1), the eating periods must be completed before the five-hour period expires (under s. 20(1), the eating period can begin at the five-hour mark). For example, an employer and employee may agree that an employee will receive two 15-minute eating periods within the 5-hour period. Consistent with the Program's interpretation of s. 20(1), it is the Program's position that the employer is not required to schedule particular times for the employee to take the eating periods as long as it is within the time period specified in s. 20(2). Additionally, the employer can require the employee to take the two 15-minute periods in a designated place and to be "on call" while on the break. For employees to be considered to have received their entitlement under s. 20(2), the two eating periods must be uninterrupted. (However, note that under s. 6(2)(a)(i) of O Reg. 285/01, work performed during the time employees are entitled to take time off work for an eating period (i.e., where the employee decides on his or her own initiative to work during the eating period(s) even though he or she is entitled to the time off to eat) is deemed not to be performed. See O Reg. 285/01, s.6 for a discussion of this provision.

Agreements under s. 20(2) can specify the length of the two shorter periods, or they can be open-ended, providing that the two shorter periods will be of unspecified lengths that together total 30 minutes. For example, there is a one-person workplace where the employee is required to remain at the workplace "on call", and the employer does not schedule a particular time for the employee to take the eating period. The employer and employee may enter into an agreement that provides that the eating period will be split into two shorter periods of unspecified length as may be necessary to deal with customers. In this case, if, for example, the employee had 20 uninterrupted minutes before a customer came in, there will be compliance with s. 20(2) so long as the employee subsequently has an uninterrupted 10-minute period within the requisite five-hour period.

There is no provision for an employer and an employee to agree to take the eating period in more than two instalments, to eliminate eating periods altogether or to extend the time in which an eating period must be given (e.g., to six or seven hours).

ESA Part VII Section 21 - Payment Not Required

21 An employer is not required to pay an employee for an eating period in which work is not being performed unless his or her employment contract requires such payment.

This provision states that employers are not obliged to pay employees for time spent on eating periods where work is not being performed, unless the terms of the employee's employment contract stipulate otherwise.

In the event that an employee is required to work during the eating period, the eating period counts as hours of work and must be paid for only to the extent of the actual interruption. (In such a case, there may also be a violation of the s. 20 requirement to provide the employee with an eating period.) The rules are different for breaks other than eating periods, e.g., coffee breaks. See O Reg 285/01, s. 6.

ESA Part VII Section 21.1 – Director to Prepare Document

Director to Prepare Document – s. 21.1(1); If Document Not Up to Date – s. 21.1(2)

21.1(1) The Director shall prepare and publish a document that describes such rights of employees and obligations of employers under this Part and Part VIII as the Director believes an employee should be made aware of in connection with an agreement referred to in subsection 17(2) or (3).

(2) If the Director believes that a document prepared under subsection (1) has become out of date, he or she shall prepare and publish a new document.

These provisions are to be read in conjunction with s. 17(5) of the ESA 2000. Section 17(5) provides that employees' written agreements to work excess daily or weekly hours are, with some exceptions, invalid unless, among other things, the employer gives the employee a copy of the Director's information document described in s. 21.1 before the employee enters into the agreement.

Note that pursuant to s. 17 (9), this requirement does not apply in respect of excess hours agreements made before March 1, 2005, the date that the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004, SO 2004, c 21 came into force, or in respect of excess hours agreements relating to an employee represented by a union [whenever made], although in the case of the former the employer was (pursuant to another subsection – s. 17(10)) – that has since been repealed) required to provide a copy of the information document to the employee concerned by June 1, 2005.

These provisions provide that the Director of Employment Standards will prepare and publish an information document that describes rights of employees and obligations of employers under Part VII (Hours of Work and Eating Periods) and Part VIII (Overtime Pay). The rights and obligations that are to be contained in the document are those that the Director believes an employee should be made aware of in connection with excess hours agreements. If the Director believes that the document is out of date, the Director will prepare and publish a new document.

ESA Part VII.0.1 - Written Policy on Disconnecting from Work

Part VII.0.1 was added to the ESA 2000 by the Working for Workers Act, 2021 (WFWA), effective December 2, 2021.

Part VII.0.1 of the ESA requires employers that employ 25 or more employees on January 1st of any year to have a written policy in place before March 1st of that year for all employees with respect to disconnecting from work. The policy must include the date it was prepared and the date any changes were made to the policy. The employer also has certain obligations with respect to providing a copy of the written policy to its employees and with respect to the retention of its disconnecting from work policies (see subsection 15(8) for more information on the record-keeping obligations).

A transitional provision sets out different timeframes that apply when the Part first takes effect; employers are to use January 1, 2022 (which is the January 1st immediately preceding the date that is six months after the WFWA receives Royal Assent) as the point-in-time to establish whether they meet the “25-employee threshold” and, if they do, they must have a written policy in place for all employees with respect to disconnecting from work by June 2, 2022 (which is six months after the day the WFWA received Royal Assent). After 2022, the transition provision will no longer have any effect and the time periods apply as set out in subsection 21.1.2(1).

The phrase “disconnecting from work” is defined to mean not engaging in work-related communications, including emails, telephone calls, video calls or the sending or reviewing of other messages, so as to be free from the performance of work.

Part VII.0.1 applies to all employees and employers covered by the ESA, except the Crown, a Crown agency or an authority, board, commission or corporation all of whose members are appointed by the Crown and any employees of such an employer. See section 2.1 of O. Reg. 285/01 for information.

ESA Part VII.0.1 Section 21.1.1 – Interpretation

Interpretation - s. 21.1.1

In this Part,

“disconnecting from work” means not engaging in work-related communications, including emails, telephone calls, video calls or the sending or reviewing of other messages, so as to be free from the performance of work.

This provision was added to the ESA by the Working for Workers Act, 2021 effective December 2, 2021. Section 21.1.1 defines the phrase “disconnecting from work” for the purposes of Part VII.0.1 of the Act. As such, this definition applies to the requirement set out in section 21.1.2 providing that, where the relevant criteria are met, an employer must – within the required timeframe - ensure it has a written policy in place for all employees with respect to disconnecting from work.

“Disconnecting from work” is defined to mean not engaging in work-related communications, including emails, telephone calls, video calls or the sending or reviewing of other messages, so as to be free from the performance of work.

The definition provides an inclusive list of some types of work-related communications: emails, telephone calls, video calls, sending and/or reviewing of other messages. As this list is inclusive, and not exhaustive, other types of work-related communications could equally fall under this definition.

Per the definition, “disconnecting from work” means not engaging in work-related communications and, as such, the employee would consequently “be free from the performance of work” during the time the employee is “disconnected”. Note that per the ESA’s rules on when work is deemed to be performed, if an employee performs work, for example engages in reviewing or drafting emails, the time the employee spends doing those activities is generally considered to be “working time” under the ESA. This is the case even if the employee does so, for example, from home after the employee’s day shift is over and where a “disconnecting from work” policy that says employees are not to work from home is in place. See s. 1.1 of O. Reg. 285/01 for more information.

ESA Part VII.0.1 Section 21.1.2 – Written Policy on Disconnecting from Work

Written Policy on Disconnecting from Work - s. 21.1.2(1)

21.1.2(1) An employer that, on January 1 of any year, employs 25 or more employees shall, before March 1 of that year, ensure it has a written policy in place for all employees with respect to disconnecting from work that includes the date the policy was prepared and the date any changes were made to the policy.

Subsection 21.1.2(1) was added to the ESA 2000 by the Working for Workers Act, 2021, effective December 2, 2021.

Section 21.1.2 creates certain obligations on employers to put in place and distribute to their employees a written policy about "disconnecting from work". This section does not establish a right for employees to disconnect from work. Employees' rights under the ESA to not perform work are established in other Parts of the Act, particularly the Hours of Work and Eating Periods, Vacation With Pay, and Public Holiday Parts of the Act, in conjunction with the "When Work Deemed to be Performed" provision in O. Reg. 285/01. However, an employer's policy may amount to a greater right or benefit than an employment standard under the Act or may otherwise be contractually binding, and therefore the policy may itself establish a right that applies instead of the employment standard.

Subsection 21.1.2(1) provides that an employer that employs 25 or more employees on January 1st of any year must, before March 1 of that same year, ensure that a written policy is in place for all employees with respect to disconnecting from work. Disconnecting from work is defined in section 21.1.1. The policy must include the date the policy was prepared and the date any changes were made to the policy.

Note that this provision must be read in conjunction with subsection (5) , which is a transition provision that applies when the Part first takes effect. Subsection (5) modifies both the reference date for determining whether the 25-employee threshold is met (to January 1, 2022) and the timeframe within which a written policy with respect to disconnecting from work must be in place to June 2, 2022 (which is six months after Royal Assent). After 2022, the transition provision will no longer have any effect and the time periods apply as set out in subsection 21.1.2(1).

In order to better understand the provision, the key elements have been broken down and discussed individually below.

An employer that employs 25 or more employees on January 1 of any year

In order for an employer to be required to have a written policy in place for all employees with respect to disconnecting from work under the ESA, the employer must employ 25 or more employees on January 1st of any year. This is a point-in-time assessment. In other words, in order to determine whether this criterion is met, the employer must take a "snapshot" of the number of employees it employs on January 1st.

If on January 1st, the employer employs fewer than 25 employees, then the ESA does not impose a requirement that the employer have a written policy in place with respect to disconnecting from work. This is the case even if the employer's employee count increases at a later point in the same calendar year. For example, if an employer employs 20 employees on January 1st (and hence the requirement does not apply) and later hires five more employees in June of that same year, the employer continues to not be subject to the requirements to have a written policy in place for all employees with respect to disconnecting from work. However, if all 25 employees remain employed by that employer, the employer will have obligations under this Part in the following year when the "snapshot" assessment is again undertaken on the following January 1st. In this example, the employer will have 25 employees on that January 1st date and will therefore be required to have a written policy in place for all employees with respect to disconnecting from work before March 1st of that year.

Conversely, if an employer employs 25 employees or more on January 1st (and hence the requirement applies) and that employer's employee count decreases at a later point in the same calendar year, the employer is still obligated to have a written policy in place with respect to disconnecting from work. This is the case until the "snapshot" assessment of the "25-employee threshold" is again undertaken on the following January 1st. If the employer employs fewer than 25 employees on January 1, the ESA requirement to have a written policy in place no longer applies to that employer.

There are a number of issues that may arise in determining whether the "25-employee" threshold is met:

i.Related Employers

If two or more employers are treated as one employer by virtue of s. 4 of the Act, then all employees employed by these two or more employers are included when determining whether the "25-employee" threshold has been met. This is because of the definition of "employer" in s. 1 of the Act, which reads:

"employer" includes,

(b) any persons treated as one employer under section 4, and includes a person who was an employer.

ii. Multiple Locations

Where a single employer has multiple locations, all employees employed at each of the locations in Ontario are to be included when determining whether the "25-employee" threshold has been met. For example, an employer owns three sandwich shops with 12 employees employed in each shop on January 1st. This employer employs 36 employees. The employer must have a written policy in place for all employees with respect to disconnecting from work, even though there are fewer than 25 employees employed at each individual shop.

iii. Which Employees are Included in the Count?

All workers who meet the definition of "employee" are included when determining whether the 25-employee threshold has been met. See the discussion of the definition of "employee" in ESA Part I, s. 1 of the Manual. Included in the definition of "employee" are:

- Homeworkers;
- Probationary employees;
- Some trainees;
- Officers of a corporation who perform work or supply services for wages;
- Employees on definite term or specific task contracts of any length;
- Employees who are on lay-off, so long as the employment relationship has not been terminated and severed pursuant to Part XV of the Act;
- Employees who are on a leave of absence, including leaves of absence under Part XIV of the ESA
- Employees who are on strike or who are locked-out. Persons on strike or lock-out are employees under common law and are also considered to be employees under the inclusive definition of "employee" in the Act; and
- Employees who are exempted from the application of all or part of the Act. Employees do not lose their status as employees merely by virtue of being exempt from all or part of the Act. Note, however, that the individuals exempted from the application of the Act in s. 3(5) of the Act are not "employees", and therefore are not included in the count.

Employees of temporary help agencies are employees of the agency, so are included in the count only for the purpose of determining whether the agency has met the 25-employee threshold, not for the purpose of determining whether the client the employee is placed with has met the 25-employee threshold. Note that the agency's count must include all of its assignment employees, whether active or inactive on January 1st.

When this “count” is being done, it is the number of employees that are counted, and not the number of "full-time equivalents". This means that part-time employees each count as one employee, regardless of the number of hours they may work. For example, an employer that employs 26 part-time employees who each work halftime has 13 full-time equivalents, but employs 26 employees for the purpose of this provision.

The question is not whether there are at least 25 employees scheduled to work or working on January 1. The question is whether the employer has an employment relationship with at least 25 employees on January 1.

The policy must be in writing and must be in place before March 1st

The employer’s policy with respect to disconnecting from work must be in writing, which includes being electronic. Note that subsections (2) and (3) impose requirements on the employer with respect to providing a copy of the written policy to employees.

The policy must be in place before March 1st. In other words, the latest day the policy can take effect in order for the employer to be in compliance with the provision is the last day of February. (Note this is not the case during the time when the transition provisions in subsection (5) apply.)

While compliance with this provision requires the employer to have a written policy with respect to disconnecting from work in place by March 1st - and to provide a copy of the written policy to employees within the set timeframes - note that there is no contravention of Part VII.0.1 simply because the employer doesn’t put into practice what has been described in its policy.

All employees must be covered by a written policy

All employees must be covered by the employer’s written policy. In other words, the employer would not be in compliance with this provision if its policy applied to only a portion of its employees – for example, if the policy applied only to the employer’s sales staff but not its managerial staff. However, this doesn’t mean that the employer is required to have the same policy for all of its employees. It is Program policy that the employer’s policy can be comprised of different policies (either in a single document or in multiple documents) for different individuals or different groups/classes of employees or it could be a single policy that applies to its employees across-the-board. The written policy with respect to disconnecting from work may be a stand-alone document, or it may be part of another document (e.g. a comprehensive workplace HR policies and procedures manual).

The written policy must be with respect to disconnecting from work

The written policy that is in place must be with respect to disconnecting from work. Section 21.1.2 does not specify what type of information the policy must contain, though subsection (4) provides that the policy must contain any information that is prescribed by regulation (no such regulations were prescribed at the time of writing).

“Disconnecting from work” is defined in section 21.1.1.

> “disconnecting from work” means not engaging in work-related communications, including emails, telephone calls, video calls or the sending or reviewing of other messages, so as to be free from the performance of work.

In order to be in compliance with section 21.1.2, the topic of the employer’s policy must therefore be employees not engaging in work-related communications, so as to be free from the performance of work.

This provision does not create a “right to disconnect from work” for employees. In other words, it does not impose obligations on an employer to allow employees to “disconnect from work” and to be free from the obligation to engage in work-related communications. However, it does require that the employer's policy around "disconnecting from work" be stated in writing and provided to employees per subsections (2) and (3).

Some examples of what a "disconnecting from work" policy may address:

- The employer's expectations, if any, of employees to read or to reply to work-related emails or to answer phone calls after their shift is over.
    - The policy may set out different expectations for different situations. For example, the policy may contain different expectations depending on the time of day of the communication, the subject matter of the communication, or who is contacting the employee – e.g. the client, a supervisor, or a colleague.

- The employer's requirements in relation to employees turning on out-of-office notifications and/or changing their voicemail messages when they are not scheduled to work to signal that they will not be responding until the next scheduled work day.

Note that per the ESA's rules on when work is deemed to be performed, if an employee performs work, for example engages in reviewing or drafting emails, the time the employee spends doing those activities is generally considered to be "working time" under the ESA. This is the case even if the employee does so, for example, from home after the employee's day shift is over and where a "disconnecting from work" policy that says employees are not to work from home is in place. See s. 1.1 of O. Reg. 285/01 for more information.

Note also that the content of an employer policy with respect to disconnecting from work may amount to a greater right or benefit than an employment standard under the Act, per ss. 5(2) and may be enforceable under the ESA. Even if the policy does not amount to a greater right or benefit, it may otherwise be contractually binding.

The written policy includes the date it was prepared and the date of any changes made to the policy.

The employer's written policy must include the date it was prepared and if any changes are made to the policy after that time, the date(s) of any those change must also be included. See subsection (2) for information about the employer's obligation to provide a copy of the written policy to all employees within 30 days of the policy being prepared or changed.

Note that per s. 15(8.1) employers have an obligation to retain a copy of every written policy on disconnecting from work that was required under this Part for three years after the policy ceases to be in effect

Copy of Policy - s. 21.1.2(2), (3)

21.1.2(2) An employer shall provide a copy of the written policy with respect to disconnecting from work to each of the employer's employees within 30 days of preparing the policy or, if an existing written policy is changed, within 30 days of the changes being made.

(3) An employer shall provide a copy of the written policy with respect to disconnecting from work that applies to a new employee within 30 days of the day the employee becomes an employee of the employer.

Subsections 21.1.2(2) and 21.1.2(3) were introduced into the ESA by the Working for Workers Act, 2021 on December 2, 2021. These provisions establish rules about when the written policy must be provided to employees.

Pursuant to ss. 21.2.2(2), the employer must provide a copy of the written policy with respect to disconnecting from work to each of its employees within 30 days of the policy having been prepared or, if an existing policy was changed, within 30 days of the changes being made. Subsection 21.2.2(3) requires an employer to provide a copy of the written policy with respect to disconnecting from work that applies to a new employee within 30 days of that individual becoming an employee of the employer. "Days" in these subsections means calendar days.

Note that a copy of the written policy does not need to be provided to employees annually if the policy has not changed from the previous year. This is because the obligation arises only within 30 days of the policy being prepared or changed.

Where an employer has different policies for different employees or employee groups, it is Program policy that the obligation is to provide only a copy of the policy that applies to that particular employee.

It is the Program's position that an employer may provide the policy as a printed copy or as an attachment in an email to the employee. Further, and consistent with the Program's position regarding the provision of written wage statements under s. 12(1) and the information sheets for assignment employees under s. 74.7(3), an employer may provide the written policy via a link to the document on an internet database, if the employer ensures the employee has reasonable access to that database (i.e. the employer must ensure the employee has access to a computer - which includes devices such as tablets and smart phones - and is able to access a working link to the document) and ensures the employee has access to a printer and that the employee knows how to use the computer and the printer.

Prescribed Information - s. 21.1.2(4)

21.1.2(4) A written policy required under subsection (1) shall contain such information as may be prescribed.

An employer's written policy with respect to disconnecting from work that is required under ss. 21.1.2(1) must contain any information that is prescribed. At the time of writing, no information is prescribed. As such, the only information the policy must include is the date it was prepared as well as the dates any changes were made to the policy, as per subsection (1). There is no other specified information that must be contained I the employer's written policy.

Transition – s. 21.1.2(5)

(5) Despite subsection (1), an employer shall,

> (a) have until the date that is six months after the day the Working for Workers Act, 2021 receives Royal Assent instead of March 1 to comply with the requirements of subsection (1); and
>
> (b) determine whether it employs 25 employees or more as of the January 1 immediately preceding the date described in clause (a).

This provision was added by the Working for Workers Act, 2021 (WFWA). It is a transition provision that modifies the January 1st and March 1st dates set out in subsection (1) for when the WFWA receives Royal Assent and Part VII.0.1 first comes into force (note this occurred on December 2, 2021). It provides that:

- Employers have until six months after the WFWA receives Royal Assent, which is June 2, 2022, instead of March 1st to have a written policy with respect to disconnecting from work in place for all its employees, and
- In determining whether the "25-employee threshold" is met, which establishes whether the employer has an obligation to have a written policy in place, the employer is to look at the number of employees it employed on the January 1st immediately preceding the date that is six months after the WFWA received Royal Assent. In other words, given that June 2, 2022 is six months after the WFWA received Royal Assent, the employer will determine the number of employees it employed on January 1, 2022 to establish if the "25-employee" criterion is met.

Subsection 21.1.2(5) no longer has any effect after the transition period. In other words, after 2022, the timelines set out in subsection (1) will apply: employers will take a "snapshot" of the number of employees they employ on January 1, beginning in 2023, to determine if the "25-employee threshold" is met and, if it is, they are required to have a written policy in place before March 1 of that year.

ESA Part VII.1 Section 21.2 – Three Hour Rule

Three hour rule – s. 21.2(1)

21.2 (1) If an employee who regularly works more than three hours a day is required to present himself or herself for work but works less than three hours, despite being available to work longer, the employer shall pay the employee wages for three hours, equal to the greater of the following:

1. The sum of,

i. the amount the employee earned for the time worked, and

ii. wages equal to the employee's regular rate for the remainder of the time.

2. Wages equal to the employee's regular rate for three hours of work.

Section 21.2 was added to the ESA 2000 effective January 1, 2019.

Prior to January 1, 2019, a different version of the three hour rule was set out in s. 5(7) of O Reg 285/01. That provision was revoked effective January 1, 2019 – for information about that rule, see the discussion under s. 5(7) of O Reg 285/01, which is being retained for transitional purposes.

Subsection 21.2(1) provides that, under certain circumstances, employees must be paid at least three hours' pay at the employee's regular rate of pay, even though the employee has worked less than three hours. Note that employees in the women's coat and suit industry and the women's dress and sportswear industry have special rules that apply instead of s. 21.2 – see O Reg 291/01, s. 3.

Circumstances in which s. 21.2(1) applies:

In order for section 21.2 (1) to apply:

The employee regularly works more than three hours per day

- The three hour rule has no application if the employee regularly works three hours a day or regularly works less than three hours a day.

The employee is required to present himself or herself for work

- This section will not apply where the employee has reported to work when directed not to do so by the employer, even on a day that is normally a workday.

The employee works less than three hours, despite being available to work longer

- The wording “despite being available to work longer” clarifies that in order for s. 21.2 to apply, the employee must be available to work for more than three hours. Therefore, if the employee presents themselves for work and leaves early, for example due to illness or due to pre-arranged time-off, the employee cannot rely on this provision to seek wages for three hours of work.

It is immaterial whether the hours are worked on a regular work day or on a day on which the employee does not usually work, provided that the employee was required to present themselves for work that day. In other words, the three hour rule may also apply when the employee is called in to work on a day that is not a regular workday, if the employee works less than three hours that day.

If the employee's schedule includes regularly working more than three hours a day and regularly working three hours a day or less, the application of the three hour rule will depend on whether the day is one where the employee would regularly work more than three hours or one where the employee would regularly work three hours or less.

As an example, assume an employer occasionally schedules staff to attend Saturday morning meetings. Assuming that the employees regularly work 8 hours a day, Monday through Friday, the three hour rule would apply to these occasional Saturday staff meetings. However, if the employer was found to regularly schedule the employees for one-hour Saturday morning staff meetings, it would be the Program's position that the three hour rule would not apply to those Saturday shifts/meetings. That is because it is the Program's view that s. 21.2(1) was not intended to prohibit an employer from having a regular shift schedule that incorporates shifts of less than three hours.

As another example, an employer could establish a shift schedule that has the employee working four-hour shifts on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays and two-hour shifts on Tuesdays and Thursdays. The regularly scheduled Tuesday and Thursday shifts would not trigger the application of the three hour rule because the employee regularly works less than three hours on those days. Note though that if the employee was not provided with at least three hours of work on a Monday, Wednesday or Friday, the rule would apply.

Calculating Entitlement

Where the provision applies, an employee will be entitled to be paid at least three hours at their regular rate of pay (though the amount owing could be more). The employer must pay the employee wages for three hours equal to the greater of the following:

1. The sum of,

i. the amount the employee earned for the time worked, and

ii. wages equal to the employee's regular rate for the remainder of the time.

OR

2. Wages equal to the employee's regular rate for three hours of work.

Paragraph 1

Under subparagraph 1(i) of s. 21.2(1) the employee is entitled to be paid for the time worked. This amount includes all wages the employee was entitled to receive for the time worked — this might be wages at the employee's regular rate or, in some circumstances, might be wages earned at a different rate, including overtime or premium pay.

Once the calculation is complete for the wages the employee earned for the time worked under subparagraph (i), the employee would then be entitled to be paid their regular rate for the remaining time per subparagraph (ii). For example if an employee works for one hour and is entitled to be paid one and a half times their regular rate of pay for that hour (because, for example, it was a public holiday), they are also entitled to receive an additional 2 hours of pay at their regular rate pursuant to subparagraph (ii) of paragraph 1.

Paragraph 2

The employee's wages for three hours of work at their regular rate would be calculated.

Comparison

The results from the calculation under paragraphs 1 and 2 would be compared. The calculation that results in the greatest amount of wages owing is the employee's entitlement.

Example 1:

Employee:

- Regularly works more than three hours per day and is required to present themselves for work;
- Regular rate is $28.00/hour;
- Works for one hour and is then directed by the employer to leave;
- Is paid their regular rate of $28.00 for one hour's work.

Entitlement is the greater of:

1. The sum of, the amount the employee earned for the time worked, and wages equal to the employee's regular rate for the remainder of the time.

   ($28.00 + (2 X $28.00)) = $84.00

Or

2. Wages equal to the employee's regular rate for three hours of work.

   $28.00 X 3 = $84.00

In this example, the employee is entitled to $84.00 per s. 21.2(1).

Example 2:

Apply the same facts as in the first example, but assume the employee earned overtime pay (at 1.5x their regular rate) for the one hour she worked.

Entitlement is the greater of:

1. The sum of, the amount the employee earned for the time worked, and wages equal to the employee's regular rate for the remainder of the time.

   $42.00 + (2 X $28.00) = $98.00

Or

2. Wages equal to the employee's regular rate for three hours of work.

   $28.00 X 3 = $84.00

In this example, the employee is entitled to $98.00 per s. 21.2(1).

Exception – s. 21.2(2)

21.2 (2) Subsection (1) does not apply if the employer is unable to provide work for the employee because of fire, lightning, power failure, storms or similar causes beyond the employer's control that result in the stopping of work.

Subsection 21.2(2) establishes that the three hour rule in s. 21.2(1) does not apply when certain types of circumstances that are beyond the control of the employer prevent it from providing work to an employee who reports for work.

For this provision to apply, the circumstances described in the section must be responsible for the complete stoppage of an employee's work. If the circumstances only reduce the demand for the employee's services, this provision will not apply and the three hour rule will apply. For example, a severe electrical storm could result in an employer being unable to provide a construction employee with any work and s. 21.2(2) would therefore apply. If the same storm only reduced the volume of work for an employee who works in a car wash, then s. 21.2(2) would not apply.

ESA Part VIII - Overtime Pay

The intent of Part VIII (Overtime Pay) is to compensate an employee for the additional time he or she must work when overtime is required and to provide workplace parties with the ability to negotiate more flexible work schedules. The overtime provisions are also intended to discourage employers from requiring overtime by imposing an economic cost on them when overtime is demanded.

ESA Part VIII Section 22 – Overtime Threshold

Section 22 was amended and sections 22.1 and 22.2 were repealed effective April 3, 2019 as a result of the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 (ROCA), which removed the requirement to obtain the approval the Director of Employment Standards to average overtime and imposed a limit of four weeks on the length of overtime averaging arrangements. The discussion of these provisions as they existed prior to April 3, 2019 has been maintained in this publication since employees may still file a complaint relating to a situation that arose prior to the ROCA taking effect. That text appears at the end of this section, in red, to highlight that the discussion reflects the pre-April 3, 2019 language of sections 22, 22.1, and 22.2.

Overtime Threshold – s. 22(1); Same, Two or More Regular Rates – s. 22(1.1)

22(1) Subject to subsection (1.1), an employer shall pay an employee overtime pay of at least one and one-half times his or her regular rate for each hour of work in excess of 44 hours in each work week or, if another threshold is prescribed, that prescribed threshold.

(1.1) If an employee has two or more regular rates for work performed for the same employer in a work week,

(a) the employee is entitled to be paid overtime pay for each hour of work performed in the week after the total number of hours performed for the employer reaches the overtime threshold; and

(b) the overtime pay for each hour referred to in clause (a) is one and one-half times the regular rate that applies to the work performed in that hour.

Subject to s. 22(1.1), s. 22(1) sets out the general overtime premium of one and one-half times the employee's regular rate of pay for each hour of overtime worked in each work week. Section 22(1) also establishes the general overtime threshold. The employer's obligation to pay the overtime premium is triggered when an employee works more than 44 hours in a work week. Subject to a greater right or benefit, the general premium and threshold apply for all employees except those exempted from ESA Part VIII Overtime Pay. In addition, for certain employees, listed below, different overtime thresholds have been prescribed.

Subsection 22(1.1) was added to the ESA 2000 by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22, effective January 1, 2018. It states that where an employee has two or more regular rates for work performed in a work week that the overtime rate for any hour of overtime work is one and one-half times the regular rate the employee would be entitled to for the work performed in that hour.

Special Overtime Thresholds

O Reg 285/01 varies the overtime threshold for certain employees. The regulation requires employers to pay employees the general overtime premium of one and one-half times the employee's regular rate of pay; however, it varies the overtime threshold as follows:

Road building in relation to streets, highways or parking lots

Employees engaged at the site of road building in relation to streets, highways or parking lots are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour of work in excess of 55 hours in each work week – O Reg 285/01, s. 13(1)(a). If the employee works less than 55 hours in a work week, the difference between the number of hours worked and 55 (up to a maximum of 22) is added on to the maximum number of hours that can be worked in the following work week before overtime becomes payable – O Reg 285/01, s. 13(1)(b).

Road building in relation to structures

Employees engaged at the site of road building in relation to structures such as bridges, tunnels or retaining walls in connection with streets or highways are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour of work in excess of 50 hours in each work week per O Reg 285/01, s. 13(2)(a). If the employee works less than 50 hours in a work week, the difference between the number of hours worked and 50 (up to a maximum of 22) is added on to the maximum number of hours that can be worked in the following work week before overtime becomes payable – O Reg 285/01, s. 13(2)(b).

Hospitality industry

Employees who work for the owner or operator of a hotel, motel, tourist resort, restaurant or tavern for 24 weeks or less in a calendar year and who are provided with room and board are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour worked in excess of 50 hours in a work week – O Reg 285/01, s. 14.

Canning, processing and packing fresh fruits or vegetables

Seasonal employees whose employment is directly related to canning, processing and packing of fresh fruits or vegetables, or their distribution by the canner, processor or packer, are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour worked in excess of 50 hours in a work week – O Reg 285/01, s. 15.

Sewer or watermain construction and maintenance

Employees engaged in laying, altering, repairing or maintaining sewers and watermains and work incidental thereto, or in guarding the site during this work are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour worked in excess of 50 hours in a work week – O Reg 285/01, s. 16.

Local cartage drivers

Employees who are drivers of, or drivers' helpers on, a vehicle used in the business of carrying goods for hire within a municipality or to any point not more than five kilometres beyond the municipality's limits are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour worked in excess of 50 hours in a work week – O Reg 285/01, s. 17(1)(a).

Transport truck drivers

Employees who drive public trucks operated by holders of an operating licence issued under the Truck Transportation Act, RSO 1990, c T.22 are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour worked in excess of 60 hours in a work week - ss. 18(1) and 18(2). Only those hours during which such employees are directly responsible for the public truck are included when calculating the entitlement to overtime – O Reg 285/01, s. 18(4).

Invalid Employer Defences to an Employee's Claim for Overtime Pay

Subsection 22(1) places a positive obligation on employers to ensure that employees receive the statutory minimum requirement with respect to overtime pay. An employer cannot satisfy that obligation or circumvent payment for overtime by raising any of the following defences:

Employer did not authorize the employee to work overtime

In Philip's Auto Sales and Repair Inc. v Bonneville (October 30, 1984), ESC 1726 (Betcherman), the referee affirmed that even in the event that the employer did not authorize its employees to work overtime, they are still entitled to receive the overtime pay if they exceed the overtime threshold. This decision was based on a predecessor to O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1, which stipulated that work shall be deemed to be performed when work is permitted or suffered to be done by the employer. The employer in this case was present when the employee performed the overtime work and the referee held that the employer implicitly permitted such overtime.

In Joseph Dobi Painting v Szekely and Szekely (May 28, 1980), ESC 799 (Adamson), the referee stated: "[t]he law is quite clear with respect to overtime work. The responsibility rests fully upon the employer. If he does not wish employees to work overtime, he must not only order them to stop but see that they do. This employer had ample time after the first week of employment to do this. During the period in which the employer claimed to have been incapacitated, it was still his responsibility to see that another person supervised his workers."

In Joe Kool's Restaurants Ltd. v Whitehead et al (January 21, 1986), ESC 2023 (Brown), the work schedule prepared by the employer did not include overtime hours; however, the employees were permitted to rearrange the schedule on an individual basis to suit their own convenience, without clearing those arrangements with the employer. These informal arrangements were neither encouraged nor discouraged, and there was no advance notification to the employer. The employer argued that the overtime was not scheduled by it, nor was it worked with its knowledge or acquiescence and that the Act's overtime provisions were therefore inapplicable. The referee rejected that argument and upheld the overtime pay assessment on the basis that the employer must have known and thus was deemed to have permitted the overtime hours worked.

An employee who is working excess hours contrary to a specific term of an employment contract or without authorization may well face disciplinary action for having done so, but that does not alter the fact that they are entitled to overtime pay for overtime hours worked.

Employee agreed to a built-in overtime rate

An employer may argue that it has already compensated employees for overtime pay by providing the employee with a bonus scheme or a higher regular rate of pay. This is not a valid defence to an employee's claim for overtime pay. The employer is also liable to pay overtime notwithstanding that the employee agreed verbally or in writing to work extra hours at the regular rate of pay. In Ferlandi Builders and Contractors Inc. v Manderscheid (May 30, 1986), ESC 2116 (Aggarwal), Jefferson Metal Products Inc. v Hazlehurst and Turner (February 20, 1985), ESC 1790 (Kerr) and Wen-Hal Limited v Hansen (August 22, 1979), ESC 660 (MacDowell), the referees held that any agreement by an employee to work overtime without receiving overtime pay for hours worked beyond 44 per week is rendered void by s. 3 of the former Employment Standards Act, now ESA Part III, s. 5(1), which specifically prohibits employees, employers and their agents from contracting out of or waiving an employment standard.

The ESA 2000 does not contain the provision that appeared in the former Employment Standards Act that specifically prohibited employers from reducing an employee's pay to comply with the overtime provisions. However, the definition of regular rate in the ESA Part I, s. 1 makes the prohibition redundant.

Regular rate is now defined in such a way as to ensure that overtime hours shall not, in any circumstances, be used to calculate an employee's regular rate. The regular rate for hourly employees is the amount paid for an hour of work in the employee's usual work week - excluding overtime hours. The regular rate for non-hourly employees is the amount paid in a given work week divided by the number of non-overtime hours actually worked in that work week. For example, an employer cannot assign a regular rate of $24.00 for the first 44 hours of work in a work week and a regular rate of $16.00 thereafter.

Employee contracted out of their overtime pay

An employer and an employee cannot agree to contract out of the overtime provisions. This is prohibited by ESA Part III, s. 5(1). An employee cannot agree to work overtime hours at a rate lower than one and one-half times their regular rate. Nor can an employee agree to reduce their regular rate for those hours worked in excess of the applicable overtime threshold.

Employee performed work at multiple locations

An employer cannot avoid its obligation to pay overtime by scheduling employees to work, for example, 20 hours at one of its locations and 30 hours at a second location. In Tavares and Sgromo c.o.b. Mr. Submarine, Thunder Bay, Ontario v Coppola et al (April 13, 1982), ESC 1197 (Aggarwal), the employer had contended that since its employee did not work more than 44 hours in one location, the employee was not entitled to overtime pay. The referee, however, ruled that it was irrelevant whether the employee worked all 54.25 hours at a single location of the employer; the essential point was that the employee worked all of those hours for one employer.

Employee performed work for different but related employers

Similarly, the obligation to pay overtime cannot be avoided by scheduling employees to work, for example, 25 hours for one corporation and 25 hours for another related corporation. This is prohibited by ESA Part III, s. 4, which provides as follows:

4(1) Subsection (2) applies if associated or related activities or businesses are or were carried on by or through an employer and one or more other persons.

(2) The employer and the other person or persons described in subsection (1) shall all be treated as one employer for the purposes of this Act.

(3) Subsection (2) applies even if the activities or businesses are not carried on at the same time.

(4) Subsection (2) does not apply with respect to a corporation and an individual who is a shareholder of the corporation unless the individual is a member of a partnership and the shares are held for the purposes of the partnership.

(4.1) Subsection (2) does not apply to the Crown, a Crown agency or an authority, board, commission or corporation all of whose members are appointed by the Crown.

(5) Persons who are treated as one employer under this section are jointly and severally liable for any contravention of this Act and the regulations under it and for any wages owing to an employee of any of them.

Where ESA Part III, s. 4 applies and two or more entities are treated as one employer, the hours worked by employees for those two or more entities are to be added together for purposes of determining the employees' overtime pay entitlement. See ESA Part III, s. 4 for a more detailed discussion of this issue.

Calculation of Overtime Pay

The method for calculating an employee's entitlement to overtime pay is set out below. This method applies to ALL employees who are not exempt from the application of Part VIII Overtime Pay.

1. Do the overtime provisions apply to the claimant?
2. Which threshold applies? Is it the standard 44-hour threshold, a higher threshold established by regulation, or a lower threshold established by contract?
3. Does s. 22(9) (the changing work provision) apply?

4. Which overtime premium(s) applies? The standard time and one-half premium or a higher premium established by contract?
5. What is the employee's work week?
6. How many non-overtime and overtime hours has the employee worked during each work week in question?
7. What is the employee's regular rate or rates in a given work week?
8. What is the employee's overtime rate or rates for each hour of overtime work in a given work week?
9. What is the employee's overtime pay for each work week in question?
10. Has the employer provided the employee with any overtime pay in respect of each work week in question?

1. Do the overtime provisions apply to the claimant?

The first determination that must be made is whether the person claiming overtime pay is covered by Part VIII Overtime Pay. To make this determination, the following issues must be considered:

- Is the claimant an employee within the meaning of the ESA 2000?
- Is the claimant excluded from the application of the ESA 2000 by virtue of ESA Part III, ss. 3(2), 3(3) or 3(5)?
- Is the employee exempt from the overtime provisions by virtue of O Reg 285/01, ss. 2(1), 2(2), 2.1, 8, 11(3) or 23?

Please note that overtime averaging agreements may also impact on a claimant's right to overtime pay. See discussion in ESA Part VIII, s. 22(2) below.

2. Which threshold applies?

Is it the standard 44-hour threshold, a higher threshold established by regulation, or a lower threshold established by contract?

The next issue for determination is whether the 44-hour threshold applies. A higher threshold may be prescribed by O Reg 285/01. A lower threshold may be established by contract. If the employee is engaged in any of the following, O Reg 285/01 should be consulted as a higher overtime threshold may apply:

- Road building – s. 13;
- Whether the employee is seasonal, employed by an owner or operator of a motel, hotel, tourist resort, restaurant or tavern, and provided with room and board – s. 14;
- Whether the employee is seasonal and engaged in canning, processing and packaging of fresh fruits or vegetables or their distribution – s. 15;
- Sewer and watermain construction, maintenance or guarding – s. 16;
- Local cartage – s. 17;
- Highway transport – s. 18.

3. Does s. 22(9) (the changing work provision) apply?

Section 22(9) provides that when an employee performs work that is exempt from this Part and work that is not, the employee is entitled to overtime pay in respect of all of the overtime work performed in a work week so long as the non-exempt work in the work week constitutes 50% or more of the time the employee spent working.

Similarly, s. 22(9) provides that employees who perform both work that attracts overtime after 44 hours and work that attracts overtime at a higher threshold will be entitled to overtime pay after 44 hours in respect of all work performed during the work week by the employee so long as the work performed by the employee that attracts overtime pay at the 44 hour threshold constitutes 50% or more of the time the employee spent working.

See the detailed discussion of s. 22(9) below.

4. Which overtime premium applies? The standard time and one-half premium or a higher premium established by contract?

The next issue for determination is whether the time and one-half overtime premium established in s. 22(1) applies. A higher premium may be established by contract. For example, the employment contract may provide for an overtime premium of double the employee's regular rate after 44 hours of work in a work week, or it may provide for time and one-half after 44 hours of work in a work week and double-time after 50 hours of work in a work week.

5. What is the employee's work week?

The definition of work week is critical to the calculation of an employee's entitlement to overtime pay. An employee's regular rate is determined with respect to a work week. Indeed, an employee's entitlement to overtime pay is determined in respect of a work week. Therefore, one of the first determinations an officer must make is what constitutes the employee's work week.

Work week is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1 as:

(a) a recurring period of seven consecutive days selected by the employer for the purpose of scheduling work, or

(b) if the employer has not selected such a period, a recurring period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

The Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Falconbridge Nickel Mines Ltd. and Egan et al., 1983 CanLII 1931 (ON CA) concluded that the term week as it was used in s. 24(1) of the former Employment Standards Act must be interpreted as a work week. The ESA 2000 deleted the definition of week that appeared in the former Act and included an amended definition of work week to reflect the reasoning of the Court of Appeal. Part VIII Overtime Pay uses the terms week and work week interchangeably.

6. How many non-overtime and overtime hours has the employee worked during each work week in question?

When determining what overtime and non-overtime hours an employee has worked in a given work week, the first question is how many hours of work were performed by the employee in the work week. Once the officer has determined how many hours of work were performed in the work week, the officer may then determine how many of these hours constitute non-overtime hours and how many are overtime hours.

When making this determination, regard must be had for O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1, which sets out when work is and is not deemed to be performed.

i. Work Deemed to be or Not Deemed to be Performed by Employee

Section 1.1 of O Reg 285/01 provides as follows:

1.1(1) Subject to subsection (2), work shall be deemed to be performed by an employee for the employer,

(a) where work is,

- (i) permitted or suffered to be done by the employer, or
- (ii) in fact performed by an employee although a term of the contract of employment expressly forbids or limits hours of work or requires the employer to authorize hours of work in advance; or

(b) where the employee is not performing work and is required to remain at the place of employment,

- (i) waiting or holding himself or herself ready for call to work, or
- (ii) on a rest or break-time other than an eating period.

1.1(2) Work shall not be deemed to be performed for an employer during the time the employee,

(a) is entitled to,

- (i) take time off work for an eating period,
- (ii) take at least six hours or such longer period as is established by contract, custom or practice for sleeping and the employer furnishes sleeping facilities, or
- (iii) take time off work in order to engage in the employee's own private affairs or pursuits as is established by contract, custom or practice; or

(b) is not at the place of employment and is waiting or holding himself or herself ready for call to work.

See O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1 for a detailed discussion of this section.

ii. Calculation of Hours Worked for Employees in Highway Transport Paid by Mileage

A Program investigatory tool involving mileage approximation has been used to determine the hours of work for employees employed in highway transport and paid by mileage, where no complete and accurate records of hours of work exist. The investigatory tool consists of dividing the total distance driven by 80 kilometers per hour (or 50 miles per hour). This practice can also be used as a check to assess the accuracy of existing records. Any other (i.e., non-driving) hours, if they can be established to have been worked, must also be included in the total number of hours worked. However, the hours that the employee is not directly responsible for the truck are not included for overtime purposes.

iii. Calculation of Hours Worked where the Employer has not Kept Accurate Records

If an employer has not kept accurate records of the hours worked by an employee, or if the employer's records are challenged by the employee, the employment standards officer will determine the employee's hours of work on the basis of the best evidence available. Note that where an employee has two or more regular rates of pay that the employer is required to maintain a record of the dates and times the employee worked in excess of the overtime threshold, at each rate of pay, in any given work week. See ESA Part VI, s. 15 (1) paragraph 3.2.

iv. Travel Time

With respect to travel time it is Program policy that:

- With the exception of commuting time, any time a person spends travelling (irrespective of the mode of transportation) for the purpose of getting to or from somewhere where work will be performed, must be counted as hours of work;
- Commuting time means the time required for an employee to travel to work from home and vice versa. However, there are a number of exceptions to this rule:
    - If the employee takes the work vehicle home in the evening for the convenience of the employer, the hours of work begin when the employee leaves home in the morning and end when they arrive home in the evening; or
    - If the employee is required to transport other staff or supplies to or from the workplace or work site, time so spent must be counted as hours of work.

7. What is the employee's regular rate or rates in a given work week?

Before an employee's overtime rate or rates in respect of the overtime hours worked in a given work week can be calculated, the employee's regular rate or rates (if the employee is paid more than one hourly rate for work performed for the employer) for the work week(s) in question must be determined. ESA Part I, s. 1 defines regular rate as follows.

Regular rate means, subject to any regulation made under paragraph 10 of subsection 141(1),

(a) for an employee who is paid by the hour, the amount paid for an hour of work in the employee's usual work week, not counting overtime hours,

(b) otherwise, the amount earned in a given work week divided by the number of non-overtime hours actually worked in that week.

Employees who are paid solely on the basis of an hourly rate (including employees who are paid two or more different hourly rates for work performed for the employer) will fall within the first portion of this definition. All other employees, including salaried employees, flat rate mechanics, commissioned salespersons, piece workers and employees receiving mixed compensation, for example, an hourly rate and mileage or an hourly rate and commission, must have their regular rate determined by reference to clause (b) of the definition of regular rate.

8. What is the employee's overtime rate or rates for each hour of overtime in a given work week?

An employee's overtime rate for the overtime hours worked in any given work week is established by multiplying their regular rate by one and one-half or by the higher rate established by contract. If the employee has more than one regular rate that applies to overtime hours worked as per s. 22(1.1), the overtime rate in respect of each hour of overtime will be one and one-half times the regular rate that applies to the work performed in each hour, or the higher rate established by contract.

9. What is the employee's overtime pay for each work week in question?

The overtime pay that an employee is entitled to for a given work week is determined by multiplying their overtime rate by the number of overtime hours worked at that rate within the week. Where the employee has two or more regular rates and has performed overtime work that attracts more than one overtime rate, the overtime pay for the work week is determined by adding together the overtime pay entitlement as calculated for each hour of overtime work. See example 1 under “Examples of How to Calculate Overtime” below.

10. Has the employer provided the employee with any overtime pay for each work week in question?

The final consideration is whether the employee has already been paid, in full or in part, for any of the overtime hours in question. This will only be appropriate in limited circumstances. For example, an employee who is paid by the hour and who works 55 hours in a work week and is paid their regular rate for those 55 hours has received a portion of their overtime pay. That employee will only be entitled to an additional .5 of their regular rate in respect of all overtime hours worked in the work week.

Please note that this will not apply to a salaried employee. See the discussion below.

Examples of How to Calculate Overtime

Overtime entitlements for employees with two or more regular rates

An employee who is paid on an hourly basis may perform, in one work week, two types of work, each of which attracts a different hourly rate. In that case, the employee has two regular rates and as a result, s. 22(1.1) applies to determine the overtime pay entitlement. That subsection provides that the overtime rate for each of hour of overtime work performed is based on the regular rate that applies to the work performed in that hour.

Note, however, that where an averaging arrangement is in place, s. 22(1.1) does not apply and it is Program policy that the employer shall apply the proportion of each overtime rate to the averaged overtime hours. For example, if the employee works 4 hours of overtime pursuant to a 2-week averaging agreement and the employee worked 25% of the overtime in the 2-week period at Job A and 75% of the overtime at Job B, this employee would be entitled to 1 hour of overtime pay at the Job A’s overtime rate and 3 hours of overtime pay at the overtime rate at Job B.

Note also that where the hourly rate for one type of work is less than minimum wage and the employee performs that type of work in overtime, an employer may be in compliance with the overtime pay requirements but in contravention of the minimum wage requirements. See Example 3 below for details.

Example 1:

An employee works as a punch press operator earning $15.00/hour and also as a shipping logistics coordinator earning $20.00/hour for the same employer. The employee’s overtime threshold is 44 hours and the overtime rate is 1.5 times the regular rate.

In one work week the employee worked 4 hours of overtime. The 45th and 46th hours were worked as punch press operator and the 47th and 48th hours were worked as a shipping logistics coordinator. This employee’s overtime pay entitlement would be calculated as follows:

- 45th hour: overtime rate is $15.00 x1.5 = $22.50 per hour
- 46th hour: overtime rate is $15.00 x1.5 = $22.50 per hour
- 47th hour: overtime rate is $20.00 x1.5 = $30.00 per hour
- 48th hour: overtime rate is $20.00 x1.5 = $30.00 per hour

The total overtime pay due to the employee is $105.00 [$22.50 + $22.50 + $30.00 + $30.00]

Example 2:

An employee usually works in job A at an hourly rate of $15.00. The employee also usually works, for the same employer in job B at an hourly rate of $20.00. The employee and the employer have entered into a valid written agreement under s. 17(3) for the employee to work excess weekly hours.. In one work week the employee works 60 hours: 36 hours in job A at $15.00 per hour and 24 hours in job B at $20.00 per hour. The employee was paid their regular rate or straight time for all hours worked including overtime hours; a total of $1020.

The regular overtime threshold and overtime rate of 1.5 times the regular rate apply to this employee. The 16 hours of work performed once the overtime threshold of 44 hours was reached were as follows:

- 12 hours in job A
- 4 hours in job B

The employee's overtime entitlement in accordance with s. 22(1.1) is:

- Job A work: 12 hours X $15.00 per hour X 1.5 = $270
- Job B work: 4 hours X $20.00 per hour X 1.5 = $120

However, the employee had already been paid straight time for the 12 hours of overtime worked in job A = 12 X $15.00 per hour = $180

Plus straight time for the 4 hours of overtime worked in job B = 4 X $20.00 = $80.00

The employee's overtime pay entitlement was $390; however the employee had already been paid $260 in straight time for the overtime hours (i.e. has received partial pay for the overtime hours). Therefore, the balance owing in respect of overtime pay for the work week in question is $390 - $260 = $130

Example 3

An employee usually works performing task A at an hourly rate of $15.00. The employee also usually works, for the same employer, performing task B at an hourly rate of $0.00. The employee's overtime threshold is 44 hours and the overtime rate is 1.5 times the regular rate.

In one work week the employee worked 2 hours of overtime. The 45th and 46th hours were worked performing task B at the hourly rate of $0.00. This employee's overtime pay entitlement would be calculated as follows:

- 45th hour: overtime rate is $0.00 x1.5 = $0.00 per hour
- 46th hour: overtime rate is $0.00 x1.5 = $0.00 per hour

The total overtime pay due to the employee is $0.00.

Note, however, that although the employer does not owe this employee any overtime pay pursuant to the Overtime Pay provisions, the employer will be in contravention of the Minimum Wage provisions if no overtime pay is paid. Section 23(4) of the Minimum Wage Part of the Act provides as follows:

> Hourly rate
>
> (4) Without restricting the generality of subsection (3), if the minimum wage applicable with respect to an employee is expressed as an hourly rate, the employer shall not be considered to have complied with this Part unless,
>
> (a) when the amount of regular wages paid to the employee in the pay period is divided by the number of hours he or she worked in the pay period, other than hours for which the employee was entitled to receive overtime pay or premium pay, the quotient is at least equal to the minimum wage; and
>
> (b) when the amount of overtime pay and premium pay paid to the employee in the pay period is divided by the number of hours worked in the pay period for which the employee was entitled to receive overtime pay or premium pay, the quotient is at least equal to one and one half times the minimum wage.

To be in compliance with paragraph (b), the employer must pay the employee an amount of overtime pay that is calculated using this formula: the minimum wage rate x 1.5 x 2 hours.

Overtime Entitlements for Employees Paid Hourly Rate and Other Forms of Compensation

From time to time employees who are paid an hourly rate will also perform work that involves different types of compensation in the same work week. For example, payment of an hourly rate and commission. If an employee who receives an hourly rate is also compensated with commissions, that employee, strictly speaking, is not paid by the hour. Accordingly, the regular rate of such employees must be determined by applying clause (b) of the definition of regular rate, by dividing their total earnings for each work week in question by the number of non-overtime hours worked. However, if an employee receives an hourly rate for each hour worked (including overtime hours), the employer will be credited for such payment when the employee's overtime entitlement is calculated.

Under the ESA 2000, overtime hours cannot be included in the calculation of an employee's regular rate.

Example:

The employee and the employer have entered into a valid written agreement under s. 17(3) for the employee to work excess weekly hours. The employee works 50 hours in a work week and is paid $20.00 per hour. The employee also receives commissions. In one work week the employee receives $1000 for 50 hours worked and $200 in respect of commissions. The general overtime premium and threshold apply.

- Employee works 44 non-overtime hours in the work week
- Employee works 6 hours of overtime in the work week
- Regular rate = (total earnings in work week divided by non-overtime hours) = $1200 divided by 44 = $27.27
- Overtime rate is $27.27 (regular rate) x 1.5 = $40.91

- Overtime pay entitlement = (overtime rate x overtime hours in a workweek) = $40.91 x 6 = $245.46

Because this employee was paid straight time for each hour worked, including overtime hours, the employee has already received $120 (6 overtime hours x $20.00) in respect of overtime. Therefore, the employee is entitled to receive an additional $125.46: $245.46 overtime entitlement minus $120 of overtime already paid, in respect of overtime for the work week in question.

Overtime Entitlements for Employees Paid on Mileage, Piecework or Commission Basis

Under the ESA 2000, the overtime entitlement for employees who are paid solely on a mileage basis, by commission or on a piece-rate must be determined by reference to the definition of regular rate in ESA Part I, s. 1. Because these employees are not paid by the hour, their regular rate must be determined by applying clause (b) of the definition of regular rate, by dividing all earned wages in the work week by the non-overtime hours worked. The overtime premium of one and one-half times the regular rate is payable for all hours worked in excess of 44 in a work week, unless a higher overtime rate applies by virtue of contract or a higher threshold applies by virtue of regulation.

Example:

An employee works making oven mitts and is paid $2.50 per pair. In a particular work week, the employee works 60 hours to make 300 pairs of mitts and is paid $750.00. The employee and the employer have entered into a valid written agreement under s. 17(3) for the employee to work excess weekly hours. The general threshold and premium apply to the employee.

- Employee works 44 non-overtime hours that work week
- Employee works 16 hours of overtime that work week
- Regular rate = total earnings in the work week divided by non-overtime hours = $750.00 divided by 44 = $17.05
- Overtime rate is $17.05 (regular rate) x 1.5 = $25.58
- Overtime pay entitlement = overtime rate x overtime hours in the work week
- = $25.58 x 16
- = $409.28 in respect of that work week.

Overtime Entitlements for Flat Rate Mechanics

Enquiries arise occasionally on the application of the legislation to motor vehicle mechanics and body repairpersons who are paid on a flat rate or incentive system. In a flat rate shop, every job is rated as taking a certain number of hours to perform and the mechanic is paid a book hourly rate for those hours. As an example, a brake reline is rated as a four-hour job, and the mechanic's book rate is $16 per hour. The mechanic will be paid $64 whether the job takes three or five hours to complete. This is acceptable so long as the minimum wage standard (compliance with which is determined on a pay period basis) is met and all overtime hours (hours worked in excess of 44) are compensated at a minimum of 1.5 times the mechanic's actual regular rate, which is not the same as the flat rate.

Generally, in a flat-rate remuneration system, it is a condition of employment that the employee rectify their own faulty work without further pay. This is not a violation of the ESA 2000, so long as the minimum wage and overtime provisions are not violated. If for some reason another mechanic makes the required changes, the payment for the entire job may be credited to the second mechanic. Where this occurs as part of the employment contract, the transfer of credits is considered as part of the reconciliation of wages due and not a prohibited set-off or deduction. However, the minimum wage and overtime provisions still apply with respect to the hours of work the first mechanic spent on the vehicle.

It is essential in a flat rate system that the employer's records reflect both the flat rate paid and the actual hours worked: it is the actual hours worked (and any work deemed to have been performed pursuant to O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1) that must be used to calculate the employee's regular rate and overtime entitlements. Those hours of work must include any time spent rectifying the employee's faulty work.

Prior to the introduction the ESA 2000, the calculation of the regular rate for flat rate mechanics was accomplished by dividing the flat rate wages earned for the work week by the actual hours worked, including overtime hours. This had the effect of lowering the employee's regular rate when overtime was worked. Furthermore, the employee was considered to have been paid straight time for all hours worked, including overtime hours, and so received only an additional .5 times the employee's regular rate in respect of all overtime hours. Under the ESA 2000, overtime hours cannot ber included in the calculation of an employee's "regular rate". Previously, the more overtime hours a flat rate mechanic worked, the less the employee was paid for those hours. The ESA 2000's definition of "regular rate" precludes that result because overtime hours cannot be included in the calculation.

As illustrated in the examples below, payment at the book rate is payment for a task (i.e., a flat rate for the task), rather than a payment for hours actually worked. As no portion of the payment is made in respect of hours actually worked, none of it can be considered to be a payment for regular hours or overtime hours.

Example 1:

The employee is paid a flat book rate of $16.00 per hour for brake re-lining. The employee did 12 brake-relines, which resulted in a flat rate payment for 48 hours (each re-line job is rated as taking 4 hours) for a total payment of $768. The employee, however, actually spent 46 hours doing the work in that week. The general overtime rate and threshold apply to this employee.

- Employee works 44 non-overtime hours in work week
- Employee works 2 overtime hours in work week
- Employee paid $768 for work week
- Employee's regular rate is $768 divided by 44 non-overtime hours = $17.45
- Employee's overtime rate is $17.45 x 1.5 = $26.18
- Employee's overtime entitlement is 2 hours x $26.18 = $52.36

In this case, the employer owes the employee an additional $52.36 for overtime pay.

Example 2:

The employee is paid a flat book rate of $16.00 per hour to perform tune-ups that according to the book will take 1.5 hours to complete. In fact the employee is being paid $24.00 for each tune-up regardless of the time it actually took to perform the tune-up. Having completed 25 tune-ups in one week the employee is paid $600 for that work week. However, the employee actually worked 50 hours in that work week. The general overtime rate and threshold apply to this employee.

- Employee works 44 non-overtime hours in work week
- Employee work 6 overtime hours in the work week
- Employee paid $600 for the work week
- Employee's regular rate is $600 divided by 44 non-overtime hours = $13.64
- Employee's overtime rate is $13.64 x 1.5 = $20.46
- Employee's overtime entitlement is 6 hours x $20.46 = $122.76

In this case, the employer owes the employee an additional $122.76 for overtime pay.

Overtime Entitlement for Salaried Employees

Generally, employees who are paid a fixed amount for each pay period rather than an amount determined by applying an hourly rate to each hour worked (or a piece rate or commission based on work performed) are considered to be salaried employees. It should be noted that although ESA Part VI, s. 15(4) defines a salaried employee, that definition is for the purposes of ESA Part VI, s. 15(3), which sets out the employer's obligations to record hours worked, and is not necessarily relevant to the calculation of overtime entitlements.

Salaried employees who are not exempt from the overtime provisions are entitled to overtime pay for overtime work. Once the work week has been determined, the employee's regular rate will be determined by applying clause (b) of the definition of regular rate, by dividing the salary earned in respect of the work week by the number of non-overtime hours worked in the work week. Salaried employees are entitled to receive 1.5 times their regular rate in respect of each hour worked in excess of 44 in a work week (or other applicable threshold).

Prior to the introduction the ESA 2000, the calculation of the regular rate for salaried employees was accomplished by dividing the salary earned for the work week by the actual hours worked, including overtime hours. The employee was considered to have been paid straight time for all hours worked, including overtime hours, and received an additional .5 times their regular rate in respect of all overtime hours worked in the work week in question. This method of calculating overtime had the effect of lowering the employee's regular rate as the number of hours worked increased and significantly reducing the employee's entitlement to overtime pay.

Under the ESA 2000, overtime hours cannot be included in the calculation of an employee's regular rate. Formerly, the more overtime hours a salaried employee worked, the less they were paid for those hours. The new definition of regular rate precludes that result because overtime hours cannot be included in the calculation.

Example:

An employee is paid an annual salary of $52,000 or $1000 per week. The employee works 60 hours in a work week. The employee and the employer have entered into a valid written agreement under s. 17(3) for the employee to work excess weekly hours. The general overtime rate and threshold apply.

- Employee works 44 non-overtime hours in work week

- Employee works 16 overtime hours in work week
- Employee's regular rate for the work week is $1000 divided by 44 non-overtime hours = $22.73
- Employee's overtime rate for the work week is $22.73 x 1.5 = $34.10

The employee's entitlement to overtime pay for the work week is $34.10 x 16 hours = $545.60.

Averaging – s. 22(2)

22(2) An employee's hours of work may be averaged over separate, non-overlapping, contiguous periods of two or more consecutive weeks for the purpose of determining the employee's entitlement, if any, to overtime pay if,

(a) the employee has made an agreement with the employer that his or her hours of work may be averaged over periods of a specified number of weeks; and

(b) the averaging period does not exceed four weeks or the number of weeks specified in the agreement, whichever is lower.

> Subsection 22(2) was amended effective April 3, 2019 by the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 (ROCA). ROCA removed the previous requirement to obtain the Director of Employment Standards' approval as a condition for averaging and imposed a four-week limit on the length of averaging agreements.

Where the conditions set out in this provision are met, the employer's obligation to pay overtime pay is based on the employee's average hours per work week during the period specified in the employee's averaging agreement (which cannot exceed four weeks), rather than the hours actually worked within a work week.

Example:

An employee and employer have agreed in writing to average hours over four-week periods for the purpose of calculating the employee's entitlement to overtime pay. The employee works 48 hours in the first week, 44 hours in the second week, 40 hours in the third week and 50 hours in the fourth week. The employee and employer also have a valid written agreement for the employee to work excess weekly hours.

The employee's overtime hours will be determined on the basis of the average number of hours worked per week. In this example the employee worked an average of 45.5 hours per week (48 + 44 + 40 + 50, divided by 4). Accordingly, the employee would be entitled to overtime pay for six hours based on an average of 1.5 hours of overtime per week in the four-week period. In the absence of averaging, the employee would have been entitled to four hours of overtime pay in the first week and six hours of overtime pay in the fourth week.

Note that unless there is a time off in lieu arrangement in place pursuant to s. 22(7), the employer is required to pay the employee straight time for every hour worked within each pay period – including those hours over 44 – and that it is only the extra half that the employer can postpone paying under an averaging arrangement until the end of the averaging period. See ESA Part V, s. 11 for details.

Section 22(2) provides that where averaging is permitted, the employee's hours of work can be averaged only over separate, non-overlapping, contiguous periods of two or more consecutive weeks. That is, the averaging periods must be contiguous (i.e., there cannot be gaps in between the end of one period and the beginning of another), and they must be separate and cannot overlap with one another. Further, the two or more weeks within each averaging period must be consecutive. The longest averaging period permitted under the ESA 2000 is four weeks.

Days on which an employee is absent during an averaging period (for example, due to illness, statutory leave or layoff) are not excluded when determining the average weekly hours worked during the averaging period. For example, an employee is subject to a two-week averaging period and is scheduled to work 50 hours in Week One and 30 hours in Week Two. The employee works as scheduled during Week One but is absent due to illness throughout Week Two. There is nothing in the ESA to suggest that absences are to be excluded when determining overtime pay entitlements. Accordingly, this employee has an average of 25 hours per week for the averaging period (50 hours + 0 hours, divided by two) and is not entitled to overtime pay.

Similarly, there is nothing in the ESA to suggest that the averaging period is to be truncated if the employee's employment is terminated partway through an averaging period. Accordingly, an employee who quits or is terminated partway through the averaging period continues to have their overtime pay entitlements calculated based on the average weekly hours throughout the entire averaging period (even though the employee is not employed for a portion of the averaging period).

Note that even if an employer has averaging agreements, if employees will be working hours in excess of the daily or weekly limits the employer must also obtain excess hours agreements from the employees.

Conditions for Averaging

The conditions that must be met before averaging can take place are discussed below.

Employee made agreement with employer that hours of work may be averaged over specified number of weeks

Before an employer is permitted to average an employee's hours, the employee must have entered into an agreement with the employer allowing their hours to be averaged over periods of a specified number of weeks.

For an agreement to valid, the following criteria must be met:

The agreement must be in writing

By virtue of ESA Part 1, s. 1(3), an agreement between an employer and an employee to average the employee's hours of work, for purposes of calculating the employee's entitlement to overtime pay must be in writing. See also ESA Part 1, s. 1(3.1), which provides that an agreement in writing may be in electronic form.

For employees represented by a trade union, the written agreement may be embodied in the collective agreement or a memorandum of agreement or other written documentation signed by union officials and, provided the other criteria are met, all bargaining unit employees will be bound by the agreement.

In the non-unionized context, a written agreement between each employee whose hours are to be averaged and the employer is required.

The agreement must specify the number of weeks over which the hours of work are going to be averaged, and cannot exceed a maximum of four weeks

Section 22(2)(a) requires that the agreement state specifically the number of weeks over which the hours of work are going to be averaged. Statements such as "up to 4 weeks" are not sufficient.

Section 22(2)(b) provides that the averaging period cannot exceed four weeks or the number of weeks specified in the agreement, whichever is lower. In other words, employees and employers can agree to average hours over periods of 2 weeks, 3 weeks, or 4 weeks. Four weeks is the maximum period over which the hours of work may be averaged for overtime pay entitlement purposes.

For example, an employee agreed to average her hours of work over a period of three weeks. The employer can average the employee's hours only over a period of three weeks, not over the four-week maximum as set out in subsection 22(2)(b).

An agreement that purports to average hours over a period of longer than four weeks is invalid.

The agreement must contain a start date and, subject to certain exceptions, an expiry date.

Section 22(3) provides that, subject to ss. (3.1) and (3.2), an averaging agreement is not valid unless it contains a start date and an expiry date.

With respect to the start date: if the agreement does not contain a start date it is invalid and as a result averaging of hours cannot take place.

With respect to the end date:

- Where employees are not represented by a union: the expiry date cannot be more than two years after the start date. See s. 22 (3.1) below. Agreements that contain an expiry date that is beyond two years after the start date are invalid and, as a result, averaging of hours cannot take place (and the employer must pay the employee overtime pay according to s. 22(1)).

- Where employees are represented by a trade union and are covered by a collective agreement: the averaging agreement cannot expire later than the day a subsequent collective agreement that applies to the employee comes into operation. See s. 22(3.2) below. The averaging agreement may contain a specific end date, or it may reference an event. For example, it may say that the agreement expires when the collective agreement expires, or it may say that it expires on the day a subsequent collective agreement comes into effect (it is not uncommon for there to be a period of time in between the date a collective agreement expires and the date the subsequent collective agreement comes into operation-Note that the rule re: the expiry date in ss. (3.2) is triggered and fixed if the conditions of the employee being represented by a trade union and covered by a collective agreement were present at the time the averaging agreement was entered into.

The agreement should clearly and explicitly set out what is being agreed upon

The agreement should be written with sufficient clarity for the parties to know precisely what they are agreeing to.

The agreement must contain the employee's express consent to the averaging of hours for the purpose of calculating the employee's entitlement, if any, to overtime pay. Mere agreement to a particular schedule is not sufficient, as an employee may agree to work certain hours without necessarily having agreed to the hours being averaged for overtime pay purposes.

Employers are encouraged, but not required, to include schedules in averaging agreements.

Overtime averaging agreements must not be confused with agreements to work hours in excess of the weekly and daily maximums established in ESA Part VII, s. 17. Employers who wish employees to work hours in excess of eight hours a day (or the regular work day where that is longer than eight hours) or 48 hours a week must secure valid written agreements from their employees (which includes providing the employees the statutory information document – see s. 17(5) for details)) to work hours in excess of the daily and weekly maximums. The overtime averaging and excess hours agreements may be contained in separate documents, or in the same one.

The parties must have entered into the agreement voluntarily

An averaging agreement will not be binding if it is not entered into voluntarily by both parties. Please see ESA Part I, s. 1(3) for a more detailed discussion of the issue of voluntary consent.

The employee must have given their informed consent to the agreement

The employee must understand what is being agreed to, and the consequences of the agreement, for an averaging agreement to be binding. Informed consent will not be established unless each party knows precisely the ramifications of entering into the agreement.

The best evidence that an employee provided informed consent is where the document itself accurately sets out the consequences of the agreement. To this end, employers may wish to include the following in averaging agreements:

- A statement notifying the employee(s) that an averaging arrangement will affect the amount of overtime pay the employee will be entitled to under the arrangement, as compared to the amount of overtime pay the employee would be entitled to if the employee(s) worked the same number of hours in each week without an averaging arrangement.
- A statement informing the employee(s) that the agreement is irrevocable before it expires, unless the employee and the employer agree, in writing, to revoke it – s. 22(6).

See s. 22(6) below for a more detailed discussion of these requirements.

The Ministry has produced a list of items employers and employees may wish to consider when drafting agreements. This can be found on the Ministry of Labour's website.

In the absence of a valid agreement, the employer must pay the employee overtime pay according to s. 22(1), or ensure that the employee does not work overtime.

Employers are required to retain a copy of every averaging agreement it has made with its employees for three years after the last day on which work was performed under each agreement – see ESA Part VI, s. 15(9).

If Employee Refuses to Consent to an Averaging Agreement

If an employee does not agree to the averaging of their hours for purposes of determining overtime pay entitlements, if any, the employer must pay the employee overtime pay according to s. 22(1), or ensure that the employee does not work overtime (that is, hours in excess of 44 hours per week or other applicable threshold). If an employer terminates the employment of an employee, or disciplines or otherwise penalizes an employee because the employee refused to consent to the averaging agreement, that employer will have committed a reprisal in violation of ESA Part XVIII, s. 74.

Averaging Arrangements for Shift Exchanges

Employers may wish to have averaging arrangements in place in order to provide employees with increased flexibility in their work schedules by allowing shift exchanges, without the requirement of paying overtime as a consequence of the shift exchanges.

Example: A three-week averaging arrangement is in place and:

- Employee A works Monday through Friday 8:00 am to 4:30 pm;
- Employee B works Wednesday through Sunday 3:30 pm to 12:00 midnight;
- Employee A asks B to work his Tuesday shift in exchange for working B's Sunday shift two weeks later;
- Even though B works more than 44 hours in the first week and A works more than 44 hours in the third week as a result of the shift change, no overtime pay will be owing because of the averaging arrangement.

An issue that may arise in the context of an averaging agreement made for the purpose of accommodating shift exchanges is how to handle circumstances in which the employment of an employee who has been involved in a shift exchange ends before the exchange is complete. The following example illustrates the Program's policy on this matter.

Example:

The employees and the employer have agreed in writing to average hours of work over a period of four weeks for purposes of calculating overtime pay. Employees are paid weekly. Employee A agrees to work a shift for Employee B in week one of the averaging period. In exchange, Employee B agrees to work a shift for Employee A in week two of the averaging period; however, Employee B's employment is terminated before she can complete the shift exchange. The employees are paid their regular wages in respect of week one and week two.

The employer owes Employee A straight time for the shift she worked in week one for Employee B and in respect of which Employee A has not been compensated.

Employee B owes the employer the regular wages that she was paid for work that she did not perform in week one. Employee B is considered to have received an advance and therefore the employer may make a reconciliation for this amount. Such a reconciliation is not considered to be a set-off or deduction as defined in ESA Part V, s. 13.

Transition: Certain Agreements – s. 22(2.2)

22(2.2) For the purposes of this section, each of the following agreements shall be treated as if it were an agreement described in clause (2)(a):

1. An agreement to average hours of work made under a predecessor to this Act.

2. An agreement to average hours of work made under this section as it read on February 28, 2005.

3. An agreement to average hours of work that complies with the conditions prescribed by the regulations made under paragraph 7 of subsection 141(1) as it read on February 28, 2005.

Section 22(2.2) is a transitional provision relating to amendments made to the ESA 2000 in 2005. (See s. 22(5) below for the transitional provision relating to amendments made to the ESA 2000 in April 2019.)

This provision establishes how agreements to average hours that were entered into under the provisions of the former Employment Standards Act or under the ESA 2000 before the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004, SO 2004, c 21 came into force that have not expired are to be treated.

With respect to agreements made under the ESA 2000, paragraph 2 refers to agreements made under s. 22 as it read on February 28, 2005, i.e., agreements to average over periods of up to four weeks, while paragraph 3 refers to agreements made under O Reg 285/01, s. 30, i.e., agreements to average over period of more than four weeks. At the time, only the latter required the approval of the Director. In the case of all three types of averaging agreements, this provision states that such agreements are to be treated as if they were agreements under s. 22(2)(a).

On February 28, 2005 the relevant provisions read as follows:

Section 22(2) of the ESA 2000:

Subject to the regulations, if the employee and the employer agree to do so, the employee's hours of work may be averaged over separate, non-overlapping, contiguous periods of not more than four consecutive weeks each, for the purpose of determining the employee's entitlement, if any, to overtime pay.

Section 30 of O Reg 285/01:

An employer and an employee may agree to average hours of work over a period of more than four weeks for the purpose of determining the employee's entitlement to overtime pay under section 22 of the Act if the Director approves the agreement.

By virtue of s. 22(2.2), agreements that were entered into under s. 22(2) or O Reg 285/01, s. 30 as they read on February 28, 2005 under the former Employment Standards Act that are still valid are treated as if they are agreements made under the current s. 22(2)(a) (new agreements), thereby avoiding the need for employers to enter into another agreement with employees if they wished to average hours after February 28, 2005. However, employers who had old, pre-February 28, 2005agreements with employees were required to seek approval from the Director before the employer could average employees' hours of work. This was so even if the Director had approved the agreement pursuant to O Reg 285/01, s. 30 - see s. 22.1(18), which specifically provides that any approval granted by the Director under the regulation ceases to have effect on March 1, 2005. Note: As of April 3, 2019, Director approval is no longer necessary for averaging agreements to be valid.

Term of Agreement – s. 22(3); Limit on Agreement, Not represented by Trade Union – s. 22(3.1); Limit on agreement, collective agreement applies – s. 22(3.2)

The rules established in these subsections apply only to agreements entered into on or after April 3, 2019, the date that the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 received Royal Assent. See ss. 22(5) below for the rules re: agreements that were made prior to April 3, 2019.

22(3) Subject to subsections (3.1) and (3.2), an averaging agreement is not valid unless it provides for a start date and an expiry date.

Limit on Agreement, Not Represented by Trade Union – s. 22(3.1)

22(3.1) If the employee is not represented by a trade union, the averaging agreement's expiry date shall not be more than two years after the start date.

Limit on Agreement, Collective Agreement Applies – s. 22(3.2)

22(3.2) If the employee is represented by a trade union and a collective agreement applies to the employee, an averaging agreement shall expire no later than the day a subsequent collective agreement that applies to the employee comes into operation.

Section 22(3) provides that, subject to ss. (3.1) and (3.2), an averaging agreement is not valid unless it contains a start date and an expiry date.

With respect to the start date: if the agreement does not contain a start date it is invalid and as a result averaging of hours cannot take place.

With respect to the end date:

- Where employees are not represented by a union: the expiry date cannot be more than two years after the start date. Agreements that contain an expiry date that is beyond two years after the start date are invalid and, as a result, averaging of hours cannot take place. Note that s. 22(6) provides that averaging agreements may not be revoked before they expire unless both parties agree in writing.

- Where employees are represented by a trade union and are covered by a collective agreement: the averaging agreement cannot expire later than the day a subsequent collective agreement that applies to the employee comes into operation.
  For employees represented by a trade union, the written averaging agreement may be embodied in the collective agreement, a memorandum of agreement or an addendum to an agreement. The terms of the averaging agreement determine which of the bargaining unit employees are bound by it. (For example, it could be all employees in the bargaining unit or only select groups of employees in the bargaining unit.)

  The averaging agreement may contain a specific end date, or it may reference an event. For example, it may say that the agreement expires when the collective agreement expires, or it may say that it expires on the day a subsequent collective agreement comes into effect (it is not uncommon for there to be a period of time in between the date a collective agreement expires and the date the subsequent collective agreement comes into operation Note that the rule re: the expiry date in ss. (3.2) is triggered and fixed if the conditions of the employee being represented by a trade union and covered by a collective agreement were present at the time the averaging agreement was entered into.

Agreement May Be Renewed or Replaced – s. 22(4)

22(4) For greater certainty, an averaging agreement may be renewed or replaced if the requirements set out in this section are met.

This provision clarifies that averaging agreements may, before or upon their expiry be renewed or replaced, provided the requirements set out in section 22 are met.

Existing Agreement – s. 22(5)

22(5) Any averaging agreement that was made before the day the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 received Royal Assent in accordance with this section, as it read at the time, and that was approved by the Director under section 22.1, as it read at the time, is deemed to have met the requirements set out in subsections (2), (3), (3.1) and (3.2) and continues to be valid until the earlier of,

(a) the day the agreement is revoked under subsection (6);

(b) the day the Director's approval expires; or

(c) the day the Director's approval is revoked.

This is a transitional provision relating to amendments made to the ESA on April 3, 2019 by the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 (ROCA).

Prior to the ROCA amendments, an employee's hours could be averaged only if the employee agreed in writing to the averaging and only if the Director of Employment Standards approved the agreement. ROCA removed the requirement for the approval of the Director and limited the length of averaging agreements to four weeks.

This provision states that valid averaging agreements entered into and approved by the Director of Employment Standards prior to the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019 receiving Royal Assent (April 3, 2019), are deemed to meet the requirements of this section and remain valid and in force until the earlier of the following events:

1. the agreement is revoked by written agreement of the employee and employer,
2. the approval from the Director of Employment Standards expires or
3. the approval from the Director of Employment Standards is revoked.

This provision applies only to agreements that were entered into and approved by the Director of Employment Standards prior to April 3, 2019. Agreements entered into on or after April 3, 2019 are governed by the rules regarding expiry dates that are set out in s. 22(3.2)

This provision applies to Director-approved averaging agreements of any length, including those that exceed the current maximum length of four weeks.

Agreement Irrevocable – s. 22(6)

22(6) No averaging agreement referred to in this section may be revoked before it expires unless the employer and the employee agree to revoke it.

The ESA 2000 introduced this provision to ensure that once an averaging agreement is made, it cannot be unilaterally cancelled or revoked by the employer, the employee or their agents. Averaging agreements can only be revoked by the parties if the employer and the employee agree to do so in writing, in accordance with ESA Part 1, s. 1(3). The purpose of this provision is to provide the parties with a degree of certainty.

Time Off in Lieu – s. 22(7)

22(7) The employee may be compensated for overtime hours by receiving one and one-half hours of paid time off work for each hour of overtime worked instead of overtime pay if,

(a) the employee and the employer agree to do so; and

(b) the paid time off work is taken within three months of the work week in which the overtime was earned or, with the employee's agreement, within 12 months of that work week.

This provision permits an employer and an employee to agree, in writing, that the employee be compensated for some or all overtime hours by receiving one and one-half hours of paid time off work for each hour worked in excess of 44 (or other applicable threshold) instead of receiving overtime pay if the following criteria are met:

1. The employee and the employer agree, in writing to compensate the employee with paid time off at a rate of 1.5 hours off work for every hour of overtime worked, rather than pay the employee overtime pay; and
2. The paid time off work is taken within three months of the work week in which the overtime was earned or, with the employee's written agreement within 12 months of that work week.

Please see ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and (3.1) for a more detailed discussion.

Because the subsection states that the employee is to be compensated for overtime hours with one and one-half hours of paid time off work for each hour of overtime worked instead of overtime pay, it is the Program's position that the employee is entitled to the time off at the rate the employee is earning when the employee takes the time off as opposed to the rate they were earning when the overtime was worked. Note, however, that if the employee’s employment ends before the time off can be taken, the employer will be required to pay overtime pay based on the rate the employee was earning when the overtime was worked. See the discussion at s. 22(8) below.

Where Employment Ends – s. 22(8)

22(8) If the employment of an employee ends before the paid time off is taken under s. 22(7), the employer shall pay the employee overtime pay for the overtime hours that were worked in accordance with ESA Part V, s. 11(5).

This provision stipulates that if the employee's employment ends before the lieu time earned pursuant to s. 22(7) is taken, the employee's lieu time entitlement automatically converts into an entitlement to overtime pay. Pursuant to s. 11(5), the overtime pay is payable to the employee by the later of seven days after the termination of the employee's employment or on what would have been the employee's next pay day. Note that because this provision requires that the employer pay the employee overtime pay for the overtime hours that were worked, it is the Program's position that the overtime pay the employee is entitled to receive is based on the rate the employee was earning when the overtime was worked as opposed to the rate they were earning when the termination occurred.

Changing Work – s. 22(9)

22(9) If an employee who performs work of a particular kind or character is exempted from the application of this section by the regulations or the regulations prescribe an overtime threshold of other than 44 hours for an employee who performs such work, and the duties of an employee's position require them to perform both that work and work of another kind or character, this Part shall apply to the employee in respect of all work performed by them in a work week unless the time spent by the employee performing that other work constitutes less than half the time that the employee spent fulfilling the duties of their position in that work week.

The purpose of this provision is twofold. This provision ensures that:

1. Employees who perform work that is exempt from the overtime provisions and work that is not exempt are entitled to overtime pay for all hours worked in excess of 44 per week, provided that at least 50% of their work week is spent performing non-exempt work; and
2. Employees who perform work to which the 44-hour overtime threshold applies and work to which a higher overtime threshold attaches are entitled to overtime pay for all hours worked in excess of 44 per week provided that at least 50% of their work week is spent performing work that attracts the 44-hour threshold.

While s. 22(9) does not address the situation of employees who perform work for which the regulations prescribe differing overtime thresholds, it is Program policy to apply the principle behind that subsection by analogy to their situation. Thus, such employees are considered by the Program to be entitled to overtime pay for all hours worked in excess of the lower threshold provided that at least 50% of their work week is spent performing work that attracts the lower threshold. For example, employees who perform work that attracts overtime after 50 or 60 hours (local cartage and highway transport respectively) as per O Reg 285/01, ss. 17 and 18 would be entitled to overtime for all hours in excess of 50 in a week if at least 50% of the hours worked in the week were in local cartage.

The "overtime averaging" scheme set out in the ESA 2000 was amended effective April 3, 2019 as a result of the Restoring Ontario's Competitiveness Act, 2019. The provisions that are currently in force are discussed in the section above. The text below, which appears in red, is the legislative text and the associated operational policy as it applied prior to April 3, 2019. This discussion is being maintained in this publication since employees may still file a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the below provisions were in force. The text appears in red to highlight that the discussion below does not reflect the current legislative scheme.

ESA Part VIII Section 22 – Overtime Threshold

Overtime Threshold – s. 22(1); Same, Two or More Regular Rates – s. 22(1.1)

22(1) Subject to subsection (1.1), an employer shall pay an employee overtime pay of at least one and one-half times his or her regular rate for each hour of work in excess of 44 hours in each work week or, if another threshold is prescribed, that prescribed threshold.

(1.1) If an employee has two or more regular rates for work performed for the same employer in a work week,

(a) the employee is entitled to be paid overtime pay for each hour of work performed in the week after the total number of hours performed for the employer reaches the overtime threshold; and

(b) the overtime pay for each hour referred to in clause (a) is one and one-half times the regular rate that applies to the work performed in that hour.

Subject to s. 22(1.1), s. 22(1) sets out the general overtime premium of one and one-half times the employee's regular rate of pay for each hour of overtime worked in each work week. Section 22(1) also establishes the general overtime threshold. The employer's obligation to pay the overtime premium is triggered when an employee works more than 44 hours in a work week. Subject to a greater right or benefit, the general premium and threshold apply for all employees except those exempted from ESA Part VIII Overtime Pay. In addition, for certain employees, listed below, different overtime thresholds have been prescribed.

Subsection 22(1.1) is a new provision that the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22, effective January 1, 2018, added to the ESA 2000. It states that where an employee has two or more regular rates for work performed in a work week that the overtime rate for any hour of overtime work is one and one-half times the regular rate the employee would be entitled to for the work performed in that hour.

Special Overtime Thresholds

O Reg 285/01 varies the overtime threshold for certain employees. The regulation requires employers to pay employees the general overtime premium of one and one-half times the employee's regular rate of pay; however, it varies the overtime threshold as follows:

Road building in relation to streets, highways or parking lots

Employees engaged at the site of road building in relation to streets, highways or parking lots are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour of work in excess of 55 hours in each work week – O Reg 285/01, s. 13(1)(a). If the employee works less than 55 hours in a work week, the difference between the number of hours worked and 55 (up to a maximum of 22) is added on to the maximum number of hours that can be worked in the following work week before overtime becomes payable – O Reg 285/01, s. 13(1)(b).

Road building in relation to structures

Employees engaged at the site of road building in relation to structures such as bridges, tunnels or retaining walls in connection with streets or highways are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour of work in excess of 50 hours in each work week per O Reg 285/01, s. 13(2)(a). If the employee works less than 50 hours in a work week, the difference between the number of hours worked and 50 (up to a maximum of 22) is added on to the maximum number of hours that can be worked in the following work week before overtime becomes payable – O Reg 285/01, s. 13(2)(b).

Hospitality industry

Employees who work for the owner or operator of a hotel, motel, tourist resort, restaurant or tavern for 24 weeks or less in a calendar year and who are provided with room and board are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour worked in excess of 50 hours in a work week – O Reg 285/01, s. 14.

Canning, processing and packing fresh fruits or vegetables

Seasonal employees whose employment is directly related to canning, processing and packing of fresh fruits or vegetables, or their distribution by the canner, processor or packer, are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour worked in excess of 50 hours in a work week – O Reg 285/01, s. 15.

Sewer or watermain construction and maintenance

Employees engaged in laying, altering, repairing or maintaining sewers and watermains and work incidental thereto, or in guarding the site during this work are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour worked in excess of 50 hours in a work week – O Reg 285/01, s. 16.

Local cartage drivers

Employees who are drivers of, or drivers' helpers on, a vehicle used in the business of carrying goods for hire within a municipality or to any point not more than five kilometres beyond the municipality's limits are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour worked in excess of 50 hours in a work week – O Reg 285/01, s. 17(1)(a).

Transport truck drivers

Employees who drive public trucks operated by holders of an operating licence issued under the Truck Transportation Act, RSO 1990, c T.22 are entitled to the overtime premium for each hour worked in excess of 60 hours in a work week - ss. 18(1) and 18(2). Only those hours during which such employees are directly responsible for the public truck are included when calculating the entitlement to overtime – O Reg 285/01, s. 18(4).

Invalid Employer Defences to an Employee's Claim for Overtime Pay

Subsection 22(1) places a positive obligation on employers to ensure that employees receive the statutory minimum requirement with respect to overtime. An employer cannot satisfy that obligation or circumvent payment for overtime by raising any of the following defences:

Employer did not authorize the employee to work overtime

In Philip's Auto Sales and Repair Inc. v Bonneville (October 30, 1984), ESC 1726 (Betcherman), the referee affirmed that even in the event that the employer did not authorize its employees to work overtime, they are still entitled to receive the overtime pay if they exceed the overtime threshold. This decision was based on a predecessor to O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1, which stipulated that work shall be deemed to be performed when work is permitted or suffered to be done by the employer. The employer in this case was present when the employee performed the overtime work and the referee held that the employer implicitly permitted such overtime.

In Joseph Dobi Painting v Szekely and Szekely (May 28, 1980), ESC 799 (Adamson), the referee stated: "[t]he law is quite clear with respect to overtime work. The responsibility rests fully upon the employer. If he does not wish employees to work overtime, he must not only order them to stop but see that they do. This employer had ample time after the first week of employment to do this. During the period in which the employer claimed to have been incapacitated, it was still his responsibility to see that another person supervised his workers."

In Joe Kool's Restaurants Ltd. v Whitehead et al (January 21, 1986), ESC 2023 (Brown), the work schedule prepared by the employer did not include overtime hours; however, the employees were permitted to rearrange the schedule on an individual basis to suit their own convenience, without clearing those arrangements with the employer. These informal arrangements were neither encouraged nor discouraged, and there was no advance notification to the employer. The employer argued that the overtime was not scheduled by it, nor was it worked with its knowledge or acquiescence and that the Act's overtime provisions were therefore inapplicable. The referee rejected that argument and upheld the overtime pay assessment on the basis that the employer must have known and thus was deemed to have permitted the overtime hours worked.

An employee who is working excess hours contrary to a specific term of an employment contract or without authorization may well face disciplinary action for having done so, but that does not alter the fact that they are entitled to overtime pay for overtime hours worked.

Employee agreed to a built-in overtime rate

An employer may argue that it has already compensated employees for overtime pay by providing the employee with a bonus scheme or a higher regular rate of pay. This is not a valid defence to an employee's claim for overtime pay. The employer is also liable to pay overtime notwithstanding that the employee agreed verbally or in writing to work extra hours at the regular rate of pay. In Ferlandi Builders and Contractors Inc. v Manderscheid (May 30, 1986), ESC 2116 (Aggarwal), Jefferson Metal Products Inc. v Hazlehurst and Turner (February 20, 1985), ESC 1790 (Kerr) and Wen-Hal Limited v Hansen (August 22, 1979), ESC 660 (MacDowell), the referees held that any agreement by an employee to work overtime without receiving overtime pay for hours worked beyond 44 per week is rendered void by s. 3 of the former Employment Standards Act, now ESA Part III, s. 5(1), which specifically prohibits employees, employers and their agents from contracting out of or waiving an employment standard.

The ESA 2000 does not contain the provision that appeared in the former Employment Standards Act that specifically prohibited employers from reducing an employee's pay to comply with the overtime provisions. However, the definition of regular rate in the ESA Part I, s. 1 makes the prohibition redundant.

Regular rate is now defined in such a way as to ensure that overtime hours shall not, in any circumstances, be used to calculate an employee's regular rate. The regular rate for hourly employees is the amount paid for an hour of work in the employee's usual work week - excluding overtime hours. The regular rate for non-hourly employees is the amount paid in a given work week divided by the number of non-overtime hours actually worked in that work week. For example, an employer cannot assign a regular rate of $12.00 for the first 44 hours of work in a work week and a regular rate of $8.00 thereafter.

Employee contracted out of their overtime pay

An employer and an employee cannot agree to contract out of the overtime provisions. This is prohibited by ESA Part III, s. 5(1). An employee cannot agree to work overtime hours at a rate lower than one and one-half times their regular rate. Nor can an employee agree to reduce their regular rate for those hours worked in excess of the applicable overtime threshold.

Employee performed work at multiple locations

An employer cannot avoid its obligation to pay overtime by scheduling employees to work, for example, 20 hours at one of its locations and 30 hours at a second location. In Tavares and Sgromo c.o.b. Mr. Submarine, Thunder Bay, Ontario v Coppola et al (April 13, 1982), ESC 1197 (Aggarwal), the employer had contended that since its employee did not work more than 44 hours in one location, the employee was not entitled to overtime pay. The referee, however, ruled that it was irrelevant whether the employee worked all 54.25 hours at a single location of the employer; the essential point was that the employee worked all of those hours for one employer.

Employee performed work for different but related employers

Similarly, the obligation to pay overtime cannot be avoided by scheduling employees to work, for example, 25 hours for one corporation and 25 hours for another related corporation. This is prohibited by ESA Part III, s. 4, which provides as follows:

4(1) Subsection (2) applies if associated or related activities or businesses are or were carried on by or through an employer and one or more other persons.

(2) The employer and the other person or persons described in subsection (1) shall all be treated as one employer for the purposes of this Act.

(3) Subsection (2) applies even if the activities or businesses are not carried on at the same time.

(4) Subsection (2) does not apply with respect to a corporation and an individual who is a shareholder of the corporation unless the individual is a member of a partnership and the shares are held for the purposes of the partnership.

(4.1) Subsection (2) does not apply to the Crown, a Crown agency or an authority, board, commission or corporation all of whose members are appointed by the Crown.

(5) Persons who are treated as one employer under this section are jointly and severally liable for any contravention of this Act and the regulations under it and for any wages owing to an employee of any of them.

Where ESA Part III, s. 4 applies and two or more entities are treated as one employer, the hours worked by employees for those two or more entities are to be added together for purposes of determining the employees' overtime pay entitlement. See ESA Part III, s. 4 for a more detailed discussion of this issue.

Calculation of Overtime Pay

The method for calculating an employee's entitlement to overtime pay is set out below. This method applies to ALL employees who are not exempt from the application of Part VIII Overtime Pay.

11. Do the overtime provisions apply to the claimant?
12. Which threshold applies? Is it the standard 44-hour threshold, a higher threshold established by regulation, or a lower threshold established by contract?
13. Does s. 22(9) (the changing work provision) apply?
14. Which overtime premium(s) applies? The standard time and one-half premium or a higher premium established by contract?
15. What is the employee's work week?
16. How many non-overtime and overtime hours has the employee worked during each work week in question?
17. What is the employee's regular rate or rates in a given work week?

18. What is the employee's overtime rate or rates for each hour of overtime work in a given work week?
19. What is the employee's overtime pay for each work week in question?
20. Has the employer provided the employee with any overtime pay in respect of each work week in question?

Do the overtime provisions apply to the claimant?

The first determination that must be made is whether the person claiming overtime pay is covered by Part VIII Overtime Pay. To make this determination, the following issues must be considered:

- Is the claimant an employee within the meaning of the ESA 2000?
- Is the claimant excluded from the application of the ESA 2000 by virtue of ESA Part III, ss. 3(2), 3(3) or 3(5)?
- Is the employee exempt from the overtime provisions by virtue of O Reg 285/01, ss. 2(1), 2(2), 8, 11(3) or 23?

Please note that overtime averaging agreements may also impact on a claimant's right to overtime pay. See discussion in ESA Part VIII, s. 22(2) below.

Which threshold applies?

Is it the standard 44-hour threshold, a higher threshold established by regulation, or a lower threshold established by contract?

The next issue for determination is whether the 44-hour threshold applies. A higher threshold may be prescribed by O Reg 285/01. A lower threshold may be established by contract. If the employee is engaged in any of the following, O Reg 285/01 should be consulted as a higher overtime threshold may apply:

- Road building - s. 13;
- Whether the employee is seasonal and employed by an owner or operator of a motel, hotel, tourist resort, restaurant or tavern - s. 14;
- Whether the employee is seasonal and engaged in canning, processing and packaging of fresh fruits or vegetables or their distribution - s. 15;
- Sewer and watermain construction - s. 16;
- Local cartage - s. 17;
- Highway transport - s. 18.

Does s. 22(9) (the changing work provision) apply?

Section 22(9) provides that when an employee performs work that is exempt from this Part and work that is not, the employee is entitled to overtime pay in respect of all of the overtime work performed in a work week so long as the non-exempt work in the work week constitutes 50% or more of the time the employee spent working.

Similarly, s. 22(9) provides that employees who perform both work that attracts overtime after 44 hours and work that attracts overtime at a higher threshold will be entitled to overtime pay after 44 hours in respect of all work performed during the work week by the employee so long as the work performed by the employee that attracts overtime pay at the 44 hour threshold constitutes 50% or more of the time the employee spent working.

See the detailed discussion of s. 22(9) below.

Which overtime premium applies?

The standard time and one-half premium or a higher premium established by contract?

The next issue for determination is whether the time and one-half overtime premium established in s. 22(1) applies. A higher premium may be established by contract. For example, the employment contract may provide for an overtime premium of double the employee's regular rate after 44 hours of work in a work week, or it may provide for time and one-half after 44 hours of work in a work week and double-time after 50 hours of work in a work week.

What is the employee's work week?

The definition of work week is critical to the calculation of an employee's entitlement to overtime pay. An employee's regular rate is determined with respect to a work week. Indeed, an employee's entitlement to overtime pay is determined in respect of a work week. Therefore, one of the first determinations an officer must make is what constitutes the employee's work week.

Work week is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1 as:

(a) a recurring period of seven consecutive days selected by the employer for the purpose of scheduling work, or

(b) if the employer has not selected such a period, a recurring period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

The Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Falconbridge Nickel Mines Ltd. and Egan et al., 1983 CanLII 1931 (ON CA) concluded that the term week as it was used in s. 24(1) of the former Employment Standards Act, must be interpreted as a work week. The ESA 2000 deleted the definition of week that appeared in the former Act and included an amended definition of work week to reflect the reasoning of the Court of Appeal. Part VIII Overtime Pay uses the terms week and work week interchangeably.

How many non-overtime and overtime hours has the employee worked during each work week in question?

When determining what overtime and non-overtime hours an employee has worked in a given work week, the first question is how many hours of work were actually performed by the employee in the work week. Once the officer has determined how many hours of work were performed in the work week, they may then determine how many of these hours constitute non-overtime hours and how many are overtime hours.

When making this determination, regard must be had for O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1, which sets out when work is and is not deemed to be performed.

Work Deemed to be or Not Deemed to be Performed by Employee

Section 1.1 of O Reg 285/01 provides as follows:

1.1(1) Subject to subsection (2), work shall be deemed to be performed by an employee for the employer,

(a) where work is,

(iii) permitted or suffered to be done by the employer, or

(iv) in fact performed by an employee although a term of the contract of employment expressly forbids or limits hours of work or requires the employer to authorize hours of work in advance; or

(b) where the employee is not performing work and is required to remain at the place of employment,

(iii) waiting or holding himself or herself ready for call to work, or

(iv) on a rest or break-time other than an eating period.

1.1(2) Work shall not be deemed to be performed for an employer during the time the employee,

(a) is entitled to,

(iv) take time off work for an eating period,

(v) take at least six hours or such longer period as is established by contract, custom or practice for sleeping and the employer furnishes sleeping facilities, or

(vi) take time off work in order to engage in the employee's own private affairs or pursuits as is established by contract, custom or practice; or

(b) is not at the place of employment and is waiting or holding himself or herself ready for call to work.

See O Reg 285/01, s. 1.1 for a detailed discussion of this section.

Calculation of Hours Worked for Employees in Highway Transport Paid by Mileage

A Program investigatory tool involving mileage approximation has been used to determine the hours of work for employees employed in highway transport and paid by mileage, where no complete and accurate records of hours of work exist. The investigatory tool consists of dividing the total distance driven by 80 kilometers per hour (or 50 miles per hour). This practice can also be used as a check to assess the accuracy of existing records. Any other (i.e., non-driving) hours, if they can be established to have been worked, must also be included in the total number of hours worked. However, the hours that the employee is not directly responsible for the truck are not included for overtime purposes.

Calculation of Hours Worked where the Employer has not Kept Accurate Records

If an employer has not kept accurate records of the hours worked by an employee, or if the employer's records are challenged by the employee, the employment standards officer will determine the employee's hours of work on the basis of the best evidence available. Note that where an employee has two or more regular rates of pay that the employer is required to maintain a record of the dates and times the employee worked in excess of the overtime threshold, at each rate of pay, in any given work week. See ESA Part VI, s. 15 (1) paragraph 3.2.

Travel Time

With respect to travel time it is Program policy that:

- With the exception of commuting time, any time a person spends travelling (irrespective of the mode of transportation) for the purpose of getting to or from somewhere where work will be performed, must be counted as hours of work;
- Commuting time means the time required for an employee to travel to work from home and vice versa. However, there are a number of exceptions to this rule:
    - If the employee takes the work vehicle home in the evening for the convenience of the employer, the hours of work begin when the employee leaves home in the morning and end when they arrive home in the evening; or
    - If the employee is required to transport other staff or supplies to or from the workplace or work site, time so spent must be counted as hours of work.

What is the employee's regular rate or rates in a given work week?

Before an employee's overtime rate or rates in respect of the overtime hours worked in a given work week can be calculated, the employee's regular rate or rates (if the employee is paid more than one hourly rate for work performed for the employer) for the work week(s) in question must be determined. ESA Part I, s. 1 defines regular rate as follows.

Regular rate means, subject to any regulation made under paragraph 10 of subsection 141(1),

(a) for an employee who is paid by the hour, the amount paid for an hour of work in the employee's usual work week, not counting overtime hours,

(b) otherwise, the amount earned in a given work week divided by the number of non-overtime hours actually worked in that week.

Employees who are paid solely on the basis of an hourly rate (including employees who are paid two or more different hourly rates for work performed for the employer) will fall within the first portion of this definition. All other employees, including salaried employees, flat rate mechanics, commissioned salespersons, piece workers and employees receiving mixed compensation, for example, an hourly rate and mileage or an hourly rate and commission, must have their regular rate determined by reference to clause (b) of the definition of regular rate.

What is the employee's overtime rate or rates for each hour of overtime in a given work week?

An employee's overtime rate for the overtime hours worked in any given work week is established by multiplying their regular rate by one and one-half or by the higher rate established by contract. If the employee has more than one regular rate that applies to overtime hours worked as per s. 22(1.1), the overtime rate in respect of each hour of overtime will be one and one-half times the regular rate that applies to the work performed in each hour, or the higher rate established by contract.

What is the employee's overtime pay for each work week in question?

The overtime pay that an employee is entitled to for a given work week is determined by multiplying their overtime rate by the number of overtime hours worked at that rate within the week. Where the employee has two or more regular rates and has performed overtime work that attracts more than one overtime rate, the overtime pay for the work week is determined by adding together the overtime pay entitlement as calculated for each hour of overtime work. See example 1 under “Examples of How to Calculate Overtime” below.

Has the employer provided the employee with any overtime pay for each work week in question?

The final consideration is whether the employee has already been paid, in full or in part, for any of the overtime hours in question. This will only be appropriate in limited circumstances. For example, an employee who is paid by the hour and who works 55 hours in a work week and is paid their regular rate for those 55 hours has received a portion of their overtime pay. That employee will only be entitled to an additional .5 of their regular rate in respect of all overtime hours worked in the work week.

Please note that this will not apply to a salaried employee. See the discussion below.

Examples of How to Calculate Overtime

Overtime entitlements for employees with two or more regular rates

An employee who is paid on an hourly basis may perform, in one work week, two types of work, each of which attracts a different hourly rate. In that case, the employee has two regular rates and as a result, s. 22(1.1) applies to determine the overtime pay entitlement. That subsection provides that the overtime rate for each of hour of overtime work performed is based on the regular rate that applies to the work performed in that hour.

Example 1:

An employee works as a punch press operator earning $15.00/hour and also as a shipping logistics coordinator earning $20.00/hour for the same employer. The employee’s overtime threshold is 44 hours and the overtime rate is 1.5 times the regular rate.

In one work week the employee worked 4 hours of overtime. The 45th and 46th hours were worked as punch press operator and the 47th and 48th hours were worked as a shipping logistics coordinator. This employee’s overtime pay entitlement would be calculated as follows:

45th hour: overtime rate is $15.00 x1.5 = $22.50 per hour

46th hour overtime rate is $15.00 x1.5 = $22.50 per hour

47th hour overtime rate is $20.00 x1.5 = $30.00 per hour

48th hour overtime rate is $20.00 x1.5 = $30.00 per hour

The total overtime pay due to the employee is $105.00 [$22.50 + $22.50 + $30.00 + $30.00]

Example 2:

An employee usually works in job A at an hourly rate of $15.00. The employee also usually works, for the same employer in job B at an hourly rate of $20.00. The employer has received approval from the Director of Employment Standards under s. 17.1 to have employees work excess weekly hours. The employee has also agreed in writing to work excess hours. In one work week the employee works 60 hours: 36 hours in job A at $15.00 per hour and 24 hours in job B at $20.00 per hour. The employee was paid their regular rate or straight time for all hours worked including overtime hours; a total of $1020.

The regular overtime threshold and overtime rate of 1.5 times the regular rate apply to this employee. The 16 hours of work performed once the overtime threshold of 44 hours was reached were as follows:

- 12 hours in job A
- 4 hours in job B

The employee's overtime entitlement in accordance with s. 22(1.1) is:

- Job A work: 12 hours X $15.00 per hour X 1.5 = $270
- Job B work: 4 hours X $20.00 per hour X 1.5 = $120

However, the employee had already been paid straight time for the 12 hours of overtime worked in job A = 12 X $15.00 per hour = $180

Plus straight time for the 4 hours of overtime worked in job B = 4 X $20.00 = $80.00

The employee's overtime pay entitlement was $390; however the employee had already been paid $260 in straight time for the overtime hours (i.e. has received partial pay for the overtime hours). Therefore, the balance owing in respect of overtime pay for the work week in question is $390 - $260 = $130

Overtime Entitlements for Employees Paid Hourly Rate and Other Forms of Compensation

From time to time employees who are paid an hourly rate will also perform work that involves different types of compensation in the same work week. For example, payment of an hourly rate and commission. If an employee who receives an hourly rate is also compensated with commissions, that employee, strictly speaking, is not paid by the hour. Accordingly, the regular rate of such employees must be determined by applying clause (b) of the definition of regular rate, by dividing their total earnings for each work week in question by the number of non-overtime hours worked. However, if an employee receives an hourly rate for each hour worked (including overtime hours), the employer will be credited for such payment when the employee's overtime entitlement is calculated.

Under the ESA 2000, overtime hours cannot be included in the calculation of an employee's regular rate.

Example:

The employee works 50 hours in a work week and is paid $20.00 per hour. The employer has received approval from the Director of Employment Standards under s. 17.1 to have employees work excess weekly hours. The employee has also agreed in writing to work excess hours. The employee also receives commissions. In one work week the employee receives $1000 for 50 hours worked and $200 in respect of commissions. The general overtime premium and threshold apply.

- Employee works 44 non-overtime hours in the work week
- Employee works 6 hours of overtime in the work week
- Regular rate = total earnings in work week divided by non-overtime hours) = $1200 divided by 44 = $27.27
- Overtime rate is $27.27 (regular rate) x 1.5 = $40.91
- Overtime pay entitlement = (overtime rate x overtime hours in a workweek) = $40.91 x 6 = $245.46

Because this employee was paid straight time for each hour worked, including overtime hours, the employee has already received $120 (6 overtime hours x $20.00) in respect of overtime. Therefore, they entitled to receive an additional $125.46: $245.46 overtime entitlement minus $120 of overtime already paid, in respect of overtime for the work week in question.

Overtime Entitlements for Employees Paid on Mileage, Piecework or Commission Basis

Under the ESA 2000, the overtime entitlement for employees who are paid solely on a mileage basis, by commission or on a piece-rate must be determined by reference to the definition of regular rate in ESA Part I, s. 1. Because these employees are not paid by the hour, their regular rate must be determined by applying clause (b) of the definition of regular rate, by dividing all earned wages in the work week by the non-overtime hours worked. The overtime premium of one and one-half times the regular rate is payable for all hours worked in excess of 44 in a work week, unless a higher overtime rate applies by virtue of contract or a higher threshold applies by virtue of regulation.

Example:

An employee works making oven mitts and is paid $2.50 per pair. In a particular work week, the employee works 60 hours to make 300 pairs of mitts and is paid $750.00. The employer has received approval from the Director of Employment Standards under ESA Part VII, s. 17.1 to have employees work excess weekly hours. The employee has also agreed in writing to work excess hours. The general threshold and premium apply to the employee.

- Employee works 44 non-overtime hours that work week
- Employee works 16 hours of overtime that work week
- Regular rate = total earnings in the work week divided by non-overtime hours = $750.00 divided by 44 = $17.05
- Overtime rate is $17.05 (regular rate) x 1.5 = $25.58
- Overtime pay entitlement = overtime rate x overtime hours in the work week
- = $25.58 x 16
- = $409.28 in respect of that work week.

Overtime Entitlements for Flat Rate Mechanics

Enquiries arise occasionally on the application of the legislation to motor vehicle mechanics and body repairpersons who are paid on a flat rate or incentive system. In a flat rate shop, every job is rated as taking a certain number of hours to perform and the mechanic is paid a book hourly rate for those hours. As an example, a brake reline is rated as a four-hour job, and the mechanic's book rate is $16 per hour. The mechanic will be paid $64 whether the job takes three or five hours to complete. This is acceptable so long as minimum wage is being paid and all overtime hours (hours worked in excess of 44) are compensated at a minimum of 1.5 times the mechanic's actual regular rate, which is not the same as the flat rate.

Generally, in a flat-rate remuneration system, it is a condition of employment that the employee rectify their own faulty work without further pay. This is not a violation of the ESA 2000, so long as the minimum wage and overtime provisions are not violated. If for some reason, another mechanic makes the required changes, the payment for the entire job is credited to the second mechanic. Where this occurs as part of the employment contract, the transfer of credits is considered as part of the reconciliation of wages due and not a prohibited set-off or deduction. However, the minimum wage and overtime provisions still apply with respect to the hours of work the first mechanic spent on the vehicle.

It is essential in a flat rate system that the employer's records reflect both the flat rate paid and the actual hours worked: it is the actual hours worked that must be used to calculate the employee's regular rate and overtime entitlements. Those actual hours of work must include any time spent rectifying the employee's faulty work.

As illustrated in the examples below, payment at the book rate is payment for a task (i.e., a flat rate for the task), rather than a payment for hours actually worked. As no portion of the payment is made in respect of hours actually worked, none of it can be considered to be a payment for regular hours or overtime hours.

Example 1:

The employee is paid a flat book rate of $16.00 per hour for brake re-lining. They did 12 brake-relines which resulted in a flat rate payment for 48 hours (each re-line job is rated as taking 4 hours) for a total payment of $768. The employee however actually spent 46 hours doing the work in that week. The general overtime rate and threshold apply to this employee.

- Employee works 44 non-overtime hours in work week
- Employee works 2 overtime hours in work week
- Employee paid $768 for work week
- Employee's regular rate is $768 divided by 44 non-overtime hours = $17.45
- Employee's overtime rate is $17.45 x 1.5 = $26.18
- Employee's overtime entitlement is 2 hours x $26.18 = $52.36

In this case, the employer owes the employee an additional $52.36 for overtime pay.

Example 2:

The employee is paid a flat book rate of $16.00 per hour to perform tune-ups that according to the book will take 1.5 hours to complete. In fact they are being paid $24.00 for each tune-up regardless of the time it actually took them to perform the tune-up. Having completed 25 tune-ups in one week the employee is paid $600 for that work week. However, the employee actually worked 50 hours in that work week. The general overtime rate and threshold apply to this employee.

- Employee works 44 non-overtime hours in work week
- Employee work 6 overtime hours in the work week
- Employee paid $600 for the work week
- Employee's regular rate is $600 divided by 44 non-overtime hours = $13.64
- Employee's overtime rate is $13.64 x 1.5 = $20.46
- Employee's overtime entitlement is 6 hours x $20.46 = $122.76

In this case, the employer owes the employee an additional $122.76 for overtime pay.

Overtime Entitlement for Salaried Employees

Generally, employees who are paid a fixed amount for each pay period rather than an amount determined by applying an hourly rate to each hour worked (or a piece rate or commission based on work performed) are considered to be salaried employees. It should be noted that although ESA Part VI, s. 15(4) defines a salaried employee, that definition is for the purposes of ESA Part VI, s. 15(3), which sets out the employer's obligations to record hours worked, and is not necessarily relevant to the calculation of overtime entitlements.

Salaried employees who are not exempt from the overtime provisions are entitled to overtime pay for overtime work. Once the work week has been determined, the employee's regular rate will be determined by applying clause (b) of the definition of regular rate, by dividing the salary earned in respect of the work week by the number of non-overtime hours worked in the work week. Salaried employees are entitled to receive 1.5 times their regular rate in respect of each hour worked in excess of 44 in a work week (or other applicable threshold).

Prior to the introduction the ESA 2000, the calculation of the regular rate for salaried employees was accomplished by dividing the salary earned for the work week by the actual hours worked, including overtime hours. The employee was considered to have been paid straight time for all hours worked, including overtime hours, and received an additional .5 times their regular rate in respect of all overtime hours worked in the work week in question. This method of calculating overtime had the effect of lowering the employee's regular rate as the number of hours worked increased and significantly reducing the employee's entitlement to overtime pay.

Under the ESA 2000, overtime hours cannot be included in the calculation of an employee's regular rate. Formerly, the more overtime hours a salaried employee worked, the less they were paid for those hours. The new definition of regular rate precludes that result because overtime hours cannot be included in the calculation.

Example:

An employee is paid an annual salary of $52,000 or $1000 per week. The employee works 60 hours in a work week. The employer has received approval from the Director of Employment Standards under s. 17.1 to have employees work excess weekly hours. The employee has also agreed in writing to work excess hours. The general overtime rate and threshold apply.

- Employee works 44 non-overtime hours in work week
- Employee works 16 overtime hours in work week
- Employee's regular rate for the work week is $1000 divided by 44 non-overtime hours = $22.73
- Employee's overtime rate for the work week is $22.73 x 1.5 = $34.10

The employee's entitlement to overtime pay for the work week is $34.10 x 16 hours = $545.60.

Averaging – s. 22(2)

22(2) An employee's hours of work may be averaged over separate, non-overlapping, contiguous periods of two or more consecutive weeks for the purpose of determining the employee's entitlement, if any, to overtime pay if,

(a) the employee has made an agreement with the employer that their hours of work may be averaged over periods of a specified number of weeks;

(b) the employer has received an approval under section 22.1 that applies to the employee or a class of employees that includes the employee; and

(c) the averaging period does not exceed the lesser of,

(i) the number of weeks specified in the agreement, and

(ii) the number of weeks specified in the approval.

Where the conditions set out in this provision are met, the employer's obligation to pay overtime pay is based on the employee's average hours per work week (during the period specified in the employee's averaging agreement or the period specified in the approval, whichever period is shorter), rather than the hours actually worked within a work week.

Example:

An employee and employer have agreed in writing and have the Director's approval to average hours over four-week periods for the purpose of calculating the employee's entitlement to overtime pay. The employee works 48 hours in the first week, 44 hours in the second week, 40 hours in the third week and 50 hours in the fourth week. The employee and employer have also agreed in writing and have the Director's approval to work excess weekly hours.

The employee's overtime hours will be determined on the basis of the average number of hours worked per week. In this example the employee worked an average of 45.5 hours per week (48 + 44 + 40 + 50, divided by 4). Accordingly, the employee would be entitled to overtime pay for six hours based on an average of 1.5 hours of overtime per week in the four-week period. In the absence of averaging, the employee would have been entitled to four hours of overtime pay in the first week and six hours of overtime pay in the fourth week.

Calculating overtime pay when employee works different jobs for different rates of pay:

It is program policy that the employer shall apply the proportion of each overtime rate to the averaged overtime hours.

For example, if the employee gets 4 hours of overtime pursuant to the 2-week averaging agreement and the employee worked 25% of the overtime in the 2-week period at Job A and 75% of the overtime at Job B, this employee would get 1 hour of overtime at the Job A’s overtime rate and 3 hours of the overtime rate at Job B.

Note that, unless there is a time off in lieu arrangement in place pursuant to s. 22(7), the employer is required to pay the employee straight time for every hour worked within each pay period – including those hours over 44 – and that it is only the extra half that the employer can postpone paying under an averaging arrangement until the end of the averaging period. See ESA Part V, s. 11 for details.

Section 22(2) provides that where averaging is permitted, the employee's hours of work can be averaged only over separate, non-overlapping, contiguous periods of two or more consecutive weeks. That is, the averaging periods must be contiguous (i.e., there cannot be gaps in between the end of one period and the beginning of another), and they must be separate and cannot overlap with one another. Further, the two or more weeks within each averaging period must be consecutive.

Note that even if an employer has averaging agreements and an averaging approval, if employees will be working hours in excess of the daily or weekly limits the employer must also obtain excess hours agreements from the employees and, in the case where they work in excess of the weekly limit, an excess hours approval from the Director, subject to the pending approval rule.

Three Conditions for Averaging

The three conditions that must be met before averaging can take place are discussed below.

Condition 1: Employee made agreement with employer that hours of work may be averaged over specified number of weeks

The first condition that must be met before an employer is permitted to average an employee's hours is the employee must have entered into an agreement with the employer that their hours may be averaged over periods of a specified number of weeks.

For an agreement to valid, the following criteria must be met:

Agreement must be in writing

By virtue of ESA Part 1, s. 1(3), an agreement between an employer and an employee to average the employee's hours of work, for purposes of calculating the employee's entitlement to overtime pay must be in writing. See also ESA Part 1, s. 1(3.1), which provides that an agreement in writing may be in electronic form.

For employees represented by a trade union, the written agreement may be embodied in the collective agreement or a memorandum of agreement or other written documentation signed by union officials and, provided the other criteria are met, all bargaining unit employees will be bound by the agreement.

In the non-unionized context, a written agreement between each employee and the employer is required.

Agreement must specify the number of weeks over which the hours of work are going to be averaged Section 22(2)(a) requires that the agreement state precisely the number of weeks over which the hours of work are going to be averaged. Statements such as "up to 4 weeks" are not sufficient.

Agreement must contain an expiry date

The averaging agreement must also contain an expiry date. There are restrictions placed on when the expiry date can be. See s. 22(3) below for a more detailed discussion.

Agreement must clearly and explicitly set out what is being agreed upon

The agreement should be written with sufficient clarity for the parties to know precisely what they are agreeing to. Ambiguous or equivocal agreements will be ineffective.

The agreement should contain the employee's express consent to the averaging of hours for the purpose of calculating the employee's entitlement, if any, to overtime pay. Mere agreement to a particular schedule is not sufficient, as an employee may agree to work certain hours without necessarily having agreed to the hours being averaged for overtime pay purposes.

Employers are encouraged, but not required, to include schedules in averaging agreements.

Overtime averaging agreements must not be confused with agreements to work hours in excess of the weekly and daily maximums established in ESA Part VII, s. 17. Employers who wish employees to work hours in excess of eight hours a day (or the regular work day where that is longer than eight hours) or 48 hours a week must secure valid written agreements from their employees (and, in the case of excess weekly hours, obtain the Director's approval) to work hours in excess of the daily and weekly maximums.

Parties must have entered into the agreement voluntarily

An averaging agreement will not be binding if it is not entered into voluntarily by both parties. Please see ESA Part I, s. 1(3) for a more detailed discussion of the issue of voluntary consent.

Employee must have given their informed consent to the agreement

The employee must understand what they are agreeing to, and the consequences of the agreement, for an averaging agreement to be binding. Informed consent will not be established unless each party knows precisely the ramifications of entering into the agreement.

The best evidence that an employee provided their informed consent is where the document itself accurately sets out the consequences of the agreement. To this end, employers may wish to include the following in averaging agreements:

- A statement notifying the employee(s) that an averaging arrangement, if approved by the Director, will affect the amount of overtime pay the employee will be entitled to under the arrangement, as compared to the amount of overtime pay the employee would be entitled to if the employee(s) worked the same number of hours in each week without an averaging arrangement.
- A statement informing the employee(s) that the agreement is irrevocable before it expires, unless the employee and the employer agree, in writing, to revoke it – s. 22(6).

See s. 22(6) below for a more detailed discussion of these requirements.

Employers may also wish to consider including a specific schedule in an averaging agreement.

The Ministry has produced a list of items employers and employees may wish to consider when drafting agreements. This can be found on the Ministry of Labour's website.

In the absence of a valid agreement, the employer must pay the employee overtime according to s. 22(1), or ensure that the employee does not work overtime, even if the Director of Employment Standards has issued an approval that applies to the employee.

Employers are required to retain a copy of every averaging agreement it has made with its employees for three years after the last day on which work was performed under each agreement – see ESA Part VI, s. 15(9).

If Employee Refuses to Consent to an Averaging Agreement

If an employee does not agree to the averaging of their overtime hours, the employer must pay the employee overtime according to s. 22(1), or ensure that the employee does not work overtime (that is, hours in excess of 44 hours per week or other applicable threshold). If an employer terminates the employment of an employee or otherwise disciplines an employee because the employee refused to consent to the averaging agreement, that employer will have committed a reprisal in violation of ESA Part XVIII, s. 74.

Averaging Arrangements for Shift Exchanges

Employers may wish to have averaging arrangements in place in order to provide employees with increased flexibility in their work schedules by allowing shift exchanges, without the requirement of paying overtime as a consequence of the shift exchanges.

Example:

- Employee A works Monday through Friday 8:00 am to 4:30 pm;
- Employee B works Wednesday through Sunday 3:30 pm to 12:00 midnight;
- Employee A asks B to work his Tuesday shift in exchange for working B's Sunday shift two weeks later;
- Even though B works an additional eight hours in the first week (and A works eight hours less) neither will see an increase or reduction in their weekly pay for the weeks in which the shift exchanges took place and, specifically, no overtime will be paid for the week in which each employee worked 48 hours.

An issue that may arise in the context of an averaging agreement made for the purpose of accommodating shift exchanges is how to handle circumstances in which the employment of an employee who has been involved in a shift exchange ends before the exchange is complete. The following example illustrates the Program's policy on this matter.

Example:

The employees and the employer have agreed in writing and have received the Director's approval to average hours of work over a period of four weeks for purposes of calculating overtime pay. Employee A agrees to work a shift for Employee B in week one of the averaging period. In exchange, Employee B agrees to work a shift for Employee A in week two of the averaging period; however, Employee B's employment is terminated before she can complete the shift exchange. The employees are paid their regular wages in respect of week one and week two.

The employer owes Employee A straight time for the shift she worked in week one for Employee B and in respect of which Employee A has not been compensated.

Employee B owes the employer the regular wages that she was paid for work that she did not perform in week one. Employee B is considered to have received an advance and therefore, the employer may make a reconciliation for this amount. Such a reconciliation is not considered to be a set-off or deduction as defined in ESA Part V, s. 13.

Condition 2: Employer received an approval that applies to employee or a class of employees

The second condition that must be met before an employer can average an employee's hours for overtime pay purposes is the employer must be in receipt of an approval by the Director of Employment Standards under s. 22.1 that applies to the employee or to a class of employees that includes the employee.

ESA Part VIII, s. 22.1 describes how employers apply for an averaging approval.

This section must be read in conjunction with s. 22.1(8), which states:

22.1(8) An approval applies to the employee or class of employees specified in the approval, and applies to every employee in a specified class whether or not the employee was employed by the employer at the time the approval was issued.

Accordingly, where an employer already has an approval from the Director of Employment Standards, the employer may begin averaging an employee's hours of work for overtime pay purposes immediately after the employee provides their written agreement to do so if that employee falls within the class of employees set out in the approval immediately (assuming that all of the requirements for a valid agreement are met) the employer will not be required to apply for another approval. For example, an employer will be allowed to average an employee's hours without having to obtain another approval where the employee who provides the valid written agreement:

- Was not an employee of the employer at the time the approval was issued;
- Was an employee of the employer at the time the approval was issued but was working in a position the approval does not apply to; or
- Was an employee in the class of employees the approval applies to at the time the approval was issued, but at that time had not yet agreed to average hours for overtime pay purposes?

See ESA Part VIII, s. 22.1 for further discussion.

This section must also be read in conjunction with s. 22(2.1), which allows employers to average an employee's hours for the purposes of overtime pay entitlements (but for periods of not more than two weeks) if the employer does not receive either an approval or a refusal from the Director within 30 days of the application being served and certain other conditions are met.

Condition 3: Averaging period does not exceed the lesser of number of weeks specified in the agreement and number of weeks specified in approval

This is the third condition that must be met before an employer is allowed to average an employee's hours of work for overtime pay entitlement purposes. It provides that averaging will be lawful only if the averaging period does not exceed the number of weeks specified in the employee's agreement or the number of weeks specified in the Director's approval, whichever is less.

For example, an employee agreed to average their hours of work over a period of eight weeks, but the Director issued an approval to average only over a period of four weeks. The employer can average the employee's hours only over a period of four weeks.

Conversely, an approval was issued for an averaging period of four weeks that applies to a particular class of employees. Some employees in that class agreed to an averaging period of four weeks. The employer is permitted to average those employees' hours over a period of four weeks. One employee in that class agreed to an averaging period of only two weeks. Pursuant to s. 22(2)(c), the employer is permitted to average that employee's hours only over a period of two weeks.

Same, Pending Approval – s. 22(2.1)

22(2.1) Despite subsection (2), an employee's hours of work may be averaged for the purpose of determining the employee's entitlement, if any, to overtime pay even though the employer has not received the approval described in clause (2)(b), if,

(a) the employee has made an agreement described in clause (2)(a) with the employer;

(b) the employer has served on the Director an application for an approval under section 22.1;

(c) the application is for an approval that applies to the employee or to a class of employees that includes the employee;

(d) 30 days have passed since the application was served on the Director;

(e) the employer has not received a notice that the application has been refused;

(f) the employer's most recent previous application, if any, for an approval under section 22.1 was not refused;

(g) the most recent approval, if any, received by the employer under section 22.1 was not revoked; and

(h) the employee's hours of work, pending the approval, are averaged over separate, non-overlapping, contiguous periods of not more than two consecutive weeks.

This section provides an exception to the requirement in s. 22(2) that the employer have received an averaging approval from the Director before the employer is permitted to average the employee's hours for the purposes of determining overtime pay entitlements. It permits an employer to begin averaging an employee's hours - but only over periods of two weeks - if the Director has not issued either an approval or a notice of refusal of the application within 30 days of the date the application was served and certain other conditions are met.

This section permits averaging of hours pending the Director issuing an approval or a notice of refusal if certain conditions are met. It does not deem an approval to have been granted. If the application is ultimately rejected, the averaging must cease when the notice is received.

If the application is ultimately approved, s. 22(2) will dictate the conditions under which averaging may occur from that point forward.

The employer will be permitted to average an employee's hours of work for overtime pay entitlement purposes pending the disposal of the application - but only over periods of two weeks - only if all eight conditions set out in s. 22(2.1) are met. If any of the eight conditions are not met, the employer will not be permitted to average the employee's hours pending the disposal of the application.

Each of the eight conditions is discussed below.

Employee made an agreement described in s. 22(2)(a) with employer

The first condition is the employee must have made an agreement described in s. 22(2)(a) with the employer to average hours of work over periods of a specified number of weeks. See the discussion of s. 22(2)(a) below.

Employer served on the Director an application for an approval under s. 22.1

The second condition is that the employer must have served the application for an averaging approval on the Director of Employment Standards under s ESA Part VIII, s. 22.1. See in particular the discussion of the issue of when an application is considered to be served if the approval application is not properly completed.

Application is for an approval that applies to the employee or to a class of employees

The third condition is the application for an averaging approval that has been served on the Director must apply to the individual employee at issue, or to a class of employees that includes the employee.

30 days have passed since application was served on the Director

The fourth condition is at least 30 days must have passed since the employer served the Director with the averaging approval application. Day means a calendar day.

Note that ss. 22.1(4) and (5) contain rules regarding when service is deemed to be effective, and, accordingly, when the 30-day period begins. See the discussion at ESA Part VIII, s. 22.1.

Note also that s. 22(5.1) contains a special rule regarding when the 30-day period expires if the application is filed before March 1, 2005.

Employer has not received a notice that the application has been refused

The fifth condition is the employer not have received a notice from the Director that the application has been refused. The notice could be in writing (by e-mail, facsimile transmission, courier, or mail).

Employer's most recent previous application, if any, for an approval under s. 22.1 was not refused

The sixth condition is the employer's most recent previous averaging application cannot have been refused. If the employer submitted an earlier application that was refused for any reason, and that application was the most recent application, the employer will not be permitted to rely on s. 22(2.1), and the employer will not be allowed to begin averaging the hours of the employees who are the subject of the current application until the current application is approved. This is so whether or not the most recent previous application that was refused applied to the same employees who are the subject of the current application.

Most recent approval received by employer under s. 22.1 was not revoked

The seventh condition is the most recent approval (if any) that was granted by the Director must not have been revoked. Pursuant to s. 22.1(14), the Director can revoke an approval.

Employee's hours of work in a work week are averaged over periods of not more than two weeks

The eighth condition sets an upper limit on the number of weeks in the periods over which an employee's hours can be averaged pending the disposal of the application. It provides that the maximum period over which an employee's hour of work can be averaged pending the disposal of the application is two weeks. This limit applies even if the employee agreed to average hours over periods longer than two weeks and/or the application asks for an approval to average hours over periods longer than two weeks.

Transition: Certain Agreements – s. 22(2.2)

22(2.2) For the purposes of this section, each of the following agreements shall be treated as if it were an agreement described in clause (2)(a):

1. An agreement to average hours of work made under a predecessor to this Act.

2. An agreement to average hours of work made under this section as it read on February 28, 2005.

3. An agreement to average hours of work that complies with the conditions prescribed by the regulations made under paragraph 7 of subsection 141(1) as it read on February 28, 2005.

Section 22(2.2) is a transitional provision. It establishes how agreements to average hours that were entered into under the provisions of the former Employment Standards Act or under the ESA 2000 before the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004, SO 2004, c 21 came into force that have not expired are to be treated.

With respect to agreements made under the ESA 2000, paragraph 2 refers to agreements made under s. 22 as it read on February 28, 2005, i.e., agreements to average over periods of up to four weeks, while paragraph 3 refers to agreements made under O Reg 285/01, s. 30, i.e., agreements to average over period of more than four weeks. The latter required the approval of the Director. In the case of all three types of averaging agreements, this provision states that such agreements are to be treated as if they were agreements under s. 22(2)(a).

On February 28, 2005 the relevant provisions read as follows:

Section 22(2) of the ESA 2000:

Subject to the regulations, if the employee and the employer agree to do so, the employee's hours of work may be averaged over separate, non-overlapping, contiguous periods of not more than four consecutive weeks each, for the purpose of determining the employee's entitlement, if any, to overtime pay.

Section 30 of O Reg 285/01:

An employer and an employee may agree to average hours of work over a period of more than four weeks for the purpose of determining the employee's entitlement to overtime pay under section 22 of the Act if the Director approves the agreement.

By virtue of s. 22(2.2), agreements that were entered into under s. 22(2) or O Reg 285/01, s. 30 as they read on February 28, 2005 under the former Employment Standards Act that are still valid are treated as if they are agreements made under the current s. 22(2)(a) (new agreements), thereby avoiding the need for employers to enter into another agreement with employees if they wish to average hours after February 28, 2005. However, employers who have old agreements with employees must seek approval from the Director before the employer can average employees' hours of work. This is so even if the Director had approved the agreement pursuant to O Reg 285/01, s. 30 - see s. 22.1(18), which specifically provides that any approval granted by the Director under the regulation ceases to have effect on March 1, 2005.

Term of Agreement – s. 22(3)

22(3) An averaging agreement is not valid unless it provides for an expiry date and, if it involves an employee who is not represented by a trade union, the expiry date shall not be more than two years after the day the agreement takes effect.

This provision requires averaging agreements to include an expiry date. In the non-unionized context the expiry date cannot be later than two years from the date the averaging agreement takes effect. In the unionized context the parties must negotiate the expiry date. The purpose of this provision is to preclude perpetual averaging agreements. This is particularly important given that s. 22(6) provides that averaging agreements may not be revoked before they expire, unless the parties agree otherwise in writing.

Agreement May Be Renewed – s. 22(4)

22(4) Nothing in subsection (3) prevents an employer and employee from agreeing to renew or replace an averaging agreement.

This provision states that employers and employees may, before or upon the expiry of an averaging agreement, agree, in writing, to extend, to renew or replace the agreement.

Existing Agreements – s. 22(5)

22(5) An averaging agreement made before this Act comes into force that was approved by the Director under the Employment Standards Act is valid for the purposes of subsection (2) until,

(a) one year after the day this section comes into force; or

(b) if the employee is represented by a trade union and a collective agreement applies to the employee,

- (i) the day a subsequent collective agreement that applies to the employee comes into operation, or
- (ii) if no subsequent collective agreement comes into operation within one year after the existing agreement expires, at the end of that year.

This provision stipulates that averaging agreements made under the former Employment Standards Act and approved by the Director of Employment Standards, before the ESA 2000 came into force, will remain in force, for specified periods of time.

The purpose of this provision was to provide workplace parties operating under existing averaging agreements that predated the ESA 2000 with a period of stability before having to negotiate new averaging agreements.

This section was not repealed when amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004, came into effect on March 1, 2005, because it is possible that some agreements that predate the ESA 2000 are still in effect.

In the non-unionized workplace, an averaging agreement approved by the Director under the former Act remained in force until September 4, 2002, which was one year after the day s. 22 of the ESA 2000 came into force.

Where a collective agreement applies, valid pre-existing averaging agreements will remain valid until a subsequent collective agreement comes into operation. If a subsequent collective agreement has not come into operation one year after the existing collective agreement expires, the agreement will expire at the end of that year. For example, if a collective agreement that was in force on September 4, 2001, expired January 31, 2002, and no subsequent collective agreement came into force on or before January 31, 2003, the averaging agreement would have ceased to be valid on January 31, 2003.

Transition: Application for Approval Before Commencement – s. 22(5.1)

22(5.1) If the employer applies for an approval under section 22.1 before March 1, 2005, the 30-day period referred to in clause (2.1) (d) shall be deemed to end on the later of,

(a) the last day of the 30-day period; and

(b) March 1, 2005

This is a transitional provision. Pursuant to s. 22.1(19), employers can apply for approval of averaging agreements on or after December 9, 2004, the day the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 received Royal Assent, even though the amendments that require approvals for averaging agreements do not come into force until March 1, 2005. Applications are permitted prior to March 1, 2005 in order to facilitate a seamless transition between the old rules and the new rules.

Section 22(2.1) permits, in certain circumstances, an employer to average an employee's hours of work for the purposes of determining any overtime pay entitlements (but only over a maximum period of two weeks) if the employer has not received either an approval or a notice of refusal of an averaging application within 30 days of the date the application was served. By virtue of s. 22(5.1), where an employer applies for an averaging approval prior to March 1, 2005, the 30-day wait period will expire on March 1, 2005 at the earliest.

For example, an employee agreed in writing to average hours of work over two-week periods for a period of two years back in July 2003. The employer served an application for an averaging approval on the Director on January 15, 2005. As of March 1, 2005, the Director had not issued either an approval or a notice of refusal of the application. This employer:

- Was permitted to average the employee's hours of work over two-week periods until February 28, 2005 pursuant to the provisions that were in force until that date; and
- Is permitted to average the employee's hours of work over two-week periods as of March 1, 2005 pursuant to the pending approval rules of s. 22(2.1), assuming all of the conditions in s. 22(2.1) are met by the employer.

Agreement Irrevocable – s. 22(6)

22(6) No averaging agreement referred to in this section may be revoked before it expires unless the employer and the employee agree to revoke it.

The ESA 2000 introduced this provision to ensure that once an averaging agreement is made, it cannot be unilaterally cancelled or revoked by the employer, the employee or their agents. Averaging agreements can only be revoked by the parties if the employer and the employee agree to do so in writing, in accordance with ESA Part 1, s. 1(3). The purpose of this provision is to provide the parties with a degree of certainty.

Note, however, that the Director has the authority to revoke an approval - see ESA Part VIII, s. 22.1.

Time Off in Lieu – s. 22(7)

22(7) The employee may be compensated for overtime hours by receiving one and one-half hours of paid time off work for each hour of overtime worked instead of overtime pay if,

(a) the employee and the employer agree to do so; and

(b) the paid time off work is taken within three months of the work week in which the overtime was earned or, with the employee's agreement, within 12 months of that work week.

The provision permits an employer and an employee to agree, in writing, that the employee be compensated for some or all overtime hours by receiving one and one-half hours of paid time off work for each hour worked in excess of 44 (or other applicable threshold) instead of receiving overtime pay if the following criteria are met:

3. The employee and the employer agree, in writing to compensate the employee with paid time off at a rate of 1.5 hours off work for every hour of overtime worked, rather than pay the employee overtime pay; and
4. The paid time off work is taken within three months of the work week in which the overtime was earned or, with the employee's written agreement within 12 months of that work week.

Please see ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and (3.1) for a more detailed discussion.

Because the subsection states that the employee is to be compensated for overtime hours with one and one-half hours of paid time off work for each hour of overtime worked instead of overtime pay, it is the Program's position that the employee is entitled to the time off at the rate they are currently earning as opposed to the rate they were earning when the overtime was worked. Note however, that if employment ends before the time off can be taken, the employer will be required to pay overtime pay based on the rate they were earning when the overtime was worked. See the discussion in s. 22(8) below.

Where Employment Ends – s. 22(8)

22(8) If the employment of an employee ends before the paid time off is taken under s. 22(7), the employer shall pay the employee overtime pay for the overtime hours that were worked in accordance with ESA Part V, s. 11(5).

This provision stipulates that if the employee's employment ends before the lieu time earned pursuant to s. 22(7) is taken, the employee's lieu time entitlement automatically converts into an entitlement to overtime pay. Pursuant to s. 11(5), the overtime pay is payable to the employee by the later of seven days after the termination of the employee's employment or on what would have been the employee's next pay day. Note that because this provision requires that the employer pay the employee overtime pay for the overtime hours that were worked, it is the Program's position that the overtime pay the employee is entitled to receive is based on the rate the employee was earning when the overtime was worked as opposed to the rate they were earning when the termination occurred.

Changing Work – s. 22(9)

22(9) If an employee who performs work of a particular kind or character is exempted from the application of this section by the regulations or the regulations prescribe an overtime threshold of other than 44 hours for an employee who performs such work, and the duties of an employee's position require them to perform both that work and work of another kind or character, this Part shall apply to the employee in respect of all work performed by them in a work week unless the time spent by the employee performing that other work constitutes less than half the time that the employee spent fulfilling the duties of their position in that work week.

The purpose of this provision is twofold. This provision ensures that:

3. Employees who perform work that is exempt from the overtime provisions and work that is not exempt are entitled to overtime pay for all hours worked in excess of 44 per week, provided that at least 50% of their work week is spent performing non-exempt work; and
4. Employees who perform work to which the 44-hour overtime threshold applies and work to which a higher overtime threshold attaches are entitled to overtime pay for all hours worked in excess of 44 per week provided that at least 50% of their work week is spent performing work that attracts the 44-hour threshold.

While s. 22(9) does not address the situation of employees who perform work for which the regulations prescribe differing overtime thresholds, it is Program policy to apply the principle behind that subsection by analogy to their situation. Thus, such employees are considered by the Program to be entitled to overtime pay for all hours worked in excess of the lower threshold provided that at least 50% of their work week is spent performing work that attracts the lower threshold. For example, employees who perform work that attracts overtime after 50 or 60 hours (local cartage and highway transport respectively) as per O Reg 285/01, ss. 17 and 18 would be entitled to overtime for all hours in excess of 50 in a week if at least 50% of the hours worked in the week were in local cartage.

ESA Part VIII Section 22.1 - Averaging: Application for Approval

Averaging: Application for Approval – s. 22.1(1)

22.1(1) An employer may apply to the Director for an approval permitting the employer to average an employee's hours of work for the purpose of determining the employee's entitlement, if any, to overtime pay.

Under s. 22(2) of the Employment Standards Act, 2000, an employer may average an employee's hours of work for the purpose of determining the employee's overtime pay entitlement if certain conditions are met. One of those conditions is that the employer be in receipt of an approval under s. 22.1 that applies to the employee or to a class of employees that includes the employee.

Sections 22.1(1) to (19) describe the process for applying for an averaging approval.

Form – s. 22.1(2)

22.1(2) The application shall be in a form provided by the Director.

This section provides that an application for an averaging approval must be made in a form provided by the Director of Employment Standards.

The form, Hours of Work and Averaging Hours", is available on the Ministry of Labour's website.

Service of Application – s. 22.1(3)

22.1(3) The application shall be served on the Director,

(a) by being delivered to the Director's office on a day and at a time when it is open;

(b) by being mailed to the Director's office using a method of mail delivery that allows delivery to be verified; or

(c) by being sent to the Director's office by electronic transmission or by telephonic transmission of a facsimile.

This section sets out three different methods an employer may use to serve an averaging application form on the Director of Employment Standards. The three ways are:

1. By delivery to the Director's office when it is open.

For example, personal delivery by the employer or its representative or agent, or by private courier The Director's office will provide a receipt or other acknowledgement to verify that the application has been received.

2. By mail to the Director's office using a method of mail delivery that allows for the delivery to be verified.

Three Canada Post services falls within the meaning of verifiable mail - Registered Mail, Xpresspost and Priority Courier. Xpresspost and Priority Courier comply with the requirement of s. 22.1(3)(b) only if the signature upon delivery option is selected.

3. By electronic transmission or facsimile transmission.

To serve the application by electronic transmission, employers must complete the application on the Ministry of Labour's website and submit it electronically.

The application form provides the Director's address and facsimile number.

This section must be read in conjunction with s. 22.1(4), which sets out when service is deemed to be effective.

When Service Effective - ss. 22.1(4), (5)

22.1(4) Service under subsection (3) shall be deemed to be effected,

(a) in the case of service under clause (3)(a), on the day shown on a receipt or acknowledgment provided to the employer by the Director or his or her representative;

(b) in the case of service under clause (3)(b), on the day shown in the verification;

(c) in the case of service under clause (3)(c), on the day on which the electronic or telephonic transmission is made, subject to subsection (5).

(5) Service shall be deemed to be effected on the next day on which the Director's office is not closed, if the electronic or telephonic transmission is made,

(a) on a day on which the Director's office is closed; or

(b) after 5 p.m. on any day.

These sections set out when the service of the application is considered to have been effected. This is important for the purposes of the pending approval provisions in s. 22(2.1) which permit employers to begin averaging an employee's hours for overtime pay purposes (if certain conditions are met and even then only over a period of two weeks) if the application has been neither approved nor rejected within 30 days of the effective service date.

Under ss. 22.1(4) and (5), service is considered to be effected:

Delivery to the Director's Office

If the employer served the application by delivering it to the Director's office on a day and at a time when it is open as per s. 22.1(3)(a), service is deemed to be effective on the day indicated on the receipt or acknowledgement provided by the Director or their representative.

Mailing to the Director's Office

If the employer served the application by mailing it to the Director's officer using a method of mail delivery that allows the delivery to be verified as per s. 22.1(3)(b), service is deemed to be effective on the day shown in the verification.

Electronic Transmission

If the employer served the application by sending it to the Director's office by electronic transmission via the online filing system or by fax as per s. 22.1(3)(c), service is deemed to be effective on the day on which the electronic transmission or fax transmission is made. However, if the electronic transmission or fax transmission is made on a day that the Director's office is closed or after 5 p.m. on any day, the service is deemed to be effected on the next day that the office is open. Generally, the Director's office is closed on Saturdays, Sundays, the nine public holidays under the ESA 2000, as well as Easter Monday, the August Civic Holiday, and Remembrance Day. See the definition of public holidays in ESA Part I, s. 1.

Criteria – ss. 22.1(6), (7)

22.1(6) The Director may issue an approval to the employer if the Director is of the view that it would be appropriate to do so.

(7) In deciding whether it is appropriate to issue an approval to the employer, the Director may take into consideration any factors that he or she considers relevant, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, he or she may consider,

(a) any current or past contraventions of this Act or the regulations on the part of the employer;

(b) the health and safety of employees; and

(c) any prescribed factors.

Section 22.1(6) provides that the Director may issue an approval for an averaging application if they iare of the view that it would be appropriate to do so. Section 22.1(7) sets out some criteria that the Director may consider when deciding whether to issue an approval.

Section 22.1(7) allows to Director to consider any factor they consider relevant, and specifically lists three factors that may be taken into consideration:

1. Current or past contraventions of the ESA 2000 or its regulations on the part of the employer, including related employers under ESA Part III, s. 4.
    - This includes situations where the Director, in the course of considering an application, discovers that the employer was found to be in contravention of the ESA 2000.
    - The number of contraventions, the extent of the contraventions (e.g. the number of employees affected by the contraventions), the monetary amounts involved, and the Part of the ESA 2000 to which the contraventions relate are all be factors that may be taken into consideration.
2. The health and safety of employees.
    - This factor could include whether the health and safety of employees covered by the application may be put at risk, as well the past health and safety record of the employer.
3. Any prescribed factors.
    - At the time of writing, there were no other prescribed factors.

In addition to the factors listed above, the Director may consider any factor they consider relevant. Some factors that may be considered when the Director is asked to approve an averaging application under s. 22.1 include:

1. Whether information provided by the employer during the application process was false, inaccurate or misleading.
    - Any significant problem of this nature, unless quickly remedied, would most likely lead to a refusal.
2. Whether the employer co-operated with the Ministry's request for further information during the approval process, e.g. if the employer fails to respond to a request to provide work schedules.
    - A lack of co-operation, unless quickly remedied, would most likely lead to a refusal.
3. Whether the employer has also filed an application for approval for excess weekly hours.
    - If so, and the employer provided proposed schedules, does it appear that an employee will work a large number of excess hours without ever receiving overtime pay? If so, this will militate against the granting of an approval.
4. Whether there are any benefits to employees that accompany the proposed work schedule and hours of work scheme. For example:
    - Is there a lower threshold for overtime pay than what is required in the ESA 2000?
    - Do employees get paid for a set number of hours per week regardless of the number of hours that they work? For example, employees work 36 hours, but get paid for 40 hours of work?

- Does the proposed scheme provide for a more flexible work arrangement for employees? For example: provides employees with increased flexibility in their work schedules to allow for shift exchanges; employees have a four week work schedule that provides for longer hours in the first two weeks of the work cycle (e.g., 96 hours) and fewer hours in the second two weeks of the cycle (e.g., 72 hours)?
- Do employees receive extra compensation for working on the weekends or for working unscheduled hours?
    - Positive answers to any of the above questions may operate in favour of granting an approval.

5. The employer's reason for requesting overtime averaging is limited to a brief time frame.
    - This may operate in favour of granting an approval.

Please refer to Delegation of Powers for general principles of how the Director exercises their discretion under the ESA 2000.

Employees to Whom Approval Applies – ss. 22.1(8), (9)

22.1(8) An approval applies to the employee or class of employees specified in the approval, and applies to every employee in a specified class whether or not the employee was employed by the employer at the time the approval was issued.

(9) For greater certainty, all the employees of the employer may constitute a specified class.

These sections specify to which employees an approval applies. The approval applies to:

- If approval was given with respect to a particular employee (or employees), it applies to the employee(s) specified in the approval.
- If approval was given with respect to a specified class of employees, it applies to every employee in that class.

Section 22.1(9) provides that all of the employer's employees can be a specified class. Where approval is given to a specified class, the approval will apply to an employee in that class even if the employee was not an employee in that class when the approval was given. This means that where an employer already has an approval for a specified class of employees, it is not required to seek another approval if a new employee subsequently begins working in that class, assuming that all of the requirements for a valid averaging agreement are met.

Section 22.1(8) means that an employer will be allowed to average an employee's hours for the purposes of determining overtime pay entitlements without having to obtain another approval where, for example, the employee who provides the written agreement:

- Was not an employee of the employer at the time the approval was issued;
- Was an employee of the employer at the time the approval was issued but was working in a position the approval does not apply to; or
- Was an employee in the class of employees the approval applies to at the time the approval was issued, but at that time had not yet agreed to have their hours of work averaged.

Approval to Be Posted – ss. 22.1(10), (11)

22.1(10) An employer to whom an approval is issued shall post the approval or a copy of the approval in at least one conspicuous place in every workplace of the employer where the employee or the class of employees in respect of whom the approval applies works, so that it is likely to come to the attention of the employee or class of employees.

(11) The employer shall keep each approval or copy posted as set out in subsection (10) until the approval expires or is revoked, and shall then remove it.

This section requires employers who receive an approval to post the approval or a copy of the approval in the workplace. It must be posted in a place or places such that it is likely to come to the attention of the employee(s) named in the application. If the application is with respect to a class of employees, a copy of it must be posted in a place or places that that all of the employees in the class are likely to see it.

An issue arises as to how this requirement applies where the approval is issued to an employer whose employees are assigned to work in a client's workplace, for example, where the employer is a temporary help agency, security company, food service provider, or cleaning company. In this type of situation, the employer is required by s. 22.1(10) only to ensure that the approval is posted in its own workplace. If the employer has several branches where the employees to whom the approval applies attend, then the approval issued to the employer must be copied and posted in each branch. The employer is not required to post a copy of the approval at its clients' work sites.

Section 22.1(11) requires the employer to keep the approval posted until the day it expires or is revoked. This section further requires the employer to remove the approval upon the expiry or revocation of the approval.

Expiry – s. 22.1(12)

22.1(12) An approval under this section expires on the date on which the averaging agreement between the employer and the employee expires, or on the earlier date that the Director specifies in the approval.

This section establishes an expiry date for an averaging approval.

Generally, an approval will expire on the date specified in the agreement itself. Section 22(3) requires that agreements contain an expiry date, and sets limits on the duration of the agreement - see ESA part VIII, s. 22. Where the Director has specified an expiry date in the approval that is earlier than the expiry date in the agreement, the approval will expire on the earlier date. In this latter case, an employer who wishes to apply for another approval when the expiry date of the approval is approaching may not be required to obtain another agreement from the employee(s), since the agreement is still in effect.

Conditions – s. 22.1(13)

22.1(13) The Director may impose conditions on an approval.

This section authorizes the Director to impose conditions on an approval. See the discussion of s. 22.1(15) below, for the criteria the Director may consider when deciding whether to impose conditions.

Revocation - s. 22.1 (14)

22.1(14) The Director may revoke an approval on giving the employer such notice as the Director considers reasonable in the circumstances.

This section authorizes the Director to revoke an approval that was granted to an employer, upon giving the employer an amount of notice the Director considers to be reasonable in the circumstances. See the discussion of s. 22.1(15) below, for the criteria the Director may consider when deciding whether to revoke an approval.

Criteria – s. 22.1(15)

22.1(15) In deciding whether to impose conditions on or to revoke an approval, the Director may take into consideration any factors that he or she considers relevant, including but not limited to any factor that the Director could consider under subsection (7).

Section 22.1(15) provides that the Director may consider any factor they consider relevant when deciding whether to impose conditions on an approval or whether to revoke an approval. The three factors that are specifically listed in s. 22.1(7) as factors the Director can consider when determining whether to grant an approval are among those that may be taken into account when deciding whether to impose conditions on an approval or revoke an approval. See the discussion of s. 22.1(7) above.

Another factor that the Director may, depending on the circumstances, consider relevant when deciding whether to revoke an approval is if, after the approval is issued, an employment standards officer finds that some of the employees to whom the approval applies did not have valid agreements to average hours, either because, for example, they were coerced into signing the agreement, the agreements were ambiguous, or they did not sign agreements at all.

Where there is no valid averaging agreement between the employer and a particular employee, it would not be lawful for the employer to average that employee's hours of work, even if the employer has an approval that applies to a class that includes that employee. However, the fact that some of the employees who fall into the class do not have valid averaging agreements may cause the Director to decide to revoke the approval, thereby also making it unlawful for the employer to average the hours of employees who were in the class who do have valid averaging agreements.

Further Applications - s. 22.1(16)

22.1(16) For greater certainty, nothing in this section prevents an employer from applying for an approval after an earlier approval expires or is revoked or after an application is refused.

This provision clarifies that nothing in s. 22.1 prevents an employer from re-applying for an approval after:

- An earlier approval expires;
- An earlier approval was revoked; or
- An earlier application was refused.

Refusal to Approve - s. 22.1(17)

22.1(17) If the Director decides that it is inappropriate to issue an approval to the employer, the Director shall give notice to the employer that the application for approval has been refused.

This section requires the Director to provide notice to the employer if an application for approval has been refused. If notice of a refusal is given, employers will no longer - as of the date the notice is received - be allowed to rely on the pending approval provision in s. 22(2.1) to average an employee's hours, since one of the conditions that must be satisfied in order to use s. 22(2.1)(e) - "the employer has not received a notice that the application has been refused" - will no longer be met.

Termination of Old Approvals - s. 22.1(18)

22.1(18) Any approval of an averaging agreement granted by the Director under a regulation made under paragraph 7 of subsection 141(1) of this Act, as that paragraph read on February 28, 2005, ceases to have effect on March 1, 2005.

This section provides that certain approvals granted before March 1, 2005 expire on March 1, 2005, which is the date the amendments made by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 that require employers to obtain approval from the Director to engage in any averaging came into force.

The approvals that expire are those that were granted pursuant to O Reg 285/01, s. 30, which was subsequently revoked. Prior to its revocation, O Reg 285/01, s. 30 allowed an employer and employee to agree to average hours of work over a period of more than four weeks for the purpose of determining the employee's entitlement to overtime pay if the Director approved the agreement.

These approvals ceased to have effect on March 1, 2005 even though the approval may have contained an expiry date later than March 1, 2005.

An employer that had an approval under the revoked O Reg 285/01, s. 30 is required to apply for an approval under s. 22.1 in order to average its employees' hours on and after March 1, 2005. Applications may be made on or after December 9, 2004, the day that the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 received Royal Assent – see s. 22.1(19).

Time for Applications – s. 22.1(19)

22.1(19) An application under subsection (1) may be made on or after on or after the day the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 receives Royal Assent.

This section provides that applications for approval to average hours under s. 22.1 can be made on or after December 9, 2004, the day that the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 received Royal Assent. Although any approval that is issued before March 1, 2005 can take effect no earlier than March 1, 2005, as that is the date the amendments to the ESA 2000 by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004 came into force, this provision was intended to facilitate a seamless transition between the old rules and the new rules.

ESA Part VIII Section 22.2 - Delegation by Director

Delegation by Director - s. 22.2(1)

22.2(1) The Director may authorize an individual employed in the Ministry to exercise a power or to perform a duty conferred on the Director under section 22.1, either orally or in writing.

Section 22.2(1) sets out the authority of the Director of Employment Standards to delegate his or her powers under s. 22.1. The delegation may be made orally or in writing to anyone employed in the Ministry of Labour. In contrast, the Director's general delegation power in s. 88(3) of the Employment Standards Act, 2000 extends only to employment standards officers.

Residual Powers - s. 22.2(2)

22.2(2) The Director may exercise a power conferred on the Director under section 22.1 even if he or she has delegated it to a person under subsection (1).

Section 22.2(2) preserves the Director's ability to exercise powers under s. 22.1 even if they have been delegated under subsection (1).

Duty re Policies - s. 22.2(3)

22.2(3) An individual authorized by the Director under subsection (1) shall follow any policies established by the Director under subsection 88(2).

Section 22.2(3) provides that an individual to whom the Director has delegated his or her s. 22.1 powers must follow any policies established by the Director under s. 88(2) respecting the interpretation, administration and enforcement of the Act.

ESA Part IX – Minimum Wage

The minimum wage establishes a wage floor to prevent employers from taking unfair advantage of employees with little or no bargaining power.

Historically, the minimum wage was adjusted periodically on an ad hoc basis to reflect declining purchasing power of low wage earners, loss of their position relative to wage gains of workers generally, and changing minimum wage rates in other jurisdictions. In considering adjustments to the minimum wage, a number of other factors were considered to be relevant, including the relationship between minimum wage income and income from social assistance, and an industry's ability to compete internationally and to create employment.

The Stronger Workplaces for a Stronger Economy Act, 2014, SO 2014, c10 amended the ESA 2000 to directly tie changes in the minimum wage rates to increases in inflation through a formula based on changes in the Consumer Price Index. The Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22, subsequently amended the minimum wage provisions and increased minimum wage rates to set amounts on January 1, 2018 and again on January 1, 2019. Effective October 1, 2019, the minimum wage rates in effect immediately before October 1 resumed being adjusted annually by the formula based on changes in the Consumer Price Index. The Build Ontario Act (Budget Measures), 2021, SO 2021, c. 40 (BOABM) further amended the minimum wage provisions by increasing the minimum wage rates for classes of employees described in paragraph 1 of ss. 23.1(1) to set amounts on January 1, 2022. Effective October 1, 2022, the minimum wage rates in effect immediately before October 1 are to resume being adjusted annually by the formula based on changes in the Consumer Price Index.

O. Reg. 285/01 was also amended effective January 1, 2022 to increase the minimum wage rate applying to the “wilderness guides” class of employees. Effective October 1, 2022, the rate in effect immediately before October 1 will resume being adjusted annually by the formula based on changes in the Consumer Price Index.

The BOABM also eliminated a class of employees to whom a special minimum wage rate previously applied: employees who, as a regular part of their employment, serve liquor directly to customers, guests, members or patrons in premises for which a licence or permit has been issued under the Liquor Licence Act and who regularly receive tips or other gratuities as a part of their work. As of January 1, 2022, employees who previously fell into this "liquor server" category are entitled to receive the "general" minimum wage instead of a rate specific to the "liquor server" class of employees.

ESA Part IX Section 23 – Minimum Wage

Minimum Wage – s. 23(1)

23(1) An employer shall pay employees at least the minimum wage.

This provision requires that an employer pay employees at least the minimum wage. See the discussion under s. 23.1 "Determination of minimum wage" for information about the minimum wage rates.

Room or Board – s. 23(2)

23(2) If an employer provides room or board to an employee, the prescribed amount with respect to room or board shall be deemed to have been paid by the employer to the employee as wages.

This provision deems prescribed amounts with respect to room or board to be wages paid to the employee. The prescribed amounts are set out in the following regulations:

- General – O Reg 285/01, s 5(1);
- Domestic workers – O Reg 285/01, s. 19(2);
- Fruit, vegetable and tobacco harvesters – O Reg 285/01, s. 25(5).

Note that the prescribed amounts cannot be deemed to be wages unless the room/accommodation satisfies criteria set out in the regulation and the employee has received the meals or occupied the room. For a detailed discussion of these requirements, see O Reg 285/01.

Determining Compliance – s. 23(3)

23(3) Compliance with this Part shall be determined on a pay period basis.

This provision simply states that the assessment as to whether the minimum wage requirements have been met shall be conducted on a pay period basis. (Contrast this to the overtime provisions, where the threshold to determine whether overtime pay is owing is determined with reference to the work week – see ESA Part VIII, s. 22(1)). Section 23(4) elaborates on this by providing a formula to be used in the case of employees whose minimum wage rate is expressed as an hourly rate.)

Hourly Rate – s. 23(4)

23(4) Without restricting the generality of subsection (3), if the minimum wage applicable with respect to an employee is expressed as an hourly rate, the employer shall not be considered to have complied with this Part unless,

(a) when the amount of regular wages paid to the employee in the pay period is divided by the number of hours he or she worked in the pay period, other than hours for which the employee was entitled to receive overtime pay or premium pay, the quotient is at least equal to the minimum wage; and

(b) when the amount of overtime pay and premium pay paid to the employee in the pay period is divided by the number of hours worked in the pay period for which the employee was entitled to receive overtime pay or premium pay, the quotient is at least equal to one and one half times the minimum wage.

This section sets out two calculations to be used for determining whether the minimum wage requirements have been met for employees whose minimum wage is expressed as an hourly rate. The provision is not, therefore, relevant for hunting and fishing guides.

First calculation – s. 23(4)(a)

Divide the “regular wages” paid for the pay period by the number of hours worked in the pay period (other than those hours that attract overtime or premium pay). The resulting number ("the quotient") must meet or exceed the minimum wage.

Note:

- “Regular wages” excludes overtime pay, public holiday pay, premium pay, vacation pay, domestic or sexual violence leave pay, termination pay, severance pay and termination of assignment pay – see the definition of “regular wages” in ESA Part I, s. 1;
- “Overtime hours” and “premium pay” – see definitions in ESA Part I, s. 1.

Second calculation – s. 23(4)(b)

Divide the amount of overtime pay plus premium pay paid to the employee in the pay period by the number of hours worked during the pay period for which the employee is entitled to receive overtime pay or premium pay. The resulting number must meet or exceed one and one-half times the minimum wage.

Note that this second calculation is necessary only if there are overtime hours or hours that attract premium pay in the pay period.

***

An employer may pay an employee on a basis other than time (e.g., piece rate); however, the amount paid must at least be equal to the minimum wage.

Note that ESA 2000 Part IX, s. 23.0.1 states that where the employee's pay period crosses over the effective date for a minimum wage rate increase, the calculations required by s. 23(4) are to be performed as if the pay period were in fact two separate pay periods.

ESA Part IX Section 23.0.1 – Change to Minimum Wage During Pay Period

23.0.1 If the minimum wage rate applicable to an employee changes during a pay period, the calculations required by subsection 23 (4) shall be performed as if the pay period were two separate pay periods, the first consisting of the part falling before the day on which the change takes effect and the second consisting of the part falling on and after the day on which the change takes effect.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 added s. 23.0.1 to the ESA, effective January 1, 2018. The same provision previously existed in O Reg 285/01, s. 5.1.

This provision states that where the employee's pay period crosses over the effective date for a minimum wage rate increase, the calculations required by ESA Part IX, s. 23(4) are to be performed as if the pay period were in fact two separate pay periods.

The following example, based on the increase in the minimum wage on January 1, 2018 demonstrates how compliance with the minimum wage entitlement is determined when an employee's pay period straddled the date of a rate change:

The employee's pay period runs from Wednesday, December 27, 2017 to Tuesday, January 9, 2018 inclusive.

The employee's work week runs from Wednesday - Tuesday and the employee works eight hours per day Wednesday, Thursday and Monday of each work week except for the public holiday on Monday January 1, 2018.

Because the minimum wage rate applicable to the employee changed as of January 1, the pay period of December 27, 2017 to January 9, 2018 must be treated as consisting of two separate pay periods for purposes of the calculations required by ESA Part IX, s. 23(4).

The first period would be the period from December 27 to December 31 and the second period would be the period from January 1 to January 9. As there are no overtime pay or premium pay in this example, the calculations would be made as per s. 23(4)(a).

As a result, in order for the employer to show compliance with the minimum wage entitlements:

- The pay for the hours worked in the first period when divided by the hours worked in that period would have to equal at least $11.60; and
- The pay for the hours worked in the second period, when divided by the hours worked in that period would have to equal at least $14.00.
    - Hours worked –December 27 – December 31 = 16 hours @ $11.60/hour
    - Hours worked January 1 – January 9 = 24 hours @ $14.00/hour

Refer to ESA Part IX, s. 23(4) for further explanation.

ESA Part IX Section 23.1 – Determination of Minimum Wage

Determination of Minimum Wage – s. 23.1(1)

23.1(1) The minimum wage is the following:

1. On or after January 1, 2022 but before October 1, 2022, the amount set out below for the following classes of employees:

i. For employees who are students under 18 years of age, if the student's weekly hours do not exceed 28 hours or if the student is employed during a school holiday, $14.10 per hour.

ii. For the services of hunting and fishing guides, $75.00 for less than five consecutive hours in a day and $150.05 for five or more hours in a day, whether or not the hours are consecutive.

iii. For employees who are homeworkers, $16.50 per hour.

iv. For any other employees not listed in subparagraphs i to iii, $15.00 per hour.

2. From October 1, 2022 onwards, the amount determined under subsection (4).

Subsection 23.1(1) was amended by the Build Ontario Act (Budget Measures), 2021 effective January 1, 2022. The rates for employees in classes (i) to (iv) were increased. The special minimum wage class that applied to employees who serve liquor directly to customers, guests, members or patrons in premises for which a licence or permit had been issued under the Liquor Licence Act and who regularly received tips or other gratuities from their work was eliminated. As such, employees who previously fell within that class of employees are entitled to the "general" minimum wage rate as set out in subparagraph (iv) effective January 1, 2022. The rates described in section 23.1 are in effect between January 1, 2022 and September 30, 2022. Beginning on October 1, 2022, the rates will be determined in accordance with the formula based on the Consumer Price Index set out in subsection (4).

Student Minimum Wage

The special student minimum wage in s. 23.1(1)(i) applies to a student under the age of 18 years who does not work more than 28 hours per week while attending school, or who is employed while on a school holiday. A school holiday includes summer holidays and breaks during the academic year, e.g., Christmas holidays, March break, etc.

This special rate was introduced to facilitate the employment of younger persons, recognizing their competitive disadvantage in the job market relative to older students who generally have more work experience and may be perceived by employers as more productive.

The term student is not defined in the ESA 2000. The Program considers a student to be a person who is in attendance at an elementary, secondary or post-secondary institution. In order to be paid the student minimum wage, the student must be under the age of 18 years.

Under s. 21 of the Education Act, RSO 1990, c E.2, generally speaking, every child is required to attend an elementary or secondary school from the age of six until attaining the age of 18 years. There are some exceptions.

If an employee is neither attending an educational institution nor on a school holiday, the employer will be liable for the general minimum wage even if the employee is under the age of eighteen.

The onus is on the employer seeking to pay the student minimum wage rate to confirm that the youth is either in attendance at an educational institution or on a school holiday.

Note that students who are employed as homeworkers are entitled to the higher homeworkers' minimum wage in accordance with s. 23.1(1.1).

Hunting or Fishing Guide Minimum Wage

The hunting or fishing guide minimum wage rate in s. 23.1(1)(ii) must be paid by employers who employ guides for their guests (such as camp or lodge proprietors) or who carry on a guide service. This rate is not expressed as an hourly rate.

Homeworkers' Minimum Wage

The minimum wage for employees who are homeworkers in s. 23.1(1)(iii) has historically been set at 110 per cent of the general minimum wage. The rationale for a higher rate is that the homeworker has certain overhead costs (e.g., heat, electricity, taxes) in connection with their employment that other employees do not have. Effective October 1, 2015 and annually thereafter, it is expressed as a dollar amount rather than a percentage of the general minimum wage rate, although at the time of writing, the dollar amount was in fact 110% of the general minimum wage rate.

General Minimum Wage

The general minimum wage rate in s. 23.1(1)(iv) applies to any other employee not falling within one of the classes described in subparagraphs i-iii of paragraph 1 of s. 23.1(1) or section 6 of O. Reg. 285/01 (the minimum wage for wilderness guides) and who is not otherwise exempted from coverage of ESA Part IX, Minimum Wage.

Minimum Wage for Commission Salespersons and Flat Rate Mechanics

Commission Salespersons

Commission salespersons who normally make their sales away from the employer's premises (other than route salespersons) are exempt from the minimum wage provisions pursuant to O Reg 285/01, s. 2(1)(h). However, commission salespersons who normally make their sales at the employer's premises ("inside salespersons") or who are route salespersons are covered by the minimum wage provisions. Car, furniture and appliance salespersons would typically be inside salespersons. Although note that there are special rules regarding commission earnings for car salespersons – see O Reg 285/01, s. 28 for a further discussion.

Some inside salespersons may receive a draw against commissions. In such a case, if the draw equals or exceeds the minimum wage for the pay period in question, the minimum wage requirement in the ESA 2000 is met.

In some cases, salespersons may be employed under arrangements, whereby, if the draws exceed the commissions actually earned, the employer may carry forward the negative balance and make an adjustment when calculating future commissions owing. In other words, the draw (or some portion thereof) is a negative balance carried forward for the purposes of calculating the employee's earnings in subsequent pay periods. A negative balance may continue to be carried forward over any number of pay periods but the employee must be paid the equivalent of at least minimum wage in respect of all hours worked in each and every pay period, whether through draw or a combination of draw and commission earnings. Applying a negative balance with the result that the employee's gross wages amount to something less than minimum wage for all hours actually worked in any pay period would contravene the minimum wage provisions. Note however that statutory or other authorized deductions (for example) that then reduce the net pay to something less than minimum wage does not result in a contravention of the minimum wage provisions. See the discussion in ESA Part V, ss. 13(1) and (3). If the employer pays straight commission with no advance or draw, then the commission must equal at least the minimum wage for the pay period over which the commissions are calculated; if it does not, the employer must top up the employee's earnings so that they receive at least the minimum wage.

Flat Rate Mechanics

Enquiries arise occasionally on the application of the minimum wage provisions to motor vehicle mechanics and body repair persons who are paid on a flat rate or incentive system. In a flat rate shop, every job is rated as taking a certain number of hours to perform and the mechanic is paid a “book” rate, i.e., the employee's hourly rate is multiplied by the hours rated for the job rather than their actual hours. As an example, a brake reline is rated as a four-hour job, and the mechanic's book rate is $16 per hour. The mechanic will be paid $64, even if the job takes the employee less than four or more than four hours to complete. This is acceptable so long as minimum wage is paid on the basis of actual time worked and all overtime hours (hours worked in excess of 44) are compensated at a minimum of 1.5 times the mechanic's actual regular rate, which is not the same as the flat rate. For a discussion on how to calculate overtime entitlements, see ESA Part VIII, s. 22.

Generally, in a flat-rate remuneration system, it is a condition of employment that the employee rectify their own faulty work without further pay. This is not a violation of the ESA 2000, so long as the minimum wage and overtime provisions are not violated based on actual time worked. If for some reason, another mechanic makes the required changes, the payment for the entire job is credited to the second mechanic. Where this occurs as part of the employment contract, the transfer of credits is considered as part of the reconciliation of wages due and not a prohibited set-off or deduction. However, the minimum wage and overtime provisions still apply with respect to the actual hours of work the first mechanic spent on the vehicle.

It is essential in a flat rate system that the employer's records reflect both the flat rate paid and the actual hours worked: it is the actual hours worked that must be used to calculate the employee's regular rate and overtime entitlements including any time the employee spends rectifying their own faulty work.

Liquor Servers' Minimum Wage - REPEALED

Effective January 1, 2022, the Build Ontario Act (Budget Measures), 2021 eliminated a class of employees to whom a special minimum wage rate previously applied: employees who, as a regular part of their employment, serve liquor directly to customers, guests, members or patrons in premises for which a licence or permit has been issued under the Liquor Licence Act and who regularly receive tips or other gratuities from their work. As such, there is no longer a special minimum wage rate that applies to “liquor servers”. However, employees may still have a minimum wage complaint that arose when the “liquor servers’” minimum wage rate was in effect. For this reason, the Program has retained the following discussion as part of this publication.

Until January 1, 2022, a special liquor servers' minimum wage rate applied to employees who directly serve liquor to a customer, guest, member or patron in premises where a licence or permit had been issued under the Liquor Licence Act, RSO 1990, c L-19, and who regularly receive tips or other gratuities from their work. The minimum wage rate for this class of employees over the last few years is as follows:

- From January 1, 2018 to September 30, 2020: $12.20 per hour
- From October 1, 2020 to September 30, 2021: $12.45 per hour
- From October 1, 2021 to December 31, 2021: $12.55 per hour
- Beginning on January 1, 2022, this special minimum wage rate no longer applies

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 amended the subparagraph describing this class of employees to add the condition that liquor servers regularly receive tips or other gratuities in order for this rate to apply effective January 1, 2018.

Liquor service must also be a regular part of the employee's duties; an employee who only occasionally serves liquor is entitled to the general minimum wage. An earlier regulation did not include the regular service requirement, which led the Ontario Divisional Court in Re Fisherman's Wharf Ltd. and Wehrenberg to hold that an employer did not violate the Act by paying the liquor server minimum wage to a busperson who was not employed to serve liquor but who occasionally took liquor to tables to assist a waiter. However, under the wording of the current provision, a busperson in those circumstances would be entitled to be paid the general minimum wage.

Employees who serve liquor as a regular part of their employment are entitled only to the liquor servers' minimum wage for all hours worked within that employment relationship. The ESA 2000 does not require that employees be paid the general minimum wage rate when liquor is not being served and the liquor server rate when liquor is being served. Rather, the question to ask is whether an employee serves liquor directly to customers as a regular part of their employment and regularly receives tips or gratuities from their work. If so, that employee is entitled only to the liquor servers' minimum wage for all hours worked.

Note that tips or other gratuities, as defined in ESA Part I, s. 1, are not wages, as they are specifically excluded from that definition in ESA Part I, s. 1. As a consequence, they are not considered in determining whether or not an employee has been paid minimum wage. However, as noted above, whether the employee regularly receives tips or other gratuities from their work must be taken into consideration in determining whether the liquor server minimum wage rate applies to the employee. If the employee does not regularly receive tips or other gratuities from their work, the employee would be entitled to the general minimum wage rate for all hours worked.

Student Homeworker – s. 23.1(1.1)

23.1(1.1) If an employee falls within both subparagraphs 1 i and iii of subsection (1), the employer shall pay the employee not less than the minimum wage for a homeworker.

Subsection 23.1(1.1) was amended by the Build Ontario Act (Budget Measures), 2021 effective January 1, 2022 to reflect the renumbering of the subparagraphs in subsection (1) due to the elimination of the liquor servers' minimum wage rate.

Section 23.1(1.1) provides that where an employee is both a homeworker and a student under 18 years of age of age whose weekly hours do not exceed 28 hours or if the student is employed during a school holiday, the homeworkers' minimum wage rate applies to that employee.

Exception – s. 23.1(2)

23.1(2) If a class of employees that would otherwise be in the class described in subparagraph 1 iv of subsection (1) is prescribed and a minimum wage for the class is also prescribed,

(a) subsection (1) does not apply; and

(b) the minimum wage for the class is the minimum wage prescribed for it.

Subsection 23.1(2) was amended by the Build Ontario Act (Budget Measures), 2021 effective January 1, 2022 to reflect the renumbering of the subparagraphs in subsection (1) due to the elimination of the liquor servers' minimum wage rate.

This provision is an exception to s. 23.1(1). It permits a minimum wage to be prescribed by regulation for any new class of prescribed employees who would otherwise fall within the class described in subparagraph 1 v. In other words, a new class of employees may be prescribed out of the class otherwise entitled to receive the general minimum wage and a minimum wage may be prescribed for that new class.

O Reg 285/01 s. 6(1) has prescribed wilderness guides as a class of employees for the purposes of s. 23.1(2). See the discussion of that provision for additional information.

Same – s. 23.1(3)

23.1(3) If a class of employees and a minimum wage for the class are prescribed under subsection (2), subsections (4) to (6) apply as if the class and the minimum wage were a class and a minimum wage under subsection (1).

Section 23.1(3) provides that if a new class of employees is prescribed under s. 23.1(2) and a minimum wage is prescribed for that class, the minimum wage for that class will be adjusted annually in accordance with ss. 23.1(4) to (6). In other words, once a minimum wage is prescribed for any new class of employees, it will thereafter be subject to adjustments using the same formula that applies to the classes of employees set out in s. 23.1(1).

Since wilderness guides have been prescribed as a class under s. 23.1(2), this provision establishes that the wilderness guide minimum wage will be adjusted annually in accordance with ss. 23.1(4) to (6).

Annual Adjustment – s. 23.1(4)

23.1(4) On October 1 of every year starting in 2022, the minimum wage that applied to a class of employees immediately before October 1 shall be adjusted as follows:

Previous wage x (Index A/Index B) = Adjusted wage in which,

"Previous wage" is the minimum wage that applied immediately before October 1 of the year,

"Index A" is the Consumer Price Index for the previous calendar year,

"Index B" is the Consumer Price Index for the calendar year immediately preceding the calendar year mentioned in the description of "Index A", and

"adjusted wage" is the new minimum wage.

Subsection 23.1(4) was amended by the Build Ontario Act (Budget Measures), 2021 effective January 1, 2022 to establish that the minimum wage rates in effect immediately before October 1 in each year are to be adjusted on October 1 of that year starting in 2022.

The provision sets out a formula based on changes in the Consumer Price Index, which reflects inflation. Consumer Price Index is defined in s. 23.1(12) – see below.

The way in which the minimum wage rates are adjusted under s. 23.1(4) can be illustrated with the following example using the general minimum wage rate of $15 per hour that came into effect on January 1, 2022. Note that the changes in the CPI shown in the example are not the actual figures and are used merely for purposes of illustration.

- The formula is: Previous Wage x (Index A / Index B) = Adjusted Wage.
- Previous Wage: the general minimum wage that applied immediately before October 1, 2022, was $15 an hour
- Index A: the CPI for the previous calendar year, which will be the CPI for 2021.

    - In this example, assume the CPI for 2021 is 105
- Index B: the CPI for the calendar year preceding the year referred to in Index A, will be the CPI for 2020.
    - In this example, assume the CPI is 100
- Therefore, the formula that would be applied in this example would be:
    - $15 x (105 divided by 100), which is
    - $15 x 1.05, which equals
    - $15.75

Thus, using the fictional CPI numbers the general minimum wage rate that would come into effect on October 1, 2022 would be $ 15.75 an hour.

Subsection 23.1(4) is subject to s. 23.1(5) and (6). If the adjusted wage is an amount that is not a multiple of five cents, the amount will be rounded up or down to the nearest amount that is a multiple of five cents. In addition, if the applying the formula in s. 23.1(4) would result in a decrease, no adjustment will be made. See ss. 23.1(5) and (6) below.

Rounding – s. 23.1(5)

23.1(5) If the adjustment required by subsection (4) would result in an amount that is not a multiple of 5 cents, the amount shall be rounded up or down to the nearest amount that is a multiple of 5 cents.

If applying the formula in s. 23.1(4) results in an amount that is not a multiple of five cents, the amount will be rounded up or down to the nearest amount that is a multiple of five cents.

For example, if the calculation resulted in an amount of $16.04, the new minimum wage rate will be $16.05.

Exception Where Decrease – s. 23.1(6)

23.1(6) If the adjustment otherwise required by subsection (4) would result in a decrease in the minimum wage, no adjustment shall be made.

This subsection provides that if applying the formula in s. 23.1(4) would result in a decrease in the minimum wage, no adjustment is to be made. Thus, if the provincial economy went through a deflationary period, such that the change in the Consumer Price Index was negative, the minimum wage would remain unchanged.

Publication of Minimum Wage – s. 23.1(7)

23.1(7) The Minister shall, not later than April 1 of every year after 2021, publish on a website of the Government of Ontario the minimum wages that are to apply starting on October 1 of that year.

This provision requires the Minister to publish on a government website the minimum wage rates that will be in effect on October 1 of each year by April 1 of that year, beginning in 2021.

Subsection 23.1(7) was amended by the Build Ontario Act (Budget Measures), 2021 effective January 1, 2022 to establish that the Minister shall publish the rates that are to apply starting on October 1 no later than April 1 of every year after 2021.

Same – s. 23.1(8) – REPEALED

Same – s. 23.1(9)

23.1(9) If, after the Minister publishes the minimum wages that are to apply starting on October 1 of a year, a minimum wage is prescribed under subsection (2) for a prescribed class of employees, the Minister shall promptly publish the new wage that will apply to that class starting on October 1 of the applicable year as a result of the wage having been prescribed.

Paragraph 2.0.1 of ESA Part XXVII, s. 141(1) provides that a regulation may be made that in effect carves out a class of employees who would otherwise fall within the general class in subparagraph 1v of s. 23.1(1), and to prescribe a minimum wage for that class that is different from the minimum wage that applies to the general class. This leaves open the possibility that such a regulation might be made in the interval between the date that the Minister publishes the minimum wage rates that are to come into effect on October 1 (which must be no later than April 1) and October 1. In that event, the rate that was published for the general class will not apply to the new class that was carved out of the general class. To address this possibility, s. 23.1(9) requires the Minister to promptly publish the rate that will apply to the new class as of October 1.

Review – s. 23.1(10) – REPEALED

Same – s. 23.1(11) – REPEALED

Definition – s. 23.1(12)

23.1(12) In this section,

"Consumer Price Index" means the Consumer Price Index for Ontario (all items) published by Statistics Canada under the Statistics Act (Canada).

This provision defines Consumer Price Index, a term that appears in the formula for making annual adjustments in the minimum wage rates in s. 23.1(4). Note that Statistics Canada publishes a number of indices for measuring inflation; the one used for purposes of s. 23.1(4) is the index for Ontario (not the national index) that considers all items (i.e., without excluding any goods or services in the basket of goods and services that Statistics Canada uses for measurement purposes).

ESA Part X - Public Holidays

Part X provides for an employee's right (subject to specified qualifying conditions) to:

1. A day off with public holiday pay on a public holiday (or on a day that has been substituted for the public holiday); or

2. If the employee agrees to or is required to work on the holiday, either public holiday pay plus a premium rate of pay, or another day off with public holiday pay.

The labour arbitration case of U.A.W., Local 569 v. Sealed Power Corp. of Canada (1971), 22 LAC 371 (Ont Arb Bd) spoke of three rationales for the public holiday entitlement:

1. The facilitation of religious or social activity:
2. Relief from the everyday pressures of a job; and
3. The payment of an entitlement earned through daily work.

ESA Part X Section 24 – Public Holiday Pay

Public Holiday Pay – s. 24(1)

24(1) An employee's public holiday pay for a given public holiday shall be equal to,

(a) the total amount of regular wages earned and vacation pay payable to the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred, divided by 20; or

(b) if some other manner of calculation is prescribed, the amount determined using that manner of calculation.

Section 24(1) establishes how public holiday pay is to be calculated for the purposes of Part X of the ESA 2000.

Paragraph (a) provides for what is commonly referred to as a "pro-rating" formula for public holiday pay, based on a five-day work week (20 divided by four work weeks). At the time of writing, no other manner of calculation is prescribed pursuant to paragraph (b).

There were several significant changes to the public holiday pay provisions in 2018. See the text that is in red at the end of this section for details of the changes, information on which provisions applied at which points in time, and for the interpretation of the former provisions.

24(1) An employee's public holiday pay for a given public holiday shall be equal to,

(a) the total amount of regular wages earned and vacation pay payable to the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred, divided by 20;

The amount of public holiday pay owing is calculated as follows:

1. The amount of regular wages as defined in ESA Part I, s. 1 earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurs;

   Regular wages is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1 as follows:

   "regular wages" means wages other than overtime pay, public holiday pay, premium pay, vacation pay, domestic or sexual violence leave pay, termination pay, severance pay and termination of assignment pay and entitlements under a provision of an employee's contract of employment that under subsection 5(2) prevail over Part VIII, Part X, Part XI, section 49.7, Part XV or section 74.10.1.

   Work week is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1 as follows:

"Work week" means,

(a) a recurring period of seven consecutive days selected by the employer for the purpose of scheduling work, or

(b) if the employer has not selected such a period, a recurring period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

This means that the phrase in s. 24(1) that sets out the period over which the calculation of public holiday pay is to be performed - the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred - does not necessarily refer to the four calendar weeks immediately preceding the public holiday.

For example, an employer has selected a work week of Monday to Sunday and the public holiday falls on a Thursday. The four work weeks with respect to which the public holiday pay calculation is performed will go backwards four weeks starting on the first Sunday (the last day of the employer's work week) before the public holiday:

- Employer's work week runs from Monday to Sunday.
- Public holiday falls on Thursday, December 25.
- Week 1: Monday, December 15 – Sunday, December 21
- Week 2: Monday, December 8 – Sunday, December 14
- Week 3: Monday, December 1 – Sunday, December 7
- Week 4: Monday, November 24 – Sunday, November 30

In this example, the regular wages earned and vacation pay payable to the employee in the four work weeks identified will be used in the calculation.

plus

2. The amount of vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurs.

   Vacation pay can become payable in the following circumstances:

   - Vacation pay that is payable to an employee before they take their vacation, pursuant to ESA Part XI, s. 36(1);
   - Vacation pay that is payable to an employee on or before the pay day for the period in which the vacation falls, where the employee is paid by direct deposit or where the employee does not take vacation in complete weeks, pursuant to ESA Part XI, s. 36(2);
   - Vacation pay that is payable to an employee as it accrues pursuant to ESA Part XI, s. 36(3); and
   - Vacation pay that is payable at a time agreed to in writing by the employee pursuant to ESA Part XI, s. 36(4).

3. Take the total of the amounts obtained in 1. and 2., and divide that sum by 20.

In Munro Ltd. v Director of Employment Standards, 2015 CanLII 37329 (ON LRB), the Board determined that the employer must take into account the vacation pay earned by an employee in reference to their regular wages in the four-week period before the public holiday when calculating public holiday pay. This decision is contrary to Program policy, which is that "vacation pay payable" means vacation pay that is payable with respect to the relevant four work week period, as described elsewhere in this section. See the examples below in particular

Which Period to Use for Substitute Holiday Calculation

Note that in certain circumstances, employees are entitled to a substitute holiday and to be paid public holiday pay as if the substitute day were a public holiday – see for example ESA Part X, s. 27(2)(a). This means that when calculating the amount of public holiday pay owing for a substitute day, the period over which the calculation is performed is the four work weeks before the work week in which the substitute day falls, not the four work weeks before the work week in which the actual public holiday fell.

Sale of Business in calculation period

An issue may arise as to the wages that are to be included where there has been a sale of a business shortly before a public holiday and an employee of the seller is hired by the purchaser. Specifically, the question is whether the calculation includes wages that were earned by the employee from the seller. For example, the four work weeks prior to Canada Day over which the calculation of public holiday pay is performed is, for the sake of this example, June 1 to June 28. Employee ZZ had been working for Employer A. On June 25, Employer A's business was sold to Employer B. Employer B hired Employee ZZ, effective June 25. When determining Employer B's public holiday pay obligations towards Employee ZZ for Canada Day, does one include the wages that were earned by Employee ZZ under Employer A from June 1 to June 24? It is Program policy that the answer is yes. To say otherwise would undermine the general intent behind the continuity of employment provisions found in ESA Part IV, s. 9. Similarly, because s. 9 states that there is deemed to not be a termination or severance in circumstances such as the one in this example, the situation can be viewed as being the same employment relationship. Since s. 24(1)(a) refers to regular wages that are "earned" by the employee and vacation pay "payable" to the employee, all wages earned and vacation pay payable within that employment relationship are included, i.e., including those from the seller.

Examples of Calculating Public Holiday Pay

Example 1:

Employee:

- Works eight hours a day, five days a week, earning $200/day;
- Receives vacation pay when the vacation is taken (as opposed to on each pay cheque as it accrues, or at some other time);
- Was not on vacation during the four work weeks preceding the work week in which the public holiday occurred;
- Was not otherwise absent from work during those four work weeks.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $4000 ($200/day times 20 days worked)

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $0

   = $4,000

3. $4000 divided by 20 = $200 public holiday pay

Example 2 – Employee takes a paid vacation during the four work weeks prior to public holiday

Employee:

- Works eight hours a day, five days a week, earning $200/day;
- Receives vacation pay when the vacation is taken (as opposed to on each pay cheque as it accrues, or at some other time);
- Was on a vacation for two of the four work weeks preceding the work week in which the public holiday occurred, for which the employee was entitled to receive $2000;
- Was not absent from work on any other day during those four work weeks.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $2000 ($200/day times 10 days worked)

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $2000

   = $4000

3. $4000 divided by 20 = $200 public holiday pay

Example 3 – Employee absent because of illness

Employee:

- Works eight hours a day, five days a week, earning $200/day;
- Receives vacation pay when the vacation is taken;
- Was not on vacation during the four work weeks prior to the public holiday;
- Was absent from work due to illness for two days during the four work weeks prior to the public holiday.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $3600 ($200/day times 18 days worked).

- Note: the figure of $3600 would not increase if the employee received sick benefits while off work due to illness - the definition of wages in s. 1 specifically excludes benefit plan payments.

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $0

   = $3600

3. $3600 divided by 20 = $180 public holiday pay

Example 4 – Employee gets vacation pay as it accrues

4A – Employee not on vacation during four work weeks prior to public holiday

Employee:

- Works eight hours a day, five days a week, earning $200/day;
- Receives vacation pay on each pay cheque as it accrues, pursuant to ESA Part XI, s. 36(3);
- Was not on a vacation during four work weeks prior to the work week in which the public holiday occurred;
- Was not otherwise absent from work for any other reason during those four work weeks.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $4000 ($200/day times 20 days worked)

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: assuming the employee has fewer than five years of employment – $160 (4% times $4000)

   = $4160

3. $4160 divided by 20 = $208 public holiday pay

4B – Employee is on unpaid vacation during four work weeks prior to public holiday

Employee:

- Works eight hours a day, five days a week, earning $200/day;
- Receives vacation pay on each pay cheque as it accrues, pursuant to ESA Part XI, s. 36(3);
- Was on a vacation for two of the four work weeks prior to the work week in which the public holiday occurred;
- Was not otherwise absent from work for any other reason during those four work weeks.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $2000 ($200/day times 10 days worked)

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: assuming the employee has fewer than five years of employment – $80 (4% of the wages earned during the 10 days the employee was at work)

   = $2080

3. $2080 divided by 20 = $104 public holiday pay

Example 5 – Employee works less than five days a week

5A – Part-time employee

Employee:

- Works three days a week, five hours a day, earning $80/day;
- Receives vacation pay when vacation is taken;
- Was not on a vacation during four work weeks prior to the work week in which the public holiday occurred;
- Was not otherwise absent from work for any other reason during those four work weeks.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $960 ($80/day times 12 days worked)

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $0

   = $960

3. $960 divided by 20 = $48 public holiday pay

5B – Employee on compressed work week

Employee:

- Works 11 hours a day, 4 days a week, earning $220/ day;
- Receives vacation pay when vacation is taken;
- Was not on vacation during the four work weeks prior to the work week in which the public holiday occurred;
- Was not otherwise absent from work during those four work weeks.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $3520 ($220 times 16 days worked)

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $0

   = $3520

3. $3520 divided by 20 = $176 public holiday pay

Note that even though this employee is full-time, in the sense that they work full-time hours, the amount of public holiday pay owing will be a pro-rated amount of their regular daily wage because they work less than five days a week.

Example 6 – Employee works overtime

Only regular wages and vacation pay are included in the calculation of public holiday pay. Regular wages is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1 to exclude overtime pay. Overtime pay as per Part VIII, s. 22(1) is not just the extra premium of .5 times the regular rate for each hour over the prescribed overtime threshold, but is the entire 1.5 times the regular rate for each hour worked over the prescribed overtime threshold. This means that all payment for hours worked over the prescribed threshold is excluded from the calculation.

Employee:

- Earns $20 an hour;
- Has agreed in writing to work 50 hours per week (10 hours/day, 5 days/week), and works 50 hours per week in each of the four work weeks prior to the work week in which the public holiday falls;
- Receives vacation pay on each pay cheque as it accrues;
- Was not on vacation or otherwise absent from work during the four work weeks prior to the work week in which the public holiday fell.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday fell: $3520 ($20/hour x 44 hours/week x 4 weeks) – note that all pay for hours worked in excess of 44 are excluded;

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday fell: assuming the employee has fewer than five years of employment - $169.60 [($3520 of regular wages + $720 of overtime pay) x 4%]

   - Note: vacation pay is payable on ALL wages (except for vacation pay), including overtime pay, pursuant to ESA Part XI, s. 35.2.

   = $3869.60

3. $3869.60 divided by 20 = $184.48 public holiday pay

Note that although this employee's average daily wage (not including vacation pay) is $212 [(44 hours x $20) + (6 hours x $30) divided by 5], the employee is entitled only to $184.48 public holiday pay because overtime pay is excluded from the public holiday pay calculation.

Example 7 – Employee works overtime with overtime averaging agreement

7A – Only hours that attract overtime pay are excluded from the public holiday pay calculation

If an employee is subject to an averaging agreement or arrangement, the employee may exceed the weekly overtime threshold in a particular week, but might not receive overtime pay for those hours because of the averaging arrangement. In this case, wages for all of the hours worked will be included in the calculation.

Employee:

- Earns $20 an hour;
- Has agreed in writing to average the hours worked over four weeks for the purpose of determining the employee's overtime pay entitlement pursuant to ESA Part VIII, s. 22(2);
- In the four work weeks prior to the work week in which the public holiday occurred, the employee worked:
    - Week 1: 35 hours
    - Week 2: 48 hours
    - Week 3: 35 hours
    - Week 4: 48 hours
    - Total hours worked: 166
    - Average hours worked: 41.5 per work week
    - Average overtime hours worked: 0
    - Overtime pay: $0
- Receives vacation pay when vacation is taken;
- Was not on vacation or otherwise absent from work during the four work weeks prior to the week in which the public holiday fell.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $3320 ($20/hour x 166 hours)
    - Note: pay for hours worked in excess of 44 per week in weeks 2 and 4 are included because they were not compensated as overtime hours due to the averaging agreement.

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $0

    = $3320

3. $3320 divided by 20 = $166 public holiday pay

7B – Despite an averaging agreement, an employee may still earn overtime pay.

As in example 7A, those overtime wages will be excluded from the calculation of public holiday pay.

Employee:

- Earns $20 an hour;
- Has agreed in writing to average the hours worked over four weeks for the purpose of determining the employee's overtime pay entitlement;
- In the four work weeks prior to the work week in which the public holiday occurred, the employee worked:
    - Week 1: 60 hours
    - Week 2: 30 hours
    - Week 3: 60 hours
    - Week 4: 30 hours
    - Total hours worked: 180
    - Average hours worked: 45 per work week
    - Average non-overtime hours: 44 per work week
    - Average overtime hours worked: one per work week
    - Overtime pay: ($20/hour x 1.5) x (one overtime hour/week x 4 weeks) = $120
- Receives vacation pay when vacation is taken;
- Was not on vacation or otherwise absent from work during the four work weeks prior to the work week in which the public holiday fell.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $3520 ($20/hour x 44 hours per week x 4 work weeks)

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $0

   = $3520

3. $3520 divided by 20 = $176 public holiday pay

Example 8 – Public holiday pay calculation during Christmas holiday season

Public holiday pay is excluded from the definition of regular wages. This becomes relevant for the New Year's Day and, depending on the work week of a workplace, possibly Boxing Day, calculation of public holiday pay. It can have the effect of lowering the amount of public holiday pay owing to an employee on New Year's Day and possibly Boxing Day.

Employee:

- Works eight hours a day, Monday to Friday, earning $200/day;
- Receives vacation pay when the vacation is taken;
- Was not on vacation during the four work weeks prior to the public holiday;
- During those four work weeks, the only workdays the employee was not at work was on Christmas Day and December 26. For these two days, the employee was paid public holiday pay;
- The work week is Monday to Sunday;
- Christmas falls on a Thursday.

To calculate public holiday pay for Christmas:

The four work weeks over which the calculation is performed is from Monday November 24 to Sunday December 21.

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $4000 ($200 times 20 days worked).

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $0

   = $4000

3. $4000 divided by 20 = $200 public holiday pay

To calculate public holiday pay for December 26 (Boxing Day):

The four work weeks over which the calculation is performed is from Monday November 24 to Sunday December 21.

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $4000 ($200 times 20 days worked).

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $0

   = $4000

3. $4000 divided by 20 = $200 public holiday pay

To calculate public holiday pay for New Year's Day:

The four work weeks over which the calculation is performed is from Monday December 1 to Sunday December 28.

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $3600 ($200 times 18 days worked).

- Note: The $200 of public holiday pay the employee earned on each of Christmas Day and December 26 is excluded from the calculation, because public holiday pay is excluded from the definition of regular wages.

plus

2. Vacation pay payable to the employee with respect to the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred: $0

   = $3600

3. $3600 divided by 20 = $180 public holiday pay

Example 9 – Verifying if correct PHP paid to salaried employee with varying daily hours

Employee:

- Works Monday, Wednesday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday for 5.5 hours each day and Tuesday for 4 hours, earns a salary of $800/week;
- Receives vacation pay when vacation is taken;
- Received a substitute day off for a public holiday, which was taken on a Tuesday;
- Was not on vacation during the four weeks prior to the work week in which the substitute holiday is taken;
- Was not otherwise absent from work during those four work weeks.

To determine whether the proper amount of public holiday pay has been paid:

1. Determine the employee's hourly rate: $800.00 divided by 31.5 (hours worked in a week) = $25.40 an hour
2. Using the hourly rate and the number of hours that would have been worked on the day the employee took off, determine how much of the salary paid is attributable to the day off ;
   - By virtue of the fact that the employee did not work on the Tuesday because it was taken as a substitute holiday and yet received his full salary of $800 for that week, he in effect received $25.40 x 4 hours = $101.60 for the substitute holiday.
3. Determine the public holiday entitlement by applying the method set out in s. 24(1)(a): total of the regular wages earned during plus the vacation pay payable with respect to the four work weeks before the holiday (i.e., substitute day in this example) divided by 20];
   - ($800/week times 4 weeks) divided by 20 = $160.00
4. Compare the amounts obtained in step 2 and step 3

As the amount owing to the employee under the public holiday calculation is $160.00 and the employee only received $101.60 for the substitute holiday, the employer owes the employee $58.40.

Note that if the employee had taken a different workday off other than a Tuesday, the result would differ because of the different number of hours the employee works on their other workdays.

If a contract of employment provides that an employee is to be given public holiday pay in addition to their salary, then the employee gets the public holiday pay plus the regular salary. But, absent such a provision, it is Program policy that the salary is understood to include public holiday pay amounts when the employee gets the day off. In that situation, the four steps outlined above would apply.

For employees who work five days a week and work the same number of hours each day, the result of the above-described four-step calculation will be that the employer will be in compliance so long as the employee is paid their usual salary and given the day off.

Calculating Public Holiday Pay for Assignment Employees of Temporary Help Agencies

Public holiday pay is calculated as the total amount of regular wages earned plus the vacation pay payable in the four work weeks preceding the work week in which the public holiday falls, divided by 20. All regular wages earned and vacation pay payable to an assignment employee in the four-week period is included for the purposes of this calculation, regardless of the number of assignments the employee was on within that four-week period.

CHANGES TO THE PUBLIC HOLIDAY PAY FORMULA IN 2018

There were several significant changes to the public holiday pay provisions in 2018. The changes are detailed in the table below. The interpretation of the provisions that were previously in force are set out under the table. Since employees may still have claims relating to provisions that are no longer in force, the discussion of the former provisions remains as part of this publication. The text appears in red to highlight that these provisions are no longer in force.

DATE	PUBLIC HOLIDAY PAY FORMULA
Prior to January 1, 2018	"Pro-rating" formula This was pursuant to s. 24(1)(a) of the ESA 2000
January 1, 2018 – June 30, 2018	"Averaging" formula • This was pursuant to s. 24(1)(a) of the ESA 2000, which was amended by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 effective January 1, 2018
July 1, 2018 – December 31, 2018	"Pro-rating" formula • This was pursuant to O Reg 375/18, which was prescribed pursuant to s. 24(1)(b). This pro-rating formula in the Regulation effectively replaced the "averaging" formula that was set out in s. 24(1)(a) of the ESA 2000.
January 1, 2019 – current	"Pro-rating" formula • This was pursuant to s. 24(1)(a) of the ESA 2000, which was amended by the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018 (MOOBA) effective January 1, 2019. The MOOBA also revoked O Reg 375/18 effective January 1, 2019.
"Pro-rating" formula: total amount of regular wages earned and vacation pay payable in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred, divided by 20.

- The text that precedes this chart – in black front – provides an interpretation of the "pro-rating" formula.

"Averaging" formula: the total amount of regular wages earned in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday, divided by the number of days the employee worked in that period. Additional provisions that were in effect January 1, 2018 to June 30, 2018 (ss. 24(1.1) and 24(1.2)) established rules for applying the averaging formula when an employee was on a personal emergency leave or vacation during the relevant pay period or was not employed during the relevant pay period.

- The text that appears below this chart – in red font – provides an interpretation of the now repealed "averaging" formula.

AVERAGING FORMULA: PUBLIC HOLIDAY PAY CALCULATIONS FOR PUBLIC HOLIDAYS THAT OCCURRED, AND SUBSTITUTE HOLIDAYS THAT WERE TAKEN, BETWEEN JANUARY 1, 2018 AND JUNE 30, 2018

The amount of public holiday pay owing for public holidays from January 1, 2018 to June 30, 2018, and for substitute holidays that were taken during that time period (regardless of when the public holiday for which the substitute holiday was earned occurred) was determined by now-repealed sections 24(1)(a), 24(1.1) and 24(1.2), as follows:

24(1) An employee's public holiday pay for a given public holiday shall be equal to,

(a) the total amount of regular wages earned in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday, divided by the number of days the employee worked in that period; or

The calculation, which provides for an average day`s pay in respect of the public holiday, is made by taking the regular wages earned in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday and dividing that amount by the number of days actually worked within that pay period. However, see ss. 24(1.1) and (1.2) below which set out those situations in which a pay period other than the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday is used to calculate public holiday pay.

Shift Spans Two Calendar Days

For the purposes of counting the number of days the employee worked in the pay period, an employee is considered to have worked only one day in situations where their shift spans two calendar days. For example, one day is counted as having been worked where an employee works from 11:00 p.m. on one day to 7:00 a.m. on the next day.

Same, Leave or Vacation – s. 24(1.1)

24(1.1) If an employee is on a leave under section 50, on vacation or both for the entire pay period immediately preceding the public holiday, the calculation in clause 24 (1) (a) shall be applied to the pay period before the start of that leave or vacation.

Section 24(1.1) provides that if an employee is on a leave under ESA Part XIV, s. 50 (which was personal emergency leave at the time s. 24(1.1) was in force), or on vacation, or on a combination of ESA Part XIV, s. 50 personal emergency leave and vacation for the entire pay period immediately preceding the public holiday, the pay period to be used in the calculation in s. 24(1)(a) is the pay period preceding the start of that leave or vacation. Note that the employee must be on ESA Part XIV, s. 50 personal emergency leave or on vacation (or both) for the entire pay period for s. 24(1.1) to apply. If the employee is on personal emergency leave or on vacation for only part of the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday, that is the pay period that will be used in the calculation of public holiday pay.

Note that s. 24(1.1) applies only if the leave the employee takes is a leave of absence under the personal emergency leave provisions in ESA Part XIV, s. 50 for the entire pay period immediately preceding the public holiday. If the leave of absence that the employee is on in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday is any other type of leave of absence, s. 24(1.1) does not apply. For example, if an employee was on a pregnancy or parental leave for all (or part) of the pay period immediately preceding a public holiday, her public holiday pay would be calculated on the basis of days worked and pay earned in the pay period immediately preceding the holiday. This could result in the employee receiving $0 as public holiday pay.

Start of that leave or vacation

The question may arise as to what is considered the start of a ESA Part XIV, s. 50 personal emergency leave or vacation taken within the pay period preceding a public holiday if an employee has also taken leave or vacation days in the pay period prior to the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday.

It is the Program's policy that if an employee takes days of personal emergency leave or vacation (or both) in that prior pay period that are consecutive with the personal emergency leave or vacation days taken in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday, all of those days are together considered a single period of leave or vacation. For the purposes of s. 24(1.1) then, the leave or vacation starts on the first day of that single continuous period of personal emergency leave and/or vacation.

Example 1: January 1, 2018 to June 30, 2018

- Employee regularly works Monday through Friday and has a weekly pay period
- Public holiday falls May 21
- Weekly pay period immediately preceding the public holiday is May 13 to May 19: 5 days of s. 50 leave taken Monday, May 14 to Friday, May 18
- Weekly pay period May 6 to May 12: 2 days of s. 50 leave taken Thursday, May 10 and Friday, May 11

Because the employee works Monday through Friday in this example, the two ESA Part XIV, s. 50 personal emergency leave days taken May 10 and May 11 were taken consecutively with the five s. 50 leave days taken May 14 to May 18 and the personal emergency leave then started on May 10.

In accordance with s. 24(1.1), the public holiday pay for May 21 is calculated using the pay period preceding the start of the s. 50 personal emergency leave, that is April 29 to May 5.

It is also Program policy that in determining whether days are consecutive, you only look to the days the employee is regularly scheduled to work. For example, if an employee only regularly works one day a week and takes two vacation days (i.e., the one day in each week that they would have regularly worked), the two vacation days are considered consecutive.

Example 2: January 1, 2018 to June 30, 2018

- Employee regularly works Monday through Friday and has a weekly pay period

- Public holiday falls May 21
- Weekly pay period immediately preceding the public holiday is May 13 to May 19: 3 days of s. 50 leave taken Monday, May 14 to Wednesday, May 16 and 2 days of vacation taken Thursday, May 17 and Friday, May 18
- Weekly pay period May 6 to May 12: 2 days of s. 50 leave taken Thursday, May 10 and Friday, May 11

Because the employee works Monday through Friday in this example, the two s. 50 personal emergency leave days taken May 10 and May 11 were taken consecutively with the personal emergency leave days and vacation days taken May 14 to May 18 and the leave then started on May 10.

In accordance with s. 24(1.1), the public holiday pay for May 21 is calculated using the pay period preceding the start of the leave, that is April 29 to May 5.

Example 3: January 1, 2018 to June 30, 2018

However, if an employee is on s. 50 personal emergency leave or vacation (or both) in that prior pay period that is not consecutive with the s. 50 personal emergency leave or vacation days taken in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday, the leave or vacation starts in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday. Therefore, pursuant to s. 24(1.1), public holiday pay would be calculated using the pay period prior to the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday as shown in the following example:

- Employee regularly works Monday through Friday and has a biweekly pay period
- Public holiday falls May 21
- Biweekly pay period May 6 to May 19: 10 days of vacation taken Monday, May 7 to Friday, May 18
- Biweekly pay period April 22 to May 5: 2 days of vacation taken Thursday, April 26 and Friday, April 27.

Because the vacation days taken April 26 and April 27 were not taken consecutively with the vacation days taken May 7 to May 19, the vacation started on May 7.

In accordance with s. 24(1.1), the public holiday pay for May 21 is calculated using the pay period preceding the start of the vacation, that is April 22 to May 5.

Same, No Pay Period Before Public Holiday – s. 24(1.2)

24(1.2) If the employee was not employed during the pay period immediately preceding a public holiday, the employee's public holiday pay for the public holiday shall be equal to the amount of regular wages earned in the pay period that includes the public holiday divided by the number of days the employee worked in that period.

Under s. 24(1.2), employees who commence employment in the pay period that includes a public holiday are entitled to public holiday pay for that holiday based on the regular wages earned in the pay period that includes the public holiday divided by the number of days the employee worked in that period.

A question may arise regarding the calculation of the public holiday pay entitlement under s. 24(1.2) with respect to an employee who commences employment during the pay period in which the public holiday falls and who does not have a substitute day scheduled. In other words, the employee works on the holiday and is entitled to public holiday pay for the holiday and premium pay for the hours worked on the holiday.

For example, if an employee was hired during the pay period in which Family Day falls and agreed in accordance with ESA Part X, s. 27(2)(b) to work on Family Day, what is the public holiday pay entitlement for that day? The employee's wages earned in the pay period would not include the premium pay for any hours worked or any public holiday pay paid in respect of Family Day as such wages do not fall within the definition of regular wages. As noted in the discussion of s. 24(1)(a), all days worked (including Family Day in this example) in the pay period would be included in the count for the number of days worked when calculating the public holiday pay for Family Day.

Examples of Calculating Public Holiday Pay for public holidays that occurred January 1, 2018 to June 30, 2018 and for substitute holidays that were taken January 1, 2018 to June 30, 2018 regardless of when the public holiday for which the substitute holiday was earned occurred

Example 1 – Employee has irregular hours

Employee:

- Has a bi-weekly pay period;
- Is paid $20.00/hour;

In the pay period before the public holiday, the employee worked:

- Week 1:
    - 7 hours on Monday
    - 6 hours on Wednesday
    - 5 hours on Thursday
    - 10 hours on Friday
- Week 2:
    - 5 hours on Tuesday
    - 4 hours on Wednesday
    - 6 hours on Thursday
    - 7 hours on Friday
    - 8 hours on Saturday
- Total hours worked: 58
- Total days worked: 9

The employee was not absent on s. 50 personal emergency leave or vacation for the entire pay period immediately preceding the public holiday. Therefore, public holiday pay to be calculated using the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the pay period before the public holiday:

   $1160 ($20.00/hour times 58 hours worked)

2. Divided by 9 (the number of days the employee worked in the pay period before the public holiday)
3. $1160 divided by 9 = $128.89 public holiday pay.

Example 2 – Employee is absent from work in pay period preceding public holiday

Employee:

- Works eight hours a day, five days a week, earning $200/day;
- Has a bi-weekly pay period;
- Employee worked 7 days

Per the employee's contract, took three days off as floater days in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday. Therefore, public holiday pay to be calculated using the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the pay period preceding the public holiday= $1400 ($200 per day x 7 days worked).
2. Divided by 7 (the number of days the employee worked in the pay period preceding the public holiday)
3. $1400 divided by 7 = $200 public holiday pay

Example 3 – Employee works overtime

Only regular wages are included in the calculation of public holiday pay. Regular wages is defined in ESA Part I, s. 1 to exclude overtime pay. Overtime pay as per Part VIII, s. 22(1) is not just the extra premium of .5 times the regular rate for each hour over the prescribed overtime threshold, but is the entire 1.5 times the regular rate for each hour worked over the prescribed overtime threshold. This means that all payment for hours worked over the prescribed threshold is excluded from the calculation.

Employee:

- Earns $20 an hour;
- Has a bi-weekly pay period;
- Agreed in writing to work 50 hours per week (10 hours/day, 5 days/week), and works 50 hours per week in each of the weeks in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday;
- Was not on vacation, s. 50 personal emergency leave or otherwise absent from work during the pay period before the public holiday.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the pay period before the public holiday: $1760 ($20/hour x 44 hours/week x 2 weeks)

- Note that all pay for hours worked in excess of 44 are excluded;

2. Divided by 10 (the number of days worked in the pay period before the public holiday);
    - Note that all days on which the employee worked are included, even if only overtime was worked on a particular day;
3. $1760 divided by 10 = $176.00 public holiday pay

Note that although this employee's average daily wage when you include overtime is $212 [(44 hours x $20) + (6 hours x $30) divided by 5], they are entitled only to $176.00 public holiday pay because overtime pay is excluded from the public holiday pay calculation.

Example 4 – Employee is on personal emergency leave for part of pay period

Employee:

- Works eight hours a day, five days a week, earning $200/day;
- Has a bi-weekly pay period;
- Worked seven days and took three days of s. 50 personal emergency leave in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday.

Although the employee was on s. 50 personal emergency leave during the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday the employee was not on personal emergency leave for the entire pay period. Therefore, public holiday pay is to be calculated using the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday = $1400 ($200 per day x 7 days worked).
2. Divided by 7 (the number of days the employee worked in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday)
3. $1400 divided by 7 = $200 public holiday pay

Note that even if the employee had been paid for one or more of the personal emergency leave days pursuant to subsection 50(5), the amount paid would not be included in the public holiday pay calculation, since personal emergency leave pay is excluded from the definition of regular wages.

Example 5 – Employee is on vacation for entire pay period

Employee:

- Works eight hours a day, five days a week, earning $200/day;
- Has a bi-weekly pay period;
- Was on a vacation for all 10 working days in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday;
    - Note s. 24(1.1) applies because the employee was on vacation for the entire pay period immediately preceding the public holiday. Public holiday pay to be calculated using the pay period preceding the start of the vacation.

- Worked all 10 days in pay period preceding the start of the vacation.

To calculate public holiday pay:

4. Regular wages earned by the employee in the pay period preceding the start of the vacation = $2000 ($200 per day x 10 days worked).
5. Divided by 10 (the number of days the employee worked in the pay period preceding the start of the vacation)
6. $2000 divided by 10 = $200 public holiday pay

Example 6 – Employee not employed during pay period

Employee:

- Commenced employment on Sunday, December 30
- Has a weekly pay period, from Sunday to Saturday;
- Is paid $20.00/hour;
- In the pay period that includes the public holiday (New Year's Day), the employee worked:
    - 6 hours on Sunday
    - 6 hours on Thursday
    - 8 hours on Friday
    - 8 hours on Saturday
    - Total hours worked: 28
    - Total days worked: 4

To calculate public holiday pay:

Because the employee was not employed in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday, public holiday pay is calculated in accordance with s. 24(1.2):

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the pay period that includes the public holiday: $560 ($20/hour times 28 hours worked)
2. Divided by 4 (the number of days the employee worked in the pay period that includes the public holiday)
3. $560 divided by 4 = $140 public holiday pay

Note that if the employee had commenced employment on or after January 2, they would not be entitled to public holiday pay for January 1 because they were not yet in an employment relationship with the employer on the holiday.

Example 7 – Employee works overtime with an overtime averaging agreement

7A – Employee does not earn any overtime pay

The employee is subject to an averaging agreement and exceeds the weekly overtime threshold in a particular week, but does not receive overtime pay for those hours because of the averaging agreement. In this case, wages for all of the hours worked will be included in the calculation of public holiday pay.

Employee:

- Earns $20 an hour and works 5 days per week;
- Has a bi-weekly pay period;
- Has agreed in writing to average his/her hours over two weeks for the purpose of determining the employee's overtime pay entitlement pursuant to ESA Part VIII, s. 22(2);
- In the pay period prior to the public holiday, the employee worked:
    - Week 1: 35 hours
    - Week 2: 48 hours
    - Total hours worked: 83
    - Average hours worked: 41.5 per work week
    - Average overtime hours worked: 0
    - Overtime pay: $0
- Was not on vacation, s. 50 personal emergency leave or otherwise absent from work during the pay period before the public holiday.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the pay period before the public holiday: $1660 ($20/hour x 83 hours)
        - Note: pay for hours worked in excess of 44 per week in week 2 is included because the hours were not compensated as overtime hours due to the averaging agreement.
2. Divided by 10 (the number of days worked in the pay period before the public holiday);
3. $1660 divided by 10 = $166 public holiday pay

7B – Employee earns overtime pay

The employee is subject to an averaging agreement and exceeds the weekly overtime threshold in a particular week, and receives overtime pay for some of those hours because of the averaging agreement. In this case, those overtime wages will be excluded from the calculation of public holiday pay.

Employee:

- Earns $20 an hour and works 10 days per week;
- Has a bi-weekly pay period;
- Has agreed in writing to average their hours over two weeks for the purpose of determining the employee's overtime pay entitlement;
- In the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday, the employee worked:

- Week 1: 60 hours
- Week 2: 30 hours
- Total hours worked: 90
- Average hours worked: 45 per work week
- Average non-overtime hours: 44 per work week
- Average overtime hours worked: one per work week
- Overtime pay: ($20/hour x 1.5) x (one overtime hour/week x 2 weeks) = $60

- Was not on vacation, s. 50 personal emergency leave or otherwise absent from work during the pay period before the public holiday.

To calculate public holiday pay:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday: $1760 ($20/hour x 44 hours per week x 2 work weeks)
2. Divided by 10 (the number of days worked in the pay period immediately preceding the public holiday);
3. $1760 divided by 10 = $176 public holiday pay

Example 8 – Public holiday pay calculation during Christmas holiday season

Public holiday pay and premium pay are excluded from the definition of regular wages. This becomes relevant when a public holiday falls within the pay period immediately preceding a public holiday. For example, where Christmas Day and Boxing Day fall within one pay period and New Year's Day falls in the next pay period.

Employee:

- Works eight hours a day, Monday to Friday, earning $200/day;
- Has a weekly pay period.
- Is entitled to both Christmas Day and Boxing Day as days off with public holiday pay in the pay period immediately preceding New Year's Day, so only works 3 days.

To calculate public holiday pay for New Year's Day:

1. Regular wages earned by the employee in the pay period immediately preceding New Year's Day: $600 ($200 X 3 days worked)
2. Divided by 3 (the number of days worked in the pay period before the public holiday);
3. $600 divided by 3 = $200 public holiday pay for New Year's Day

Example 9 – Verifying public holiday pay for salaried employee whose daily hours of work vary

Employee:

- Works Monday Tuesday, Wednesday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday. Employee works 5.5 hours each day except for Mondays when the employee works for 4 hours.

- Employee’s salary is $600/week
- Has a weekly pay period
- Public holiday taken as a day off on Monday.
- Assume employee worked the entire pay period immediately preceding the week in which the public holiday fell

To determine whether the proper amount of public holiday pay has been paid:

1. Determine the employee's hourly rate $600.00 divided by 31.5 (hours worked in a week) = $19.05 an hour;
2. Using the hourly rate and the number of hours that would have been worked on the public holiday off, determine how much of the $600 salary paid is attributable to the public holiday off;
    - Because the employee did not work on the Monday (the public holiday) but received the full $600 salary for that week, the employee in effect received $19.05 x 4 hours = $76.20 for the public holiday.
3. Determine the public holiday entitlement by applying the method set out in s. 24(1)(a): total of the regular wages earned in the pay period before the holiday ($600) divided by 6 (i.e. the number of days worked in that pay period);
    - $600 divided by 6 = $100
4. Compare the amounts obtained in step 2 and step 3

As the public holiday calculation netted the employee $100 and the employee only received $76.20 for the public holiday, a balance of $23.80 in public holiday pay is owed to the employee.

Note that if the public holiday fell on a workday other than Monday, the result would differ because of the different number of hours the employee works on their other workdays.

If a contract of employment provides that an employee is to be given public holiday pay in addition to their salary, then the employee gets the public holiday pay plus the regular salary. But, absent such a provision, it is Program policy that the salary is understood to include public holiday pay amounts when the employee gets the day off. In that situation, the four steps outlined above would apply.

For employees who work five days a week and work the same number of hours each day, the result of the above-described four-step calculation will be that the employer will be in compliance so long as the employee is paid their usual salary and given the day off.

Premium Pay – s. 24(2)

24(2) An employer who is required under this Part to pay premium pay to an employee shall pay the employee at least one and one half times his or her regular rate.

This section sets out the rate that is to be used to calculate any premium pay an employee may be entitled to pursuant to other sections in Part X. It provides that the amount of premium pay shall be at least one and one half times an employee's regular rate.

ESA Part I, s. 1 defines regular rate as follows:

"Regular rate" means, subject to any regulation made under paragraph 10 of subsection 141 (1),

a) for an employee who is paid by the hour, the amount earned for an hour of work in the employee's usual work week, not counting overtime hours,

b) otherwise, the amount earned in a given work week divided by the number of non-overtime hours actually worked in that week;

As of the time of writing, there is no regulation made under paragraph 10 of ESA Part XXVII, s. 141(1) that provides a different definition of regular rate.

See ESA Part I, s. 1 for a discussion of the term regular rate, particularly as it applies to employees whose compensation consists of an hourly rate plus some other form of compensation.

ESA Part X Section 25 - Two Kinds of Work

Two Kinds of Work - ss. 25(1), (2)

25(1) Subsection (2) applies with respect to an employee if,

(a) an employee performs work of a particular kind or character in a work week in which a public holiday occurs;

(b) the regulations exempt employees who perform work of that kind or character from the application of this Part; and

(c) the duties of the employee's position also require him or her to perform work of another kind or character.

(2) This Part applies to the employee with respect to that public holiday unless the time spent by the employee performing the work referred to in clause (1) (b) constitutes more than half the time that the employee spent fulfilling the duties of his or her position in that work week.

These provisions were introduced in the Employment Standards Act, 2000. They codify policy that applied under the former Employment Standards Act.

These provisions state what happens when, during a work week in which a public holiday falls, an employee performs some work for an employer that is covered by Part X, and some work that is exempted from coverage of Part X by O Reg 285/01, s. 2 or s. 9.

In this situation, Part X will apply to that employee for that particular public holiday if 50 per cent or more of the employee's hours during that work week were spent performing work that is not exempt.

It is only the work performed during the work week in which the public holiday falls that is reviewed when applying s. 25. For example, assume Work A is exempt from Part X, while Work B is covered by Part X. During each of the three work weeks prior to the public holiday, an employee spends 60 per cent of her time performing Work A (exempt work) and 40 per cent performing Work B (non-exempt work). However, during the work week the public holiday occurs, she spends 45 per cent of her time performing Work A (exempt work) and 55 per cent of her time performing Work B (non-exempt work). Because she spent 50 per cent or more of her time performing non-exempt work during the work week in which the public holiday fell, she will be entitled to the Public Holiday standard with respect to that particular public holiday. (The same review must be performed for each public holiday.)

ESA Part X Section 26 – Public Holiday Ordinarily a Working Day

Public Holiday Ordinarily a Working Day – s. 26(1)

26(1) If a public holiday falls on a day that would ordinarily be a working day for an employee and the employee is not on vacation that day, the employer shall give the employee the day off work and pay him or her public holiday pay for that day.

This provision sets out an employee's entitlement when a public holiday falls on a day that is ordinarily the employee's working day and that is not during the employee's vacation. See ESA Part X, s. 29 for the entitlement if a public holiday falls on a day that is not ordinarily an employee's working day, or is during an employee's vacation.

It is not always readily apparent which days are ordinarily working days for a given employee. Whether or not a holiday falls on a day that is ordinarily a working day for an employee will determine what the employee is entitled to for the holiday, and, in certain industries, whether or not the employer can require the employee to work on the holiday. For example, the question has arisen in the restaurant industry as to how to determine which days are ordinarily working days for part-time employees who have irregular shifts. It is Program policy that to make this determination, one looks at the days that the employee tells the employer that they are available to work and the past scheduling practice. For example, an employee is hired on the basis that they are available to work Mondays through Fridays, and is actually scheduled to work on each of those days (although not on any regular basis – e.g., Monday and Tuesday one week, Tuesday and Friday the next week, Wednesday and Thursday the next week, etc.). In this case, the Program would consider Mondays through Fridays to be days that would ordinarily be working days for that employee. However, if that same employee is only ever scheduled to work Tuesdays and Thursdays, the Program would consider only Tuesdays and Thursdays to be days that would ordinarily be working days for that employee, even though they said they were available all weekdays.

For employees who are on lay-off, a leave under ESA Part XIV, or any other leave of absence when a public holiday occurs, their pre-leave or pre-lay-off schedule determines whether the public holiday falls on a day that would or would not ordinarily be a working day for an employee, and thus whether s. 26 or s. 29 will apply to that particular public holiday.

For example, if an employee on parental leave worked Mondays to Fridays before the leave, Mondays to Fridays are days that are ordinarily working days for that employee, and Saturdays and Sundays are days that would not ordinarily be working days for that employee. Consequently, s. 26 will apply to any public holiday that falls on a weekday during that employee's leave, and s. 29 will apply to any public holiday that falls on a weekend during that employee's leave. In either case, the employee is entitled to public holiday pay for the holiday – see ESA Part X, s. 29(2.1). But because public holiday pay is based on regular wages earned and vacation pay payable in the four work weeks prior to the public holiday, an employee who was on a leave or lay-off for some or all of the four weeks prior to the public holiday, the quantum of public holiday pay to which they will be entitled will be less than the equivalent of a regular day's pay [and in the case of an employee who was on a leave or lay-off for the entire four weeks, will be zero].

Some employees may have had a varying, irregular schedule before their leave or lay-off, such that it cannot be determined whether or not the employee would have been scheduled to work on the day the public holiday falls. In this case, because there are no days that "would ordinarily be a working day for" that employee, s. 29 will apply to any public holiday that occurs during the leave or lay-off.

See ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.10 for a discussion of the application of Part X to assignment employees of temporary help agencies, particularly the Program's policy that a public holiday falls on a day that is ordinarily a working day for an assignment employee only if the employee is on assignment and the holiday falls on a day that they would be working pursuant to the assignment (assuming there had been no holiday). In that case only, ESA Part X, ss. 26, 27 or 28 would apply to determine the employee's public holiday entitlements.

Section 26(1) states that when a public holiday falls on a day that is ordinarily an employee's working day and the employee is not on vacation, the employee is to be given the public holiday off and paid public holiday pay. See ESA Part X, s. 24 for a discussion of public holiday pay.

The entitlement in s. 26(1) is subject to:

- Section 26(2) which provides that employees lose their s. 26(1) entitlement if they fail without reasonable cause to work their entire regularly scheduled day of work before or after the public holiday;
- ESA Part X, s. 27 which allows employees to agree in writing to work on the public holiday; and
- ESA Part X, s. 28 which permits employers to require employees in certain operations to work on a public holiday that falls on a day that is ordinarily an employee's working day and the employee is not on vacation.

Exception – s. 26(2)

26(2) The employee has no entitlement under subsection (1) if he or she fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before the public holiday or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday.

This section provides that employees are not entitled to the s. 26(1) entitlement of a public holiday off with public holiday pay if they fail, without reasonable cause, to work their entire regularly scheduled day of work before or after the holiday.

This section is intended to discourage employees from unilaterally taking an extra day off around the public holiday by failing to show up on the day they are expected to work before or after the holiday, or by showing up to work later or leaving earlier than expected before or after the holiday.

Regularly Scheduled

Reference to "regularly scheduled" relates to the schedule of the particular employee, not to the business hours of the employer. For example, an employee works Monday to Friday in a business that is open seven days a week. A holiday falls on a Monday. The employee would not be disqualified under this section because they did not work on Sunday. So long as they worked their entire scheduled shift on the Friday before the public holiday and the Tuesday after the public holiday, they will be considered to have worked the last regularly scheduled day before and the first regularly scheduled day after the public holiday.

If the employee in the above example had originally been scheduled to work on the Friday before the public holiday, but exchanged this shift with the employer's approval, the effect of this change would be to alter their regularly scheduled day of work. So long as the employee worked the entire scheduled days on the Thursday before the holiday and the Tuesday after the holiday, they will be considered to have worked the last regularly scheduled day before and the first regularly scheduled day after the public holiday – see 472323 Ontario Limited c.o.b.a. the Weed Man v Clark (October 28, 1985) ESC 1971 (Kerry) a decision under the former Employment Standards Act.

In 398827 Ontario Limited c.o.b. Palangio Vending & Food Services v Guimond et al (May 31, 1982), ESC 1232 (Black), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, the employer terminated the employees at a school cafeteria before Christmas, fully intending to rehire them after the New Year, so that they could claim Employment Insurance benefits. The referee held that the employees had worked their scheduled days before and after the holiday.

If the employer's argument that the claimants were not employees on the holidays in question because they had been terminated was upheld, then surely nothing would prevent an unscrupulous employer from terminating an employee the day before each public holiday only to rehire the day after such holiday in order to avoid compliance with the legislation.

An employee will not be considered to have worked all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before the public holiday and all of their first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday if they did not work the entire scheduled shift on both of those days. However, if the employer allows the employee to leave early (or begin late), the employee would not be disqualified, since what constituted the full regularly scheduled day of work was adjusted by mutual consent. Note that agreements to adjust the schedule are not required to be in writing, as they are not agreements provided for in the ESA 2000.

What follows are some examples of situations in which an employee will not be considered to have failed to work their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday.

Scheduled leaves of absence

Where the last regularly scheduled work day before a public holiday or the first regularly scheduled day of work after a public holiday falls on a day that, although it would ordinarily have been a working day for the employee, is a day on which the employee is on a scheduled leave of absence, they will not be considered to have failed to work the "last before" or "first after"; since the employee was on a scheduled leave, work could not have been scheduled for them on that day. Leaves that are arranged in advance would fall into this category; examples would include sabbatical leaves and, if notice is given in advance of the start date, leaves under ESA Part XIV.

Where advance notice is not given, as is often the case with some ESA Part XIV leaves, the leave would obviously not be considered to have been arranged in advance; however, an employee who misses the last before or first after because of taking such leave would not lose the public holiday entitlement because of the reasonable cause exception to the "last before and first after" requirement. See the discussion in under Reasonable Cause below.

Vacations

Where the last regularly scheduled work day before a public holiday or the first regularly scheduled day of work after a public holiday falls on a day that, while it would ordinarily have been a working day for the employee, is a day on which the employee is on vacation, they will not be considered to have failed to work the last before or first after; since the employee was on vacation, work could not have been scheduled for them on that day.

Lay-offs

Where the last regularly scheduled work day before a public holiday or the first regularly scheduled day of work after a public holiday falls on a day that, while it would ordinarily have been a working day for the employee, is a day on which the employee is on lay-off, they will not be considered to have failed to work the last before or first after; since the employee was on lay-off, work would not have been scheduled for them on that day.

Termination or resignation of employment

A person who resigns or whose employment is terminated immediately after the public holiday (i.e., before the commencement of what would have been their first regularly scheduled day of work after the holiday) is not considered to have failed to work the first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday. Since the individual was no longer employed on that day, work could not have been scheduled for them on that day. However, an employment relationship must have still existed between the parties on the public holiday itself. For example, if the employment of an employee who regularly works Monday through Friday each week is terminated at the end of their shift on the Friday preceding the public holiday (which falls on the following Monday), they would have no public holiday entitlement for the Monday. If however, the employment was terminated when the employee arrived at work on the Tuesday morning following the holiday, the entitlement would be maintained because there was an employment relationship on the day of the public holiday.

Disciplinary Suspension

An employee who has been suspended by the employer on a day that would otherwise have been the last regularly scheduled day before a public holiday or the first regularly scheduled day after a public holiday is not considered to have failed to work the last before or first after. Since the employee was on suspension, work could not have been scheduled for them on that day.

Note that s. 26(2) provides that an employee will not lose their public holiday entitlement, despite not having worked all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before the holiday or the first regularly scheduled day of work after the holiday, if they had reasonable cause for having failed to do so. What constitutes reasonable cause is discussed in the next section.

Reasonable Cause

Employees who do not work their entire regularly scheduled shifts before or after the public holiday will not lose their right to a paid day off if they had reasonable cause for failing to perform the work.

The onus is on the employee to show that there was reasonable cause. Usually, reasonable cause will be something beyond the control of the employee, although this is not always the case. What follows are some examples of situations where reasonable cause may or may not exist:

Transportation Breakdown

An employee may claim that their failure to report may be due to the breakdown of their car, but if alternate transportation was readily available, this would not be considered to be reasonable cause. However, if the employee did take public transit and arrived late for their shift, this may be considered reasonable cause.

“Too tired”

Reasons such as "slept in" or "too tired" will generally not amount to reasonable cause. However, if the reason the employee slept in is because there was a power failure and the employee's alarm clock did not go off as a result, that may amount to reasonable cause.

Part XIV leave

As was discussed above, an employee who gives advance notice that they are taking a Part XIV leave and for whom what would otherwise have been the last regularly scheduled day of work before the holiday or first regularly scheduled day of work after the holiday falls during the leave will not be considered to have failed to work the last before or first after; this is because work cannot be scheduled where the employer knows beforehand that the employee will be on leave. However, where the employee had to commence the leave without advance notice, they will not lose the public holiday entitlement despite not working the last before or first after; although work was scheduled, the employee had reasonable cause for not working.

Sick leave, family responsibility leave and bereavement leave

Sick leave, family responsibility leave and bereavement leave under ESA Part XIV are, because of the nature of the events for which they can be taken, often not possible to be arranged in advance; therefore, an employee who had to take sick leave, family responsibility leave or bereavement leave on a day that is the last regularly scheduled day of work before or the first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday would arguably - if no advance notice was given – be regarded as having failed to work on the last regularly scheduled day before or the last regularly scheduled day after, as the case may be. However, it is Program policy that an employee who is away for any reason listed in s. 50(1), or in s.50.0.1(1) or s.50.0.2(1) with respect to any person in a category listed in s. 50.0.1(3) or s.50.0.2.(3), will be considered to have reasonable cause. See the discussion of the sick leave, family responsibility leave and bereavement leave provisions in ESA Part XIV.

This policy applies even if the employee was not exercising a right to sick leave, family responsibility leave or bereavement leave because they already "used up" the leave days provided for under the ESA 2000. If an employee fails to work their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled shift after the public holiday because of a reason listed in s. 50(1), or for a reason listed in s. 50.0.1(1) or s. 50.0.2(1) with respect to a person listed in s. 50.0.1(3) or s. 50.0.2(3), the Program will consider that employee to have reasonable cause.

On the other hand, just because an employee is away for a reason that is not listed in s. 50(1), or in the case of family responsibility leave or bereavement leave that does not relate to a person listed in s. 50.0.1(3) or s. 50.0.2(3), does not necessarily mean that the employee does not have reasonable cause. While any event that entitles an employee to take sick leave, family responsibility leave or bereavement leave will constitute reasonable cause, the opposite is not necessarily true. That is, s. 50, s. 50.0.1 and s. 50.0.2 do not provide an exhaustive list of what constitutes reasonable cause for the purposes of the public holiday provisions. Whether or not an event that does not fall within s. 50, s. 50.0.1 or s. 50.0.2 amounts to reasonable cause for the purpose of s. 26(2) will depend on the circumstances. For example, an employee may fail to work their regularly scheduled day of work before a public holiday because their neighbour had a medical emergency and needed the employee's assistance. Although this employee is not entitled to a family responsibility leave of absence because "neighbours" are not listed in s. 50.0.1(3), the employee may have reasonable cause for the purpose of s. 26(2), depending on all of the circumstances.

The same approach applies to personal emergency leave taken under the previous provisions, in force prior to January 1, 2019. Also note that s. 50(13) of the previous personal emergency leave provisions prohibited an employer from requiring that the employee provide a certificate from a qualified health practitioner: therefore, an employee could not be required to produce such a certificate to support an entitlement to public holiday pay when the employee took personal emergency leave during all or part of the time the employee was scheduled to work on a public holiday. However, an employee could be required to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances per the previous version of s. 50 (12) and to support reasonable cause per ESA Part X, ss. 26(2), 27, 28 or 29.

Lawful strike

It is Program policy that an employee represented by a trade union who is on a lawful strike on the last regularly scheduled shift before or first regularly scheduled shift after a public holiday will be considered to have reasonable cause. Employees on an unlawful strike will be considered to not have reasonable cause.

Note that an employee who is entitled to a substitute holiday pursuant to s. 27(2)(a) does not lose that entitlement if they fail without reasonable cause to work all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the substitute holiday. An employee does not have to "requalify" for the substitute holiday once they have already earned it.

Application of "Last and First" Rule for Assignment Employees of Temporary Help Agencies

As discussed above, employees may lose the entitlement to public holiday pay or a substitute day off with public holiday pay if the employee fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of their last regularly scheduled working day before the holiday or all of their first regularly scheduled working day after the holiday.

The Program's position is that an assignment employee will not be considered to have failed to work the last regularly scheduled working day before the holiday or first regularly scheduled working day after the holiday if they work on the last day they were supposed to work before the holiday and the first day they were supposed to work after the holiday in accordance with their assignment or assignments (if any). Note that if the employee does fail to work either of those days, they may still be entitled to the public holiday entitlements so long as they had reasonable cause for not working the day(s).

The following examples are intended to provide guidance in determining the public holiday entitlements of assignment employees pursuant to ESA Part X, ss. 24 through 32, ESA Part XVIII.1, ss. 74.10(1) and (2) (as applicable) as well as ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.11 and in accordance with Program policy with respect to those provisions, including the Program's policy as described above:

Example 1: Employee on assignment, public holiday ordinarily a working day

An employee was on a two-week assignment working Monday through Thursday each week. Their previous assignment ended two months earlier. The current assignment began one week prior to the week Thanksgiving Day (Monday) occurs and ended the Thursday following the holiday. What are her entitlements with respect to the public holiday?

The employee was on assignment when the holiday occurred and would ordinarily have worked on the day the holiday fell (pursuant to their assignment) and so is entitled to Thanksgiving Day as a day off with public holiday pay for the day – see s. 26(1).

The employee will pass the last and first day test if they worked the Thursday prior to the holiday as well as the Tuesday following the holiday, or had reasonable cause if they failed to work either of those days as per s. 26(2).

The public holiday pay would be calculated as the regular wages earned and vacation pay payable in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred, divided by 20 – see ESA Part X, s. 24(1). Assume that the public holiday occurs after July 1, 2018, so that s. 24(1)(a) does not apply in this example.

Note that if the employee had taken more than one assignment from the agency in the four work weeks before the holiday, the calculation of public holiday pay would have been based on the total regular wages earned and vacation pay payable in respect of both of those assignments.

Example 2: Employee not on assignment and "not available for work" when the holiday falls

An assignment employee was hired by a temporary help agency on October 1, 2017. Their most recent assignment ended on July 15, 2018 and at the end of August 2018, they advised the agency that because of other commitments they would not be prepared to accept any new assignments until the beginning of October 2018. What are this employee's entitlements with respect to Labour Day, (the first Monday in September)?

The assignment employee was an employee of the agency on Labour Day. Because they were not assigned to perform work for a client at that time, the holiday fell on a day that was not ordinarily a working day – see ESA Part X, s. 29(1).

Because they were not on an assignment on the day on which Labour Day fell they are on a lay-off pursuant to ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.10(1). ESA Part X, s. 29(2.1) applies to determine their entitlements. They are therefore entitled to public holiday pay for the day. However, as they had not earned any wages in the four work weeks before Labour Day, their public holiday pay is $0.

Example 3: Employee on assignment but holiday on a day not ordinarily a working day

An employee was on an assignment from January 15 to May 1 and was scheduled to work only Tuesdays and Thursdays of each week. What are their entitlements with respect to the public holidays that fell during this assignment?

There were two public holidays during this assignment: Family Day (Monday) and Good Friday (Friday).

Because Mondays and Fridays were not days that the employee was ordinarily scheduled to work pursuant to their assignment, their public holiday entitlements would be determined under ESA Part X, s. 29.

As they were on an assignment from January 15 to May 1 when the holidays fell they are not considered to be on a lay-off pursuant to ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.10(1) for the purposes of s. 29(2.1).

As a result, s. 29(1) applies and they are entitled to a substitute day off for both Family Day and Good Friday with public holiday pay calculated as if the substitute days were the public holidays. This means that the substitute holiday takes the place of the public holiday. Therefore, the formula to be used for calculating public holiday pay for the substitute holiday would be the formula that is in effect on the date of the substitute holiday.

As per s. 29(2) the substitute days must be scheduled within three months following the public holidays or within 12 months if the employee and employer agree. As per s. 29(2.1), the employer must provide the employee with a written statement that sets out the date of the day that is substituted for the public holiday.

ESA Part X Section 27 – Agreement to Work, Ordinarily a Working Day

Agreement to Work, Ordinarily a Working Day – s. 27(1)

27(1) An employee and employer may agree that the employee will work on a public holiday that would ordinarily be a working day for that employee, and if they do, section 26 does not apply to the employee.

This section provides an exception to the entitlement in ESA Part X, s. 26, which provides employees with the right to the public holiday off with public holiday pay if the holiday falls on a day that is ordinarily an employee's working day and the employee is not on vacation. Section 27(1) allows such employees and their employers to agree that the employee will work on the public holiday. If an agreement is reached, the entitlements set out in s. 27(2) will apply instead of those set out in s. 26.

Any agreement that the employee will work on the public holiday must be in writing. See ESA Part 1, s. 1(3) and (3.1) for a discussion of agreements and voluntary consent. The agreement must be reached prior to the date of the public holiday.

If an employee works on a public holiday but there is no proper written agreement in place, the "alternate" standard of s. 27 will not apply and, accordingly, the employee's entitlement will be determined under the "default" standard of s. 26. This is so even if there was an oral agreement that the employee would work on the public holiday - see the discussion of the written agreement requirements at ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and s. 1(3.1). The ESA 2000 permits employees and employers to opt into the alternate standard of s. 27 only where there is a written agreement. Where there is no written agreement, the default standard of s. 26 will apply to the employee. In this case, an officer would apply the requirements of s. 26 when determining what violations have occurred. The requirements of s. 26 are:

1. The employee receives the public holiday off; and
2. The employee be paid public holiday pay.

For example, where an employee worked on a public holiday without providing their written agreement and was paid their regular rate, the officer could find that there has been a non-monetary violation of the requirement that the employee receive the public holiday off, and a monetary violation of the requirement that the employee be paid public holiday pay.

In determining how much money the employer owes the employee, the amount of public holiday pay owing would NOT be offset by the amount of wages earned by the employee for working on the holiday. The employee earned those wages for working and must be paid in addition to the amount of public holiday pay owing. This would be so even if the employer paid the employee a higher rate for working on the public holiday, such as 1.5 times the employee's regular rate. Again, the higher rate of wages was earned by the employee for working on the public holiday and must be paid in addition to the amount of public holiday pay owing.

Note that this section applies to employees in all operations, including hospitals, continuous operations, and hotels, motels, tourist resorts, restaurants and taverns, who agree to work on a public holiday that falls on a day that is ordinarily a working day for them. Employees who are employed in a hospital, continuous operation, or hotel, motel, tourist resort, restaurant or tavern who are required to work on a public holiday that is ordinarily a working day for the employee and that is a day the employee is not on vacation are governed by ESA Part X, s. 28.

Employee's Entitlement – s. 27(2)

27(2) Subject to subsections (3) and (4), if an employer and an employee make an agreement under subsection (1),

(a) the employer shall pay to the employee wages at his or her regular rate for the hours worked on the public holiday and substitute another day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee to take off work and for which he or she shall be paid public holiday pay as if the substitute day were a public holiday; or

(b) if the employee and the employer agree, the employer shall pay to the employee public holiday pay for the day plus premium pay for each hour worked on that day.

This section sets out to what an employee who agreed to work on a public holiday pursuant to s. 27(1) is entitled.

The default entitlement for such an employee is:

- Wages paid at the employee's regular rate for each hour worked on the public holiday – see the definition in ESA Part I, s. 1

  plus

- A substitute holiday:
  - For which the employee must be paid public holiday pay. This means that the substitute holiday takes the place of the public holiday. Therefore, the formula to be used for calculating public holiday pay for the substitute holiday would be the formula that is in effect on the date of the substitute holiday. See ESA Part X, s. 24 for the calculation of public holiday pay;
  - Which must be scheduled for a day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee; and
  - Which must be scheduled for a day before the deadlines set out in s. 27(3) – see ESA Part X, s. 26.

  plus

- A written statement setting out specifics about the substitute holiday, as outlined in section 27(2.1).

However, if an employer and employee agree in writing, the employee is entitled to public holiday pay plus premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday, rather than to the default entitlement.

See ESA Part I, s. 1(3) for a discussion of agreements in writing.

See ESA Part X, s. 24 for the calculation of public holiday pay and premium pay.

If the employee does not agree in writing to receive public holiday pay plus premium pay, then the entitlement in s. 27(2)(a) will apply. The alternate entitlement of s. 27(2)(b) applies only if there is such a written agreement. If there is no such written agreement, the default entitlement of s. 27(2)(a) will apply. This assumes that there was a written agreement in place for the employee to work on the holiday, as required by s. 27(1). If there was no written agreement to work on the holiday, then the default standard of s. 26 will apply, rather than s. 27. See ESA Part X, s. 26 for more details.

The entitlements described above are subject to s. 27(4), discussed below.

Substitute Day of Holiday – s. 27(2.1)

(2.1) If a day is substituted for a public holiday under clause (2) (a), the employer shall provide the employee with a written statement, before the public holiday, that sets out,

(a) the public holiday on which the employee will work;

(b) the date of the day that is substituted for a public holiday under clause (2) (a); and

(c) the date on which the statement is provided to the employee.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22, added s. 27(2.1) to the ESA 2000, effective January 1, 2018. Where the employee has agreed to work on a public holiday and the employer is substituting the public holiday in accordance with s. 27(2) (a), this section requires the employer to provide the employee with a written statement:

- Naming the public holiday on which the employee has agreed to work,
- Specifying the date that has been selected to be the substitute holiday, and
- Noting the date on which the employee was given the statement.

The written statement must be provided to the employee before the actual public holiday. The legislation does not specify the manner in which the written statement must be provided. Consistent with the Program's position regarding the provision of the poster under ESA Part III, s. 2(5), an employer may provide the statement as a printed copy or as an attachment in an email to the employee.

There is no requirement for the parties to sign the written statement, nor is there a requirement for the employee to agree to the date of the substitute holiday, so long as it is a day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee and that it is scheduled for a day before the deadlines set out in s. 27(3), discussed below.

Restriction – s. 27(3)

27(3) A day that is substituted for a public holiday under clause (2)(a) shall be,

(a) a day that is no more than three months after the public holiday; or

(b) if the employee and the employer agree, a day that is no more than 12 months after the public holiday.

This section establishes a deadline for scheduling a substitute holiday an employee earns pursuant to s. 27(2)(a).

The section states that the employer must schedule the substitute holiday (which, pursuant to s. 27(2)(a), must be set for a day that is ordinarily a working day for the employee) for a day that is no later than three months after the date of the public holiday.

The substitute day can be taken before the actual public holiday itself. For example, Canada Day is on a Tuesday. It is not a violation of the ESA 2000 for an employee who has agreed in writing to work on Canada Day to be given Monday, June 30, as the substitute holiday. If the employer and employee agree in writing, the substitute holiday can be scheduled for a day that is up to 12 months after the date of the public holiday. An employee may wish to extend the three-month deadline if, for example, they want to tack the substitute holiday on to their next vacation but the vacation is more than three months away. See ESA Part 1, s. 1(3) and (3.1) for a discussion of written agreements and voluntary consent.

The written agreement contemplated in s. 27(3)(b) must be made prior to the public holiday as the employer is required under s. 27(2.1) to give the employee a written statement setting out the date of the substitute day.

Where Certain Work Not Performed – s. 27(4)

27(4) The employee's entitlement under subsection (2) is subject to the following rules:

1. If the employee, without reasonable cause, performs none of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday, the employee has no entitlement under subsection (2).

2. If the employee, with reasonable cause, performs none of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday, the employer shall give the employee a substitute day off work in accordance with clause (2) (a) or, if an agreement was made under clause (2) (b), public holiday pay for the public holiday. However, if the employee also fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before the public holiday or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, the employee has no entitlement under subsection (2).

3. If the employee performs some of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday but fails, without reasonable cause, to perform all of it, the employer shall give the employee premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday but the employee has no other entitlement under subsection (2).

4. If the employee performs some of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday but fails, with reasonable cause, to perform all of it, the employer shall give the employee wages at his or her regular rate for the hours worked on the public holiday and a substitute day off work in accordance with clause (2) (a) or, if an agreement was made under clause (2)(b), public holiday pay for the public holiday plus premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

However, if the employee also fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before the public holiday or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, the employer shall give the employee premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday but the employee has no other entitlement under subsection (2).

5. If the employee performs all of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday but fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, the employer shall give the employee premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday but the employee has no other entitlement under subsection (2).

This section simply sets out the entitlements for an employee who agreed in writing to work on the public holiday pursuant to s. 27(1), but who fails to perform certain work.

Every situation that impacts on an employee's entitlement is covered. That is, this provision sets out the consequences in the event of any of the following circumstances, whether they occur on their own or in combination with one another:

- Performs only some of the work on a public holiday that the employee had agreed to perform:
    - With reasonable cause; or
    - Without reasonable cause.

ii. Performs none of the work on a public holiday that the employee had agreed to perform:

- With reasonable cause;
- Without reasonable cause.

iii. Does not work the entire regularly scheduled days of work before or after the public holiday without reasonable cause.

In the discussion below:

- "Substitute holiday" is a day off that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee, for which the employee is entitled to receive public holiday pay – see ss. 27(2) and (3)
- "Public holiday pay" is as calculated pursuant to ESA Part X, s. 24(1)
- "Premium pay" is as calculated pursuant to ESA Part X, s. 24(2)
- See ESA Part X, s. 26(2) for a discussion of the phrase "fail to work all of [the employee's] regularly scheduled day of work [before/after] the public holiday".
- See ESA Part X, s. 26(2) for a discussion of the term "reasonable cause". That discussion takes places in the context of the criterion of failure to work the regularly scheduled day before or after a public holiday, but applies equally to the criterion of failure to work on the public holiday.

The statutory phrases, "performs none of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday" and "performs some of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday but fails . . . to perform all of it" do not refer to the quantity or quality of the employee's work. Rather, it refers to whether the employee worked the whole shift, part of the shift, or none of the shift they agreed to work on the public holiday.

For example, an employee who agreed to work an eight-hour shift on Canada Day and who usually assembles 100 widgets during an eight-hour shift will not be considered to have performed only some of the work merely because they assembled only 80 widgets on Canada Day. So long as the employee worked through the entire eight-hour shift, they will have performed all of the work they agreed to perform on the holiday.

The situations and consequences addressed in each of the five paragraphs in s. 27(4) are as follows:

Performs none of the work on public holiday without reasonable

Employee performs none of the work on the public holiday, (i.e., did not show up at all for the shift, without reasonable cause: Employee has no entitlement.

Pursuant to s. 27(4) paragraph 1, the employee has no entitlement of any sort under s. 27(2): not to a substitute holiday, to public holiday pay or to premium pay. When the employee entered into the s. 27(1) agreement, the general entitlement under ESA Part X, s. 26 ceased to apply to that employee.

Performs none of the work on public holiday with reasonable cause

Works last regularly scheduled day of work

Employee performs none of the work on the public holiday, (i.e., did not show up at all for the shift), with reasonable cause, employee entitled to:

- Substitute holiday;

  OR

- Public holiday pay if employee earlier agreed to be paid public holiday pay and premium pay for each hour they were going to work on the public holiday instead of receiving a substitute holiday

Pursuant to s. 27(4) paragraph 2, the employee is entitled to a substitute holiday or public holiday pay if the employee agreed to be paid public holiday pay and premium pay instead of receiving a substitute holiday.

Fails to work last or first regularly scheduled day of work

Employee:

- Performs none of the work on the public holiday, (i.e., did not show up at all for the shift), with reasonable cause;

  and

- Fails to work all of the last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, without reasonable cause:

Employee has no entitlement.

Pursuant to s. 27(4) paragraph 2, the employee has no entitlement of any sort: not to a substitute holiday, to public holiday pay or to premium pay. When the employee entered into the s. 27(1) agreement, the general entitlement under ESA Part X, s. 26 ceased to apply to that employee.

Performs only some of the work on public holiday without reasonable cause

Employee performs some but not all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday, (i.e., showed up for only part of the shift), without reasonable cause: Employee entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Pursuant to s. 27(4) paragraph 3, the employee is entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday. They have no other entitlements to public holiday pay or a substitute holiday.

Performs only some of the work on public holiday with reasonable cause

Works last regularly scheduled day of work

Employee performs some but not all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday, (i.e., showed up for only part of the shift), with reasonable cause, employee entitled to:

- Wages at employee's regular rate for each hour worked on the public holiday PLUS a substitute holiday;

  OR

- Public holiday pay PLUS premium pay for each hour worked on the holiday if the employee earlier agreed to be paid public holiday pay plus premium pay for each hour they were going to work on the public holiday instead of receiving a substitute holiday.

Pursuant to s. 27(4) paragraph 4, the employee is entitled to wages at their regular rate plus a substitute holiday, or public holiday pay plus premium pay if the employee agreed to they were going to work on the public holiday instead of receiving a substitute holiday.

Fails to work last or first regularly scheduled day of work

Employee:

- Performs some but not all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday, (i.e., showed up for only part of the shift), with reasonable cause;

  and

- Fails to work all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, without reasonable cause:

Employee entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Pursuant to s. 27(4) paragraph 4, the employee is only entitled to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday. They have no other entitlements.

Performs all work on public holiday but fails to work last or first regularly scheduled day of work

Employee:

- Performs all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday (i.e. showed up for the entire shift);

  BUT

- Fails to work all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, without reasonable cause:

Employee entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Pursuant to s. 27(4) paragraph 5, the employee is entitled only to premium pay. They have no other entitlements

NOTE: An employee who is entitled to a substitute holiday pursuant to s. 27(2)(a) does not lose that entitlement if they fail without reasonable cause to work all of their regularly last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the substitute holiday. An employee does not have to "requalify" for the substitute holiday once they have already earned it.

ESA Part X Section 28 – Requirement to Work on a Public Holiday: Certain Operations

Requirement to Work on a Public Holiday: Certain Operations – s. 28(1)

28(1) If an employee is employed in a hospital, a continuous operation, or a hotel, motel, tourist resort, restaurant or tavern, the employer may require the employee to work on a public holiday that is ordinarily a working day for the employee and that is not a day on which the employee is on vacation, and if the employer does so, sections 26 and 27 do not apply to the employee.

This section provides a second exception to the entitlement in ESA Part X, s. 26(1) to a public holiday off with public holiday pay. The first exception is found in ESA Part X, s. 27. Section 28(1) allows some flexibility in certain operations that cannot reasonably be expected to shut down on public holidays, and permits employers to require employees in these operations to work on a public holiday. The entitlement for an employee in these operations who is required to work on a public holiday is set out in s. 28(2).

The terms "hospital" and "continuous operation" are defined in ESA Part I, s. 1.

In order for s. 28 to apply, the employee must be employed "in" a hospital, continuous operation, hotel, motel, tourist resort, restaurant or tavern. A question has arisen as to whether s. 28 will apply to employees who work for a call centre that deals exclusively with making hotel reservations. It is Program policy that s. 28 will not apply in that case (assuming that the call centre is not actually located in the hotel, and assuming that the call centre is not a continuous operation), since such employees are employed in a call centre, not in a hotel.

Note that the employer's ability to require employees in these operations to work on the public holiday applies only if the holiday falls on a day that is ordinarily a working day for that employee and is a day the employee is not on vacation. If the holiday falls on a day that is not ordinarily a working day for the employee in these operations, or on a day the employee is on vacation, ESA Part X, s. 29 applies and the employee has a choice of whether or not to work on the holiday, if requested – see ESA Part X, s. 26(1) for a discussion on how to determine whether or not a public holiday falls on a day that is ordinarily a working day for an employee who has an irregular schedule.

Note also that Part XVII Retail Business Establishments has the effect of granting some of the above employees the right to refuse to work on a public holiday, if they work in a retail business establishment, despite s. 28(1). Specifically, "retail" employees who work in a continuous operation (e.g., a 24-hour convenience store) have the right to refuse to work on public holidays, even if the holiday falls on a day that is ordinarily their working day. For further discussion, please refer to ESA Part XVII Retail Business Establishments.

Further note that the employer's ability to require employees to work on a public holiday is also subject to the employee's right to take a day off for purposes of religious observance under the Ontario Human Rights Code, RSO 1990, c H.19, and to the terms of the employee's employment contract, which may state, for example, that an employee cannot be required to work on public holidays (and, as well, the requirements in the ESA 2000 regarding hours of work and daily and weekly/bi-weekly rest provisions).

Employee's Entitlement – s. 28(2)

28(2) Subject to subsections (3) and (4), if an employer requires an employee to work on a public holiday under subsection (1), the employer shall,

(a) pay to the employee wages at his or her regular rate for the hours worked on the public holiday and substitute another day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee to take off work and for which he or she shall be paid public holiday pay as if the substitute day were a public holiday; or

(b) pay to the employee public holiday pay for the day plus premium pay for each hour worked on that day.

This section sets out what an employee who is required to work on a public holiday pursuant to s. 28(1) is entitled to.

The entitlement for such an employee is either:

- Wages paid at the employee's regular rate (see ESA Part I, s.1 – Definitions) for each hour worked on the public holiday, plus a substitute holiday:
    - For which the employee must be paid public holiday pay. This means that the substitute holiday takes the place of the public holiday. Therefore, the formula to be used for calculating public holiday pay for the substitute holiday would be the formula that is in effect on the date of the substitute holiday. See ESA Part X, s. 24(1) for the calculation of public holiday pay;
    - Which must be scheduled for a day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee; and
    - Which must be scheduled for a day before the deadlines set out in s. 28(3);

    plus

- A written statement setting out specifics about the substitute holiday, as outlined in section 28(2.1)

    OR

- Public holiday pay for the day plus premium pay for each hour worked on the holiday – see ESA Part X, s. 24

The employer chooses which of the options above to provide the employee. This feature of s. 28 distinguishes it from the entitlements under s. 27 and s. 30, where the first option is the default entitlement and the second option applies only if the employee agrees in writing.

The entitlement in s. 28(2) is subject to s. 28(4).

An issue has arisen as to the appropriate remedy where an employer requires an employee to work on the public holiday but neither provides a substitute holiday, nor pays the employee premium pay or public holiday pay. The question is which clause - (a) or (b) - should the officer assess under. In these cases, the officer looks for evidence as to whether the employer provided the employee with a written statement setting out the day that was to be substituted for the public holiday as required by s. 28(2.1). If there was no statement provided to the employee, it is Program policy that the officer will assess under clause (b).

If the officer assesses under clause (a), they will not be able to order a substitute holiday for the employee if the three-month deadline for taking the substitute holiday has already passed, because to do so would not be in accordance with s. 28(3)(a) - although the parties could, of course, agree to such a result on their own.

Substitute Day of Holiday – s. 28(2.1)

(2.1) If a day is substituted for a public holiday under clause (2) (a), the employer shall provide the employee with a written statement, before the public holiday, that sets out,

(a) the public holiday on which the employee will work;

(b) the date of the day that is substituted for a public holiday under clause (2) (a); and

(c) the date on which the statement is provided to the employee.

Subsection 28(2.1) is a new provision added by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22, effective January 1, 2018. Where the employee has agreed to work on a public holiday and the employer is substituting the public holiday in accordance with s. 28(2)(a), this section requires the employer to provide the employee with a written statement:

a) Naming the public holiday on which the employee is required to work,

b) Specifying the date that has been selected to be the substitute holiday, and

c) Noting the date on which the employee was given the statement.

The written statement must be provided to the employee before the actual public holiday. The legislation does not specify the manner in which the written statement must be provided. Consistent with the Program's position regarding the provision of the poster under ESA Part II, s. 2(5), an employer may provide the statement as a printed copy or as an attachment in an email to the employee.

There is no requirement for the parties to sign the written statement, nor is there a requirement for the employee to agree to the date of the substitute holiday, so long as it is a day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee and that it is scheduled for a day before the deadlines set out in s. 28(3).

Restriction – s. 28(3)

28(3) A day that is substituted for a public holiday under clause (2) (a) shall be,

(a) a day that is no more than three months after the public holiday; or

(b) if the employee and the employer agree, a day that is no more than 12 months after the public holiday.

This section establishes a deadline for scheduling a substitute holiday an employee earns pursuant to s. 28(2)(a).

The section states that the employer must schedule the substitute holiday (which, pursuant to s. 28(2)(a), must be set for a day that is ordinarily a working day for the employee) for a day that is no later than three months after the date of the public holiday.

The substitute day can be taken before the actual public holiday itself. For example, Canada Day is on a Tuesday. It is not a violation of the ESA 2000 for an employee who was required to work on Canada Day to be given June 30, for example, as the substitute holiday.

If the employer and employee agree in writing, the substitute holiday can be scheduled for a day that is up to 12 months after the date of the public holiday. See ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and (3.1) regarding agreements in writing. An employee may wish to extend the three-month deadline if, for example, they want to tack the substitute holiday on to their next vacation but the vacation is more than three months away.

The written agreement contemplated in s. 28(3)(b) must be made prior to the public holiday as the employer is required under s. 28(2.1) to give the employee a written statement setting out the date of the substitute day. See ESA Part 1, s. 1(3) for a discussion of issues surrounding agreements, e.g., retroactivity, specificity, and requirements regarding informed and voluntary consent.

Where Certain Work Not Performed – s. 28(4)

28(4) The employee's entitlement under subsection (2) is subject to the following rules:

1. If the employee, without reasonable cause, performs none of the work that he or she was required to perform on the public holiday, the employee has no entitlement under subsection (2).

2. If the employee, with reasonable cause, performs none of the work that he or she was required to perform on the public holiday, the employer shall give the employee a substitute day off work in accordance with clause (2) (a) or public holiday pay for the public holiday under clause (2)(b), as the employer chooses. However, if the employee also fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before the public holiday or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, the employee has no entitlement under subsection (2).

3. If the employee performs some of the work that he or she was required to perform on the public holiday but fails, without reasonable cause, to perform all of it, he or she is entitled to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday but has no other entitlement under subsection (2).

4. If the employee performs some of the work that he or she was required to perform on the public holiday but fails, with reasonable cause, to perform all of it, the employer shall give the employee wages at his or her regular rate for the hours worked on the public holiday and a substitute day off work in accordance with clause (2) (a) or public holiday pay for the public holiday plus premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday under clause (2)(b), as the employer chooses. However, if the employee also fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before the public holiday or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, the employer shall give the employee premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday but the employee has no other entitlement under subsection (2).

5. If the employee performs all of the work that he or she was required to perform on the public holiday but fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, the employer shall give the employee premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday but the employee has no other entitlement under subsection (2).

This section sets out the entitlements for an employee who was required to work on the public holiday pursuant to s. 28(1), but who fails to perform certain work.

Every situation that impacts on an employee's entitlement is covered. That is, this provision sets out the consequences in the event of any of the following circumstances, whether they occur on their own or in combination with one another:

- Performs only some of the work on a public holiday that the employee was required to perform:
    - With reasonable cause; or
    - Without reasonable cause.
- Performs none of the work on a public holiday that the employee was required to perform:
    - With reasonable cause; or
    - Without reasonable cause.
- Does not work the entire regularly scheduled days before or after the public holiday without reasonable cause.

In the discussion below:

- "Substitute holiday" is a day off that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee, for which the employee is entitled to receive public holiday pay – see ESA Part X, ss. 28(2) and (3).
- "Public holiday pay" is as calculated pursuant to ESA Part X, s. 24(1).
- "Premium pay" is as calculated pursuant to ESA Part X, s. 24(2).
- See ESA Part X, s. 26(2) for a discussion of the phrase "fail to work all of [the employee's] regularly scheduled day of work [before/after] the public holiday".
- See ESA Part X, s. 26(2) for a discussion of the term "reasonable cause". That discussion takes places in the context of the criterion of failure to work the regularly scheduled day before and after a public holiday, but applies equally to the criterion of failure to work on the public holiday.

The statutory phrases, "performs none of the work that he or she required to perform on the public holiday" and "performs some of the work that he or she required to perform on the public holiday but fails . . . to perform all of it," does not refer to the quantity or quality of the employee's work. Rather, it refers to whether the employee worked the whole shift, part of the shift, or none of the shift they were required to work on the public holiday.

For example, an employee who was required to work an eight-hour shift on Canada Day and who usually assembles 100 widgets during an eight-hour shift will not be considered to have performed only some of the work merely because they assembled only 80 widgets on Canada Day. So long as the employee worked the entire eight-hour shift, they will have performed all of the work they were required to perform on the holiday.

The situations and consequences addressed in each of the five paragraphs in s. 28(4) are:

Performs none of the work on public holiday without reasonable cause

Employee performs none of the work on the public holiday, (i.e., did not show up at all for the shift), without reasonable cause, employee has no entitlement.

Pursuant to s. 28(4), paragraph 1, the employee has no entitlement of any sort: not to a substitute holiday, to public holiday pay or to premium pay. When the employee was required to work on the public holiday, ESA Part X, s. 26 and s. 27 and the entitlements available under those provisions no longer applied to that employee.

Performs none of the work on public holiday with reasonable cause

Works last regularly scheduled day of work

Employee performs none of the work on the public holiday, (i.e., did not show up at all for the shift), with reasonable cause, employee entitled to:

i. Substitute holiday;

OR

ii. Public holiday pay

Pursuant to s. 28(4) paragraph 2, the employer chooses which to give the employee: a substitute holiday or public holiday pay.

Fails to work last or first regularly scheduled day of work

Employee:

- Performs none of the work on the public holiday, (i.e., did not show up at all for the shift), with reasonable cause;

  AND

- Fails to work all of the last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, without reasonable cause:

Employee has no entitlement.

Pursuant to s. 28(4) paragraph 2, the employee has no entitlement of any sort: not to a substitute holiday, to public holiday pay or to premium pay. When the employee was required to work pursuant to s. 28(1), s. 26 and s. 27 and the entitlements available under those provisions no longer applied.

Performs only some of the work on public holiday without reasonable cause

Employee performs some but not all of the work they were required to perform on the public holiday (i.e., showed up for only part of the shift) without reasonable cause:

Employee entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Pursuant to s. 28(4) paragraph 3, the employee is entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday. They have no other entitlements - not to public holiday pay or to a substitute holiday.

Performs only some of the work on public holiday with reasonable cause

Works last regularly scheduled day of work

Employee performs some but not all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday, (i.e., showed up for only part of the shift), with reasonable cause, employee entitled to:

i. Wages at employee's regular rate for each hour worked on the public holiday PLUS a substitute holiday;

OR

ii. Public holiday pay PLUS premium pay for each hour worked on the holiday.

Pursuant to s. 28(4) paragraph 4, the employer chooses which to give the employee: wages at the regular rate plus a substitute holiday, or public holiday pay plus premium pay.

Fails to work last or first regularly scheduled day of work

Employee:

- Performs some but not all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday, (i.e., showed up for only part of the shift), with reasonable cause;

  AND

- Fails to work all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, without reasonable cause:

Employee entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Pursuant to s. 28(4) paragraph 4, the employee is only entitled to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Performs all work on public holiday but fails to work last or first regularly scheduled day of work

Employee:

- Performs all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday (i.e., showed up for the entire shift);

BUT

- Fails to work all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, without reasonable cause:

Employee entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Pursuant to s. 28(4) paragraph 5, the employee is only entitled to premium pay for each hours worked on the public holiday.

NOTE: An employee who is entitled to a substitute holiday pursuant to s. 28(2)(a) does not lose that entitlement if they fail without reasonable cause to work all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the substitute holiday. An employee does not have to "requalify" for the substitute holiday once they have already earned it.

ESA Part X Section 29 – Public Holiday Not Ordinarily a Working Day

Public Holiday Not Ordinarily a Working Day – s. 29(1)

29(1) If a public holiday falls on a day that would not ordinarily be a working day for an employee or a day on which the employee is on vacation, the employer shall substitute another day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee to take off work and for which he or she shall be paid public holiday pay as if the substitute day were a public holiday.

This provision sets out an employee's entitlement when a public holiday falls on a day that is not ordinarily the employee's working day, or is during the employee's vacation.

This provision applies to employees in all operations, including hospitals, continuous operations, and hotels, motels, tourist resorts, restaurants and taverns. See Part X, ss. 26-28 for the entitlements if a public holiday falls on a day that is ordinarily an employee's working day and that is not during an employee's vacation.

It is not always readily apparent which days are ordinarily working days for a given employee. Whether or not a holiday falls on a day that is ordinarily a working day for an employee will determine what the employee is entitled to for the holiday, and, in certain industries, whether or not the employer can require the employee to work on the holiday. For example, the question has arisen in the restaurant industry as to how to determine which days are ordinarily working days for part-time employees who have irregular shifts. It is Program policy that to make this determination, one looks at the days that the employee tells the employer that they are available to work and the past scheduling practice. For example, an employee is hired on the basis that they are available to work Mondays through Fridays, and is actually scheduled to work on each of those days (although not on any regular basis, e.g., Monday and Tuesday one week, Tuesday and Friday the next week, Wednesday and Thursday the next week, etc.). In this case, the Program would consider Mondays through Fridays to be days that would ordinarily be working days for that employee. However, if that same employee is only ever scheduled to work Tuesdays and Thursdays, the Program would consider only Tuesdays and Thursdays to be days that would ordinarily be working days for that employee, even though they said they were available all weekdays.

For employees who are on lay-off, a leave under ESA Part XIV, or any other leave of absence when a public holiday occurs, their pre-leave or pre-lay-off schedule determines whether the public holiday falls on a day that would or would not ordinarily be a working day for an employee, and thus whether s. 26 or s. 29 will apply to that particular public holiday. For example, if an employee on parental leave worked Mondays to Fridays before the leave, Mondays to Fridays are days that are ordinarily working days for that employee, and Saturdays and Sundays are days that would not ordinarily be working days for that employee. Consequently, s. 26 will apply to any public holiday that falls on a weekday during that employee's leave, and s. 29 will apply to any public holiday that falls on a weekend during that employee's leave.

Some employees may have had a varying, irregular schedule before their leave or lay-off, such that it cannot be determined whether or not the employee would have been scheduled to work on the day the public holiday falls. In this case, because there are no days that, in the words of s. 26, "would ordinarily be a working day for" that employee, s. 29 will apply to any public holiday that occurs during the leave or lay-off.

See ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.10 for a discussion of the application of Part X to assignment employees of temporary help agencies, particularly the Program's policy that a public holiday will be considered to fall on a day that is ordinarily a working day for an assignment employee only if the employee is on assignment and the holiday falls on a day that they would be working pursuant to the assignment (assuming there had been no holiday). In that case only, s. 26, 27 or 28 would apply to determine an assignment employee's public holiday entitlements. In all other cases, s. 29 would apply. Note that s. 29(2.1) and s. 29(2.2) must be read together with s. 74.10.

When a public holiday falls on a day that is not ordinarily an employee's working day or is during an employee's vacation, the employee is to be given a substitute day off, which must be:

- Scheduled for a day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee;
- Paid as public holiday pay. This means that the substitute holiday takes the place of the public holiday. Therefore, the formula to be used for calculating public holiday pay for the substitute holiday would be the formula that is in effect on the date of the substitute holiday. See ESA Part X, s. 24(1) for the calculation of public holiday pay; and
- Scheduled for a day before the deadlines set out in s. 29(2).

In addition, the employer must provide the employee a written statement setting out specifics about the substitute holiday, as outlined in s. 29(1.1) below.

The entitlement to a substitute day under s. 29 is subject to:

- Section 29(2.1), which states that an employee who is on pregnancy or parental leave or lay-off when a public holiday falls will get public holiday pay for the public holiday, rather than a substitute day;
- Section 29(3), which allows employers and employees to agree in writing that the employee will be paid public holiday pay for the holiday instead of receiving a substitute day;
- Section 29(4), which disentitles an employee from a substitute day and public holiday pay if they fail without reasonable cause to work all of their regularly scheduled shifts before or after the public holiday; and
- Section 30(1), which allows employers and employees to agree in writing that an employee will work on a public holiday that falls on a day that is not ordinarily a working day for the employee or is a day that is during their vacation.

Substitute Day of Holiday – s. 29(1.1)

29(1.1) If a day is substituted for a public holiday under subsection (1), the employer shall provide the employee with a written statement, before the public holiday, that sets out,

(a) the public holiday that is being substituted

(b) the date of the day that is substituted for a public holiday under subsection (1); and

(c) the date on which the statement is provided to the employee.

Subsection 29(1.1) is a new provision added by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22, effective January 1, 2018. Where the employer is substituting the public holiday in accordance with s. 29(1), this section requires the employer to provide the employee with a written statement:

d) Naming the public holiday that is being substituted,
e) Specifying the date that has been selected to be the substitute holiday, and
f) Noting the date on which the employee was given the statement.

The written statement must be provided to the employee before the actual public holiday. The legislation does not specify the manner in which the written statement must be provided. Consistent with the Program's position regarding the provision of the poster under ESA Part II, s. 2(5), an employer may provide the statement as a printed copy or as an attachment in an email to the employee.

There is no requirement for the parties to sign the written statement, nor is there a requirement for the employee to agree to the date of the substitute holiday, so long as it is a day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee and that it is scheduled for a day before the deadlines set out in ESA Part X, s. 29(2).

Restriction – s. 29(2)

29(2) A day that is substituted for a public holiday under subsection (1) shall be,

(a) a day that is no more than three months after the public holiday; or

(b) if the employee and the employer agree, a day that is no more than 12 months after the public holiday.

This section establishes a deadline for scheduling a substitute holiday an employee earns pursuant to s. 29(1).

The section states that the employer must schedule the substitute holiday (which, pursuant to s. 29(1), must be set for a day that is ordinarily a working day for the employee) for a day that is no later than three months from the date of the public holiday.

The substitute day can be taken before the actual public holiday itself. For example, Canada Day is on a Saturday. It is not a violation of the Act for an employee whose ordinary working days are Mondays to Fridays to be given Friday, June 30, as the substitute holiday.

If the employer and employee agree in writing, the substitute holiday can be scheduled for a day that is up to 12 months after the date of the public holiday. See ESA Part I, ss. 1(3) and (3.1) for a discussion of written agreements. An employee may wish to extend the three-month deadline if, for example, they want to tack the substitute holiday on to their next vacation but the vacation is more than three months away.

The written agreement contemplated in s. 29(2)(b) must be signed prior to the public holiday as the employer is required under s. 29(1.1) to give the employee a written statement setting out the date of the substitute day.

Employee on Leave or Lay-off – s. 29(2.1)

29(2.1) If a public holiday falls on a day that would not ordinarily be a working day for an employee and the employee is on a leave of absence under section 46 or 48 or on a layoff on that day, the employee is entitled to public holiday pay for the day but has no other entitlement under this Part with respect to the public holiday.

This section provides that where an employee is on a pregnancy leave, parental leave, or lay-off when a public holiday falls, and it falls on a day that is not ordinarily a working day for that employee, the employee is entitled only to public holiday pay for the holiday, rather than to the substitute day with public holiday pay provided for in s. 29(1).

Note that s. 29(2.1) does not apply to an employee on a Part XIV leave other than pregnancy or parental leave. Thus, if an employee is on sick leave, family responsibility leave, bereavement leave, family medical leave, family caregiver leave, critical illness leave, domestic or sexual violence leave, crime-related child disappearance leave, child death leave, reservist leave, organ donor leave, or emergency leave when a public holiday falls and it falls on a day that would not ordinarily be a working day for the employee, the employee will be entitled to the substitute day with public holiday pay provided by s. 29(1).

Note also that because the amount of public holiday pay owing is based on the wages earned by an employee in the four work weeks prior to the public holiday, the amount of public holiday pay to which an employee who was on pregnancy or parental leave or lay-off for any time during those four weeks will be less than what the employee's entitlement would have been had the employee not been on leave or lay-off for any part of those four weeks.

In the case of an employee who is on lay-off (as opposed to pregnancy or parental leave), s. 29(2.1) must be read in conjunction with s. 29(2.2).

For information about the application of s. 29(2.1) to assignment employees of temporary help agencies, see ESA Part XVIII.1, s. 74.10.

Lay-off Resulting in Termination – s. 29(2.2)

29(2.2) Subsection (2.1) does not apply to an employee if his or her employment has been terminated under clause 56(1)(c) and the public holiday falls on or after the day on which the lay-off first exceeded the period of a temporary lay-off.

This section states that s. 29(2.1) will not apply to employees who are on lay-off if their employment has been terminated pursuant to ESA Part XV, s. 56(1)(c). For example, an employee is on lay-off for more than 13 weeks in any period of 20 consecutive weeks. None of the conditions in s. 56(2)(b) or (c) that would allow a lay-off to continue longer than 13 weeks are present. Pursuant to s. 56(1)(c), the employee is considered to be terminated. However, they may not be considered to be severed for the purposes of the severance pay provisions; they may still be on lay-off. In this circumstance, s. 29(2.2) states that s.

29(2.1) does not apply. As a result, s. 29(1) will apply and the employee will be entitled to a substitute day with public holiday pay. If the employment ends before the substitute day, ESA Part X, s. 32 would apply and the employee will just be entitled to public holiday pay.

The application of this section was clarified in respect of certain assignment employees of temporary help agencies by s. 74.10(2) on November 6, 2009 with the coming into force of the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Temporary Help Agencies) 2009, SO 2009, c 9. Pursuant to s. 74.2, Part XVIII.1 of the Act, which includes s. 74.10(2), does not apply to those assignment employees who provide professional services, personal support services or homemaking services as defined in the Home Care and Community Services Act, 1994 if the assignment is made under a contract between the employee or their employer and a community care access corporation within the meaning of the Community Care Access Corporations Act, 2001, SO 2001, c 33. As a result, the application of s. 29(2.2) is not clarified in respect of such employees by s. 74.10(2).

Section 74.10(2) provides that a period of temporary lay-off referred to in s. 29(2.2) is to be determined in accordance with s. 56 as that section is modified by s. 74.11 for the purposes of Part XV. For further discussion see ESA Part XVIII.1, s.74.10.

Agreement Re: Public Holiday Pay – s. 29(3)

29(3) An employer and an employee may agree that, instead of complying with subsection (1), the employer shall pay the employee public holiday pay for the public holiday, and if they do subsection (1) does not apply to the employee.

This section allows an employer and employee to agree in writing that an employee will be paid public holiday pay for a holiday instead of receiving a substitute day the employee would otherwise be entitled to pursuant to s. 29(1).

See ESA Part X, s. 24 for the calculation of public holiday pay.

Exception – s. 29(4)

29(4) The employee has no entitlement under subsection (1), (2.1) or (3) if he or she fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before the public holiday or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday.

This section provides that employees are not entitled to the entitlements under s. 29(1), (2.1) or s. 29(3) if they fail, without reasonable cause, to work their entire regularly scheduled day of work before or after the holiday.

This section is intended to discourage employees from unilaterally taking an extra day off around the public holiday by failing to show up on the day they are expected to work before or after the holiday, or by showing up to work later or leaving earlier than expected before or after the holiday.

This exception to the entitlement is identical in substance to s. 26(2). Please refer to ESA Part X, s. 26 for a discussion of this provision.

NOTE: An employee who is entitled to a substitute holiday pursuant to s. 29(1) does not lose that entitlement if they fail without reasonable cause to work all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the substitute holiday. An employee does not have to "requalify" for the substitute holiday once they have already earned it.

ESA Part X Section 30 - Agreement to Work Where Not Ordinarily a Working Day

Agreement to Work Where Not Ordinarily a Working Day - s. 30(1)

30(1) An employee and employer may agree that the employee will work on a public holiday that falls on a day that would not ordinarily be a working day for that employee or on a day on which the employee is on vacation, and if they do, section 29 does not apply to the employee.

This section provides an exception to the entitlement in ESA Part X, s. 29.

Section 29 provides employees (who are not on pregnancy or parental leave, or on lay-off) with the right to a substitute holiday or, if the employer and employee agree in writing, to public holiday pay for a holiday, when the public holiday falls on a day that is not ordinarily a working day for an employee or is on a day that the employee is on vacation. Section 30(1) allows employers and employees in these circumstances to agree that the employee will work on the public holiday. If an agreement is made, the entitlement in s. 30(2) will apply instead of those set out in s. 29.

The agreement to work on the public holiday must be in writing. See ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and (3.1) for information on this written requirement, and other issues regarding agreements, e.g., retroactivity, specificity, and requirements on informed and voluntary consent. The written agreement must be reached prior to the date of the public holiday.

Employee's Entitlement - s. 30(2)

30(2) Subject to subsections (3) and (4), if an employer and an employee make an agreement under subsection (1),

(a) the employer shall pay to the employee wages at his or her regular rate for the hours worked on the public holiday and substitute another day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee to take off work and for which he or she shall be paid public holiday pay as if the substitute day were a public holiday; or

(b) if the employer and employee agree, the employer shall pay the employee public holiday pay for the day plus premium pay for each hour worked.

This section sets out the entitlement of an employee who agreed to work on a public holiday that fell on a day that is not ordinarily a working day, pursuant to s. 30(1).

The default entitlement for such an employee is wages paid at the employee's "regular rate" (see ESA Part I, s. 1) for each hour worked on the public holiday, plus a substitute holiday:

- For which the employee must be paid public holiday pay. This means that the substitute holiday takes the place of the public holiday. Therefore, the formula to be used for calculating public holiday pay for the substitute holiday would be the formula that is in effect on the date of the substitute holiday. - see s. 24(1) for the calculation of public holiday pay;
- Which must be scheduled for a day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee; and
    - Which must be scheduled for a day before the deadlines set out in s. 30(3).

plus

- A written statement setting out specifics about the substitute holiday, as outlined in section 30(2.1). See s. 30(2.1) below for more details.

However, if an employer and employee agree in writing, the employer must, instead of the default entitlement, give to the employee public holiday pay plus premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday. See ESA Part 1, s. 1(3) and (3.1) for a discussion on agreements in writing. See ESA Part X, s. 24 for the calculation of public holiday pay and premium pay.

The entitlements described above are subject to s. 30(4) - see the discussion below.

Substitute Day of Holiday – s. 30(2.1)

32(2.1) If a day is substituted for a public holiday under clause (2) (a), the employer shall provide the employee with a written statement, before the public holiday, that sets out,

(a) the public holiday on which the employee will work;

(b) the date of the day that is substituted for a public holiday under clause (2) (a); and

(c) the date on which the statement is provided to the employee.

Subsection 30(2.1) is a new provision added by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22, effective January 1, 2018. Where the employee has agreed to work on a public holiday and the employer is substituting the public holiday in accordance with s. 30(2) (a), this section requires the employer to provide the employee with a written statement:

a) Naming the public holiday on which the employee has agreed to work,

b) Specifying the date that has been selected to be the substitute holiday, and

c) Noting the date on which the employee was given the statement.

The written statement must be provided to the employee before the actual public holiday. The legislation does not specify the manner in which the written statement must be provided. Consistent with the Program's position regarding the provision of the poster under ESA Part II, s. 2(5), an employer may provide the statement as a printed copy or as an attachment in an email to the employee.

There is no requirement for the parties to sign the written statement, nor is there a requirement for the employee to agree to the date of the substitute holiday, so long as it is a day that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee and that it is scheduled for a day before the deadlines set out in s. 30(3).

Restriction - s. 30(3)

30(3) A day that is substituted for a public holiday under clause (2) (a) shall be,

(a) a day that is no more than three months after the public holiday; or

(b) if the employee and the employer agree, a day that is no more than 12 months after the public holiday.

This section establishes a deadline for scheduling a substitute holiday an employee earns pursuant to s. 30(2)(a).

The section states that the employer must schedule the substitute holiday (which, pursuant to s. 30(2), must be set for a day that is ordinarily a working day for the employee) for a day that is no later than three months from the date of the public holiday.

The substitute day can be taken before the actual public holiday itself. For example, Canada Day is on a Saturday. An employee usually works weekdays, but agrees in writing to work on Canada Day. It is not a violation of the Act for the employee to be given Friday, June 30, as the substitute holiday.

If the employer and employee agree in writing the substitute holiday can be scheduled for a day that is up to 12 months after the date of the public holiday. See ESA Part 1, s. 1(3) and (3.1) for a discussion on written agreements. An employee may wish to extend the three-month deadline if, for example, they want to tack the substitute holiday on to their next vacation but the vacation is more than three months away.

The written agreement contemplated in s. 30(3)(b) must be reached prior to the public holiday as the employer is required under s. 30(2.1) to give the employee a written statement setting out the date of the substitute day. See ESA Part I, s. 1 for a discussion of issues around agreements, e.g., retroactivity, specificity, and requirements regarding informed and voluntary consent.

Where Certain Work Not Performed - s. 30(4)

30(4) The employee's entitlement under subsection (2) is subject to the following rules:

1. If the employee, without reasonable cause, performs none of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday, the employee has no entitlement under subsection (2).

2. If the employee, with reasonable cause, performs none of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday, the employer shall give the employee a substitute day off work in accordance with clause (2) (a) or, if an agreement was made under clause (2) (b), public holiday pay for the public holiday. However, if the employee also fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before the public holiday or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, the employee has no entitlement under subsection (2).

3. If the employee performs some of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday but fails, without reasonable cause, to perform all of it, the employer shall give the employee premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday but the employee has no other entitlement under subsection (2).

4. If the employee performs some of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday but fails, with reasonable cause, to perform all of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday, the employer shall give the employee wages at his or her regular rate for the hours worked on the public holiday and a substitute day off work in accordance with clause (2) (a) or, if an agreement was made under clause (2) (b), public holiday pay for the public holiday plus premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday. However, if the employee also fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before the public holiday or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, the employer shall give the employee premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday but the employee has no other entitlement under subsection (2).

5. If the employee performs all of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday but fails, without reasonable cause, to work all of his or her last regularly scheduled day of work before or all of his or her first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, the employer shall give the employee premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday but the employee has no other entitlement under subsection (2).

This section sets out the entitlements for an employee who agreed to work on the public holiday pursuant to s. 30(1), but who fails to perform certain work.

Every situation that impacts on an employee's entitlement is covered. That is, this provision sets out the consequences in the event of any of the following circumstances, whether they occur on their own or in combination with one another:

- Employee performs only some of the work on a public holiday that the employee had agreed to perform:
    - With reasonable cause; or
    - Without reasonable cause.
- Employee performs none of the work on a public holiday that the employee had agreed to perform:
    - With reasonable cause; or
    - Without reasonable cause.
- Employee does not work the entire regularly scheduled days of work before or after the public holiday without reasonable cause.

In the discussion below:

- "Substitute holiday" is a day off that would ordinarily be a working day for the employee, for which the employee is entitled to receive public holiday pay - see ESA Part X, s. 30.
- "Public holiday pay" is as calculated in s. 24(1) - see ESA Part X, s. 24.
- "Premium pay" is as calculated in s. 24(2) - see ESA Part X, s. 24.
- See ESA Part X, s. 26(2) for a discussion of the phrase "fail to work all of [the employee's] regularly scheduled day of work [before/after] the public holiday".
- See ESA Part X, s. 26(2) for a discussion of the term "reasonable cause". That discussion takes places in the context of the criterion of failure to work the regularly scheduled day before and after a public holiday, but applies equally to the criterion of failure to work on the public holiday.

The statutory phrases, "performs none of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday" and "performs some of the work that he or she agreed to perform on the public holiday but fails . . . to perform all of it," does not refer to the quantity or quality of the employee's work. Rather, it refers to whether the employee worked the whole shift, part of the shift, or none of the shift they agreed to work on the public holiday.

For example, an employee who agreed to work an eight-hour shift on Canada Day and who usually assembles 100 widgets during an eight-hour shift will not be considered to have performed only some of the work merely because they assembled only 80 widgets on Canada Day. So long as the employee worked the entire eight-hour shift, they will have "performed all of the work" they agreed to perform on the holiday.

The situations and consequences addressed in each of the five paragraphs in s. 30(4) are:

Performs none of the work on public holiday without reasonable cause

Employee performs none of the work on the public holiday, (i.e., did not show up at all on the holiday), without reasonable cause: employee has no entitlement.

Pursuant to s. 30(4) paragraph 1, the employee has no entitlement of any sort: not to a substitute holiday, to public holiday pay or to premium pay. When the employee entered into the s. 30(1) agreement, the entitlement under s. 29 ceased to apply to that employee.

Performs none of the work on public holiday with reasonable cause

Works last regularly scheduled day of work

Employee performs none of the work on the public holiday, (i.e., did not show up at all on the holiday), with reasonable cause, employee entitled to:

i. Substitute holiday,

   OR

ii. Public holiday pay if the employee had earlier agreed to be paid public holiday pay and premium pay for each hour they were going to work on the public holiday instead of receiving a substitute holiday.

Pursuant to s. 30(4) paragraph 2, the employee is entitled to either a substitute holiday or public holiday pay if the employee had earlier agreed to be paid public holiday pay and premium pay for each hour they were going to work on the public holiday instead of receiving a substitute holiday.

Fails to work last or first regularly scheduled day of work

Employee performs none of the work on the public holiday, (i.e., did not show up at all), with reasonable cause AND fails to work all of the last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, without reasonable cause:

Employee has no entitlement.

Pursuant to s. 30(4) paragraph 2, the employee has no entitlement of any sort: not to a substitute holiday, to public holiday pay or to premium pay. When the employee entered into the s. 30(1) agreement, the general entitlement under ESA Part X, s. 29 ceased to apply to that employee.

Performs only some of the work on public holiday without reasonable cause

Employee performs some but not all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday, (i.e., showed up for only part of the shift) without reasonable cause:

Employee entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Pursuant to s. 30(4), paragraph 3, the employee is entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday. They have no other entitlements - not to public holiday pay or to a substitute holiday.

Performs only some of the work on public holiday with reasonable cause

Works last regularly scheduled day of work

Employee performs some but not all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday, (i.e., showed up for only part of the shift) with reasonable cause:

Employee entitled to:

i. Wages at employee's regular rate for each hour worked on the public holiday PLUS a substitute holiday,

OR

ii. Public holiday pay plus premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday if the employee had earlier agreed to be paid public holiday pay plus premium pay for each hour they were going to work on the public holiday instead of receiving a substitute holiday.

Pursuant to s. 30(4) paragraph 4, the employee is entitled to either wages at their regular rate plus a substitute holiday, or public holiday pay plus premium pay if they agreed to be paid public holiday pay plus premium pay instead of receiving a substitute holiday.

Fails to work last or first regularly scheduled day of work

Employee performs some but not all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday, (i.e., showed up for only part of the shift), with reasonable cause AND fails to work all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, without reasonable cause:

Employee entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Pursuant to s. 30(4) paragraph 4, the employee is only entitled to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Performs all work on public holiday but fails to work last or first regularly scheduled day of work

Employee performs all of the work they agreed to perform on the public holiday (i.e., showed up for the entire shift), BUT fails to work all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the public holiday, without reasonable cause:

Employee entitled only to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

Pursuant to s. 30(4) paragraph 5, the employee is only entitled to premium pay for each hour worked on the public holiday.

NOTE: An employee who is entitled to a substitute holiday pursuant to s. 30(2)(a) does not lose that entitlement if they fail without reasonable cause to work all of their last regularly scheduled day of work before or first regularly scheduled day of work after the substitute holiday. An employee does not have to "requalify" for the substitute holiday once they have already earned it.

ESA Part X Section 31 - Premium Pay Hours Not Overtime Hours

31 If an employee receives premium pay for working on a public holiday, the hours worked shall not be taken into consideration in calculating overtime pay to which the employee may be entitled.

This section means that any hours worked on a public holiday that are compensated with premium pay are to be excluded when determining whether an employee's hours of work exceed the applicable overtime threshold.

Note that only those hours that are worked on a public holiday AND that are compensated with premium pay are excluded when determining whether or not the employee has crossed the overtime threshold. For example, if an employee works on Canada Day for regular pay and is given a substitute day off with public holiday pay, the hours worked on Canada Day are counted.

Note also that those hours that are worked on a public holiday and compensated with premium pay are excluded only for the purposes of determining overtime entitlements. They are not excluded for any other purposes, such as the hours of works limits or the weekly/biweekly rest periods.

The following examples illustrate the application of s. 31:

Example 1:

Employee works on a public holiday (Monday) and is paid public holiday pay plus premium pay for every hour worked on the holiday.

Employee’s schedule:

- Sunday: No hours worked
- Monday (public holiday): 8 hours
- Tuesday: 12 hours
- Wednesday: 9 hours
- Thursday: 8 hours
- Friday: 8 hours
- Saturday: 8 hours

Actual hours worked = 53 hours

Number of hours to be included in overtime threshold calculation = 53 actual hours worked minus 8 hours worked on the public holiday for which the employee was paid premium pay = 45 hours

Number of overtime hours = 45 hours minus 44 hours = 1 hour

Assume that the employee's rate of pay is $15.00 per hour.

For the 53 hours worked in that work week, the employee is entitled to:

- Regular pay = 44 hours x $15/hour = $660
- Premium pay for work on public holiday = ($15 x 1.5) x 8 hours = $180
- Overtime Pay = 1 hour x ($15 x 1.5) = $22.50
- Public holiday pay = Regular wages earned and vacation pay payable in the four work weeks before the work week in which the public holiday occurred, divided by 20. Assume $132.

Total wages owing = $994.50

Example 2:

Employee works on a public holiday (Monday) and is paid his or her regular rate for hours worked on the public holiday plus receives a substitute day off with public holiday pay, scheduled to be taken in two months.

Employee's schedule:

- Sunday: No hours worked
- Monday (public holiday): 8 hours
- Tuesday: 12 hours
- Wednesday: 9 hours
- Thursday: 8 hours
- Friday: 8 hours
- Saturday: 8 hours

Actual hours worked = 53 hours

Number of hours to be included in overtime threshold calculation = 53 hours (the 8 hours worked on the public holiday are included in the total because they were not compensated with premium pay)

Number of overtime hours = 53 hours minus 44 hours = 9 hours

Assume that the employee's rate of pay is $15.00 per hour.

For the 53 hours worked in that work week, the employee is entitled to:

- Regular pay = 44 hours x $15/hour = $660
- Premium pay for work on public holiday = $0
- Overtime Pay = 9 hours x ($15 x 1.5) = $202.50
- Public holiday pay = $0 in this week (For the work week in which the substitute day falls, the public holiday pay will be: regular wages earned and vacation pay payable in the four work weeks before the work week in which the substitute holiday fell, divided by 20.)

Total wages owing = $862.50

ESA Part X Section 32 – If Employment Ends

32 If the employment of an employee ends before a day that has been substituted for a public holiday under this part, the employer shall pay the employee public holiday pay for that day in accordance with subsection 11(5).

This section provides that an employee whose employment is terminated before they received their substitute day off with public holiday pay is owed the public holiday pay. The employer must pay the public holiday pay no later than the later of seven days after the termination or the day that would ordinarily have been the employee's next pay day.

Section 32 will apply regardless of the reason for the employment coming to an end, whether it be because the employee resigned, or was terminated, whatever the reason behind the termination. For example, s. 32 will apply even if an employee is terminated because they were guilty of wilful misconduct that has not been condoned by the employer and is therefore not entitled to termination pay or notice.

Section 24(1) sets out the calculation that is used to determine the amount of public holiday pay owing. Because public holiday pay for a substitute holiday is calculated on the basis that the substitute day is a public holiday in accordance with s. 27(2)(a), s. 28(2)(a), s. 29(1) and s. 30(2)(a), the formula in s. 24(1) applies when calculating public holiday pay for substitute days.

As a result, the four work week time frame over which the calculation for a substitute holiday is performed is normally the four work weeks prior to the work week in which the substitute holiday falls.

However, where the employee's employment has been terminated prior to the substitute day being taken, s. 32 provides that the amount of public holiday pay owing is to be determined using the actual public holiday as the reference point.

That is, in accordance with ESA Part X, s. 24(1), the four work weeks prior to the actual holiday is the relevant time frame for the calculation.

ESA Part XI - Vacation with Pay

The general intent of Part XI Vacation with Pay is to provide employees with vacation time and vacation pay. An employee whose period of employment is less than five years is entitled to two weeks of vacation time after the completion of each 12-month vacation entitlement year. An employee whose period of employment is five years or more is entitled to three weeks of vacation time after the completion of each 12-month vacation entitlement year.

Where the employer has established an alternative vacation entitlement year (i.e., one that does not start on the date of hire or the anniversary of the date of hire), the employee is entitled to a pro-rated amount of vacation time for the period ("stub period") preceding the first alternative vacation entitlement year and two or three weeks of vacation time after each alternative vacation entitlement year thereafter depending upon their period of employment upon competition of each vacation entitlement year.

Vacation pay accrues so as to provide a sum upon which the employee can draw during their vacation. The amount of vacation the employee accrues will depend upon the employee’s period of employment when the vacation entitlement period ends. Employees whose period of employment is less than five years upon completion of a vacation entitlement period, are entitled to accrue vacation pay at four per cent of the gross wages (excluding vacation pay) earned in that vacation entitlement period. Employees whose period of employment upon completion of a vacation entitlement period is five years or more are entitled to accrue vacation pay at six per cent of the gross wages (excluding vacation pay) earned in that vacation entitlement period.

ESA Part XI Section 33 – Right to Vacation

Right to Vacation – s. 33(1)

33(1) An employer shall give an employee a vacation of,

a) at least two weeks after each vacation entitlement year that the employee completes, if the employee's period of employment is less than five years; or

b) at least three weeks after each vacation entitlement year that the employee completes, if the employee's period of employment is five years or more.

The Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18 ("GEA 2002") amended this provision, effective November 26, 2002, to reflect the employer's ability to establish an alternative vacation entitlement year. ESA Part I, s. 1 defines an alternative vacation entitlement year as a recurring 12-month period chosen by the employer and beginning on a date other than the first day of the employee's employment. A standard vacation entitlement year is defined as a recurring 12-month period beginning on the date of hire.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 ("FWBJA"), effective January 1, 2018, amended the requirement to provide employees with two weeks' of vacation time after each completed vacation entitlement year with a requirement to provide employees whose period of employment is less than five years upon the completion of a vacation entitlement year with two weeks of vacation time and to provide employees whose period of employment is five years or more upon the completion of a vacation entitlement year with three weeks of vacation time in respect of that vacation entitlement year.

When Vacation Must Be Taken

It is the responsibility of the employer to ensure that each employee receives their minimum statutory requirement. Note that where the employer has established an alternative vacation entitlement year, ESA Part XI, s. 34 establishes the employee's entitlement to a pro-rated amount of vacation time for the period of employment (the "stub period") that precedes the first alternative vacation entitlement year.

The right to vacation time accrues only after the completion of each 12-month vacation entitlement year. Nevertheless, vacation time may be taken prior to the expiry of the 12-month vacation entitlement year if the employer is agreeable to this or if the contract of employment clearly provides for that entitlement. The only restriction on when the vacation must be taken is set out in ESA Part XI, ss. 35 and 35.1, which provide that it must be completed no more than 10 months following the end of the period over which it was earned.

Period of Employment

The entitlement to either two or three weeks of vacation time is determined solely by the employee's period of employment upon completion of each vacation entitlement year. If the employee's period of employment is less than five years upon completion of the vacation entitlement year, the employee is entitled to two weeks of vacation time in respect of that vacation entitlement year. Likewise, if the employee's period of employment is five years or more upon the completion of the vacation entitlement year, the employee's entitlement is to three weeks of vacation time in respect of that vacation entitlement year. For example, an employee who reaches the five year period of employment threshold a full 10 months prior to the completion of the vacation entitlement year and an employee who reaches that threshold just one day prior to the completion of the vacation entitlement year will both be entitled to three weeks of vacation in respect of that vacation entitlement year.

The period of employment is a reference to the period that the employee has been employed by the employer since the date of hire. Under the ESA 2000, the period of employment also determines entitlements to things such a pregnancy and parental leave, organ donor leave, reservist leave and termination pay. The period of employment is not affected by inactive periods of employment such as leaves or lay-off. However, if there is a break in the employment relationship, the period of employment will be determined by the most recent period beginning after that break. Note that O Reg 288/01, s. 8(2), which ties together any two periods of employment separated by less than 13 weeks for the purposes of notice entitlements under the ESA 2000, does not apply to ESA Part XI.

Greater Right or Benefit

In accordance with ESA Part III, s. 5(2), where the vacation time entitlement is a period of more than the statutory entitlement of two or three weeks, as per an agreement between the employer and the employee, this greater right will prevail. However, it should be noted that because vacation time and vacation pay are separate entitlements under ESA Part XI, s. 35.2, the fact that an employer provides a greater right or benefit with respect to vacation time does not necessarily mean that the employer is also providing a correspondingly greater right or benefit with respect to vacation pay and vice versa.

Example:

Employee hired on June 1, 2014 and has a standard vacation entitlement year that runs from June 1 of each year to May 31 of the following year:

Employee earns two weeks of vacation time upon completion of each of the following four vacation entitlement years:

- June1, 2014 to May 31, 2015
- June 1, 2015 to May 31, 2016
- June 1, 2016 to May 31, 2017
- June 1, 2017 to May 31, 2018

On May 31, 2019, the employee completed five years of employment and so will be entitled to three weeks of vacation for the vacation entitlement year June 1, 2018 to May 31, 2019. In each subsequent vacation entitlement year, the employee's vacation time entitlement will be three weeks.

Active and Inactive Employment – s. 33(2)

33(2) Both active employment and inactive employment shall be included for the purposes of subsection (1).

Section 33(2) provides that inactive as well as active periods of employment be included in the 12-month vacation entitlement period for the purpose of determining an employee's entitlement to vacation time. The corresponding provision with respect to the accrual of vacation time over a stub period is ESA Part XI, s. 34(4).

An employee's entitlement to vacation time accrues so long as the employment relationship continues. Therefore, the employee need not be actively employed (i.e., actually performing work) to earn the right to vacation time. Provided that the employee completes the vacation entitlement year (i.e., there is no break in the employment relationship during the vacation entitlement year), time spent on a Part XIV leave, or an approved leave of absence, temporary lay-off etc. (all periods of inactive employment) must be credited to an employee in respect of their entitlement to vacation time. However, vacation pay will only be calculated on the actual wages earned during the period in respect of which the vacation is earned as per ESA Part XI, s. 35.2.

Where Vacation Not Taken in Complete Weeks – s. 33(3)

33(3) If an employee does not take vacation in complete weeks, the employer shall base the number of days of vacation that the employee is entitled to,

(a) on the number of days in the employee's regular work week; or

(b) if the employee does not have a regular work week, on the average number of days the employee worked per week during the most recently completed vacation entitlement year.

Subsection 33(3) sets out a calculation for vacation entitlements for employees who will be taking vacation in blocks of less than one week.

An employee must request permission, in writing, from their employer to take vacation time in days rather than weeks. If the employer agrees to this request, in writing, the employee may take vacation time in shorter periods, i.e., days rather than weeks – see ESA Part XI, s. 35.

Calculating the Number of Vacation Days to Which an Employee is Entitled Section 33(3)(a)

For those employees who have a regular work week, the number of single vacation days is based on the number of days in the employee's regular work week. For example, if an employee regularly worked four days per week, the employee would be entitled to four single vacation days for each of the two or three weeks' vacation earned, as applicable, in the vacation entitlement year in accordance with s. 33(1).

Section 33(3)(b)

If the employee does not have a regular work week, the entitlement to single vacation days is calculated under s. 33(3)(b) as the average number of days worked per week during the most recently completed vacation entitlement year. For example, if an employee works an average of three days per week, the employee would be entitled to three single vacation days for each of the two or three weeks' vacation earned, as applicable, in the vacation entitlement year in accordance with s. 33(1).

Calculation of single vacation days under s. 33(3)(b):

1. Count the total number of days the employee worked in the 12-month vacation entitlement year
2. Divide this number by the number of weeks in a year (365.25 days per year divided by 7 days per weeks) = 52.18 weeks per year

Example 1: Employee does not have a regular work week

If an employee had worked 160 days in the 12-month period, the number of single vacation days would be calculated as 160 days divided by 52.18 = 3.07 days for each week of vacation (either two or three weeks) the employee is entitled to under s. 33(1).

Example 2: Employee does not have a regular work week and does not have a regular work day

If an employee does not have a regular work day as defined in ESA Part I, s. 1(1) in that the employee does not usually work the same number of hours each day, it is Program policy that a day will be based on an average number of hours worked on the days worked in the 12-month vacation entitlement year preceding the first vacation day. This calculation requires totaling the number of hours worked in the 12-month period and dividing that by the number of days actually worked.

On the facts described in example 1, if the employee had worked a total of 500 hours in the 160 days worked in the 12-month vacation entitlement year, an average day would be: 500 hours divided by 160 days worked = 3.13 hours

As a result, the employee would be entitled to 3.07 vacation days of 3.13 hours each for each week of vacation time (either two or three weeks) that the employee was entitled to in accordance with s. 33(1).

Vacation Days/Hours vs Vacation Pay Entitlements

The number of single vacation days/hours to which an employee is entitled under this section may not correspond directly to the amount of vacation pay that the employee is entitled to under the ESA 2000. An employee is entitled to a minimum of four or six per cent of the total wages earned in each vacation year as vacation pay (depending upon the employee's period of employment upon the completion of the vacation entitlement year) or the amount to which the employee is entitled as a greater right or benefit under a contract of employment.

Transition – s. 33(4)

33(4) Clause 1(b) requires employers to provide employees with a period of employment of at least five years or more with a least three weeks of vacation after each vacation entitlement year that ends on or after December 31, 2017 but does not require them to provide additional vacation days in respect of vacation entitlement years that ended before that time.

The FWBJA added this provision to the ESA 2000. It provides that although s. 33(1)(b) provides that employees whose period of employment is five years or more upon completion of a vacation entitlement year are entitled to three weeks of vacation in respect of that vacation entitlement year, employers are not required to provide any increased vacation entitlement in respect of a vacation entitlement year that ends before December 31, 2017.

Under s. 33(4), if the vacation entitlement year ended before December 31, 2017, an employee is entitled to two weeks of vacation time in respect of that vacation entitlement year, regardless of the employee's period of employment upon the completion of that vacation entitlement year. If the vacation entitlement year ended either on or after December 31, 2017, an employee whose period of employment was five years or more when that vacation entitlement year ended is entitled to three weeks of vacation time in respect of that vacation entitlement year.

There is a similar transition provision that applies with respect to stub periods ending before December 31, 2017 in ESA Part XI, s. 34(5).

ESA Part XI Section 34 – Alternative Vacation Entitlement Year

Alternative Vacation Entitlement Year Application – s. 34(1)

34(1) This section applies if the employer establishes an alternative vacation entitlement year for an employee.

The Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18 ("GEA 2002") added this provision to the ESA 2000. It states that s. 34, which provides for the accrual of vacation time over a stub period, applies where the employer has established an alternative vacation entitlement year. Subsequently, the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 (“FWBJA”) repealed and replaced this provision to reflect the increased vacation entitlement (a pro-rated three-week entitlement) brought in by that FWBJA for employees whose period of employment is five or more years upon completion of a stub period.

ESA Part I, s. 1 defines an alternative vacation entitlement year as a recurring 12-month period that begins on a date chosen by the employer, other than the first day of the employee's employment.

ESA Part I, s. 1 defines a stub period as follows:

"stub period" means, with respect to an employee for whom the employer establishes an alternative vacation entitlement year,

(a) if the employee's first alternative vacation entitlement year begins before the completion of his or her first 12 months of employment, the period that begins on the first day of employment and ends on the day before the start of the alternative vacation entitlement year,

(b) if the employee's first alternative vacation entitlement year begins after the completion of his or her first 12 months of employment, the period that begins on the day after the day on which his or her most recent standard vacation entitlement year ended and ends on the day before the start of the alternative vacation entitlement year.

Vacation for Stub Period, Less than Five Years of Employment – s. 34(2)

34(2) If the employee’s period of employment is less than five years, the employer shall do the following with respect to the stub period:

> 1. The employer shall calculate the ratio between the stub period and 12 months.
>
> 2. If the employee has a regular work week, the employer shall give the employee a vacation for the stub period that is equal to two weeks multiplied by the ratio calculated under paragraph 1.
>
> 3. If the employee does not have a regular work week, the employer shall give the employee a vacation for the stub period that is equal to,
>
> 2 x A x the ratio calculated under paragraph 1,

where,

> A = the average number of days the employee worked per work week in the stub period.

Section 34(2) sets out the method for calculating the vacation entitlement earned in a stub period where the employee's period of employment is less than five years upon completion of that stub period.

The stub period entitlement is essentially a pro-rated amount of the two week entitlement that an employee whose period of employment was less than five years would earn upon completion of a 12-month vacation entitlement year.

Employees who have a regular work week will earn vacation time of two weeks multiplied by the ratio of the stub period to 12 months.

Example 1:

If the stub period was three months' long the calculation would be as follows:

1. Ratio of stub period to 12 months = 3/12
2. Two weeks x 3/12 = .5 weeks

Employees who do not have a regular work week will earn vacation time of two times the average number of days worked per work week in the stub period multiplied by the ratio of the stub period to 12 months.

Example 2:

If the stub period was three months' long and the employee worked an average of 2.6 days per week in the stub period the calculation would be as follows:

1. Ratio of stub period to 12 months = 3/12
2. Two weeks x 2.6 days per week x 3/12 = 1.3 days

Vacation for Stub Period, Five Years or More of Employment – s. 34(3)

34(3) If the employee's period of employment is five years or more, the employer shall do the following with respect to the stub period:

> 1. The employer shall calculate the ratio between the stub period and 12 months.
>
> 2. If the employee has a regular work week, the employer shall give the employee a vacation for the stub period that is equal to three weeks multiplied by the ratio calculated under paragraph 1.
>
> 3. If the employee does not have a regular work week, the employer shall give the employee a vacation for the stub period that is equal to,
>
> 3 x A x the ratio calculated under paragraph 1,

where,

> A = the average number of days the employee worked per work week in the stub period.

Section 34(3) sets out the method for calculating the vacation entitlement earned in a stub period where the employee's period of employment is five years or more upon completion of that stub period.

The stub period entitlement is essentially a pro-rated amount of the three week entitlement that an employee whose period of employment was five years or more would earn upon completion of a 12-month vacation entitlement year.

Employees who have a regular work week will earn vacation time of three weeks multiplied by the ratio of the stub period to 12 months.

Example 1:

If the stub period was three months' long the calculation would be as follows:

1. Ratio of stub period to 12 months = 3/12
2. Three weeks x 3/12 = .75 weeks

Employees who do not have a regular work week will earn vacation time of three times the average number of days worked per work week in the stub period multiplied by the ratio of the stub period to 12 months.

Example 2:

If the stub period was three months' long and the employee worked an average of 2.6 days per week in the stub period the calculation would be as follows:

1. Ratio of stub period to 12 months = 3/12
2. Three weeks x 2.6 days per week x 3/12 = 1.95 days

Active and Inactive Employment – s. 34(4)

34(4) Both active and inactive employment shall be included for the purposes of subsections (2) and (3).

Section 34(4) provides that inactive as well as active periods of employment are included in the stub period for the purpose of determining an employee's entitlement to vacation time. Note that ESA Part XI, s. 33(2) is the corresponding provision in regards to the accrual of vacation time over a vacation entitlement year.

An employee's entitlement to vacation time accrues while the employment relationship continues. Therefore, the employee need not be actively employed (actually performing work) to earn the right to vacation time. Provided that the employee completes the stub period (i.e., there is no break in the employment relationship during the stub period), time spent on any Part XIV leave, an approved leave of absence, temporary lay-off, etc. (all periods of inactive employment) must be credited to an employee in respect of their entitlement to vacation time. However, vacation pay will only be calculated on the actual wages earned during the period in respect of which the vacation is earned as per ESA Part XI, s. 35.2.

Transition – s. 34(5)

34(5) Subsection (3) requires employers to provide employees with a period of employment of at least five years or more with vacation calculated in accordance with that subsection for any stub period that ends on or after December 31, 2017 but does not require them to provide additional vacation days in respect of a stub period that ended before that time.

While the transition provision for vacation entitlement years is found in ESA Part XI, s. 33(4), the transition provision that applies to stub periods is found in s. 34(5).

Subsection 34(3) provides that employees whose period of employment is five years or more upon completion of a stub period are entitled to a pro-rated amount of three weeks of vacation in respect of that stub period. However, this transition provision specifies that employers are not required to provide this increased vacation entitlement in respect of a stub period that ends before December 31, 2017. Therefore, if a stub period ended before December 31, 2017, an employee is entitled to a pro-rated amount of two weeks of vacation time in respect of that stub period, regardless of the employee's period of employment upon completion of that stub period.

Timing of Vacation – s. 35

35. The employer shall determine when an employee shall take vacation for a vacation entitlement year, subject to the following rules:

1. The vacation must be completed no later than 10 months after the end of the vacation entitlement year for which it is given.

2. If the employee's period of employment is less than five years, the vacation must be a two-week period or two periods of one week each, unless the employee requests in writing that the vacation be taken in shorter periods and the employer agrees to that request.

3. If the employee's period of employment is five years or more, the vacation must be a three-week period or a two-week period and a one-week period or three periods of one week each, unless the employee requests in writing that the vacation be taken in shorter periods and the employer agrees to that request.

This provision was previously amended by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18, to reflect the changes to the ESA, 2000, allowing employers to establish alternative vacation years. It was subsequently repealed and replaced by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 to reflect the increased vacation entitlement (three weeks) brought in by that Act for employees whose period of employment is five or more years upon completion of a vacation entitlement year.

Section 35 gives employers the right and the obligation to determine when an employee may take the vacation earned upon completion of a vacation entitlement year. However, the employer must ensure that the vacation is completed no later than 10 months following the completion of the vacation entitlement year during which the vacation was earned.

Under paragraphs 1 and 2, the employer is required to provide the vacation in periods of at least one week, unless the employee requests in writing and the employer agrees to allow the employee to take vacation in increments of less than one week.

The Employer's Right to Assign the Vacation Time

Since the employer has the right to assign the employee's vacation time and, accordingly, the right to approve or reject a vacation period requested by the employee, it follows that the employee has no right to take a vacation on their own initiative. For example, in Fox, Glicksman & Co. v Reynolds (December 16, 1981), ESC 1118 (Black), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, an employee took a two-week vacation but had obtained employer approval for only one week. Additionally, the employee was warned not to take the two-week vacation. The referee held that in taking the two weeks of vacation without the employer's permission, the employee's actions amounted to wilful misconduct and therefore the employee was not entitled to pay in lieu of notice of termination. It must be noted, however, that where an employee expresses an intention to take vacation, in order for the employee's actions to amount to wilful misconduct the employer must expressly forbid the proposed vacation period - see Peter Tsorovas c.o.b. Mr. Submarine v Zwicker (January 12, 1982), ESC 1131 (Betcherman), also decided under the former Employment Standards Act. For further discussion of the meaning of wilful misconduct, disobedience or neglect of duty, see O Reg 288/01, s. 2.

Limitations on the Employer's Right to Schedule an Employee's Vacation

The vacation must be completed no later than 10 months after the end of the employee's 12-month vacation entitlement year. The employer will therefore not be in violation of this requirement until 22 months after the commencement of the 12-month period during which the vacation time was earned.

It should also be noted that an employer is not permitted to schedule an employee’s vacation during the statutory notice period, unless the employee, after having received the notice, agrees to take their vacation during the statutory notice period. See O Reg 288/01, s. 7.

Length of Vacation Period

Section 35 permits employees to take vacation time earned over a vacation entitlement year in increments of less than one week provided the following criteria are met:

1. The employee must request, in writing, vacation time in a period shorter than one week; and,
2. The employer must agree to the employee's written request in writing.

It should be noted that where an employee is provided with vacation time in excess of the employee’s two- or three- week entitlement under the Act, an employer is free to schedule those excess weeks as it sees fit (e.g., as single days).

ESA Part XI Section 35.1 - Timing of Vacation, Alternative Vacation Entitlement Year

Timing of Vacation, Alternative Vacation Entitlement Year – s. 35.1(1)

35.1(1) This section applies if an employer establishes an alternative vacation entitlement year for an employee.

Section 35.1 was added by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18, to reflect the changes to the Employment Standards Act, 2000 allowing employers to establish alternative vacation years.

Section 35.1 gives employers the right and the obligation to determine when an employee may take the vacation time earned over the stub period. However, under s. 35.1(2) the vacation days must be taken in minimum blocks (unless agreed otherwise) and the vacation must be taken no later than 10 months following the stub period during which the vacation was earned.

Same - s. 35.1(2)

35.1(2) The employer shall determine when the employee shall take his or her vacation for the stub period subject to the following rules:

1. The vacation shall be completed no later than 10 months after the start of the first alternative vacation entitlement year.

2. Subject to paragraphs 3 and 4, if the vacation entitlement is equal to two or more days, the vacation shall be taken in a period of consecutive days.

3. Subject to paragraph 4, if the vacation entitlement is equal to or more than five days, at least five vacation days shall be taken in a period of consecutive days and the remaining vacation days may be taken in a separate period of consecutive days.

4. Paragraphs 2 and 3 do not apply if the employee requests in writing that the vacation be taken in shorter periods and the employer agrees to that request.

Section 35.1(2) requires the employer to ensure the employee takes the vacation earned in a stub period within 10 months of the completion of the stub period.

Except where the parties have agreed otherwise, it also provides that if the employee has earned less than five vacation days, those days are to be taken consecutively. If the employee has earned more than five days, the first five days must be taken consecutively, and the balance may be taken together with the first five days or as a separate period of consecutive days.

An employee may request in writing and where the employer agrees, the vacation may be taken in shorter periods than otherwise required under this section.

ESA Part XI Section 35.2 – Vacation Pay

Vacation Pay – s. 35.2

35.2 An employer shall pay vacation pay to an employee who is entitled to vacation under section 33 or 34, equal to at least,

(a) 4 per cent of the wages, excluding vacation pay, the employee earned during the period for which the vacation is given, if the employee's period of employment is less than five years; or

(b) 6 per cent of the wages, excluding vacation pay, that the employee earned during the period for which the vacation is given, if the employee's period of employment is five years or more.

Section 35.2 provides employees who are entitled to vacation under ESA Part XI, s. 33 or s. 34 with an entitlement to vacation pay. This provision was amended to reflect the changes to the ESA 2000 that allow vacation to accrue over alternative vacation entitlement years in addition to standard vacation entitlement years, as well as the accrual of vacation over a stub period where an alternative vacation entitlement year is established. It was subsequently repealed and replaced by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 to increase the minimum vacation pay entitlement of four per cent of the wages earned in any vacation entitlement period (i.e., a stub period or vacation entitlement year) to six per cent for employees whose period of employment is five years or more. This change is consistent with the changes made to s. 33 and s. 34 which increased the vacation time entitlement to three weeks and a pro-rated amount of three weeks for such employees upon the completion of a vacation entitlement year or stub period respectively.

The effect of s. 35.2 is to require employers to pay vacation pay of at least four per cent (for employees whose period of employment is less than five years upon completion of a vacation entitlement period) and six per cent (for employees whose period of employment is five years or more upon completion of a vacation entitlement period) of all of the wages earned during the vacation entitlement period (whether a standard vacation entitlement year, alternative vacation entitlement year or stub period) for which the vacation is given, as payment for the vacation. Any vacation pay previously paid is to be excluded from the calculation of wages under this section. ESA Part XI, ss. 36, 37 and 38 stipulate when vacation pay is to be paid.

Note that the vacation pay entitlement is either four per cent or six per cent of the wages earned in a vacation entitlement period. In other words, an employee whose period of employment is less than five years upon completion of a vacation entitlement period is entitled to vacation pay calculated as four percent of the wages earned in the vacation entitlement period. An employee whose period of employment is five years or more upon completion of a vacation entitlement period is entitled to vacation pay calculated as six percent of the wages earned during the entitlement period regardless of whether the employee's period of employment was five years or more when the vacation entitlement period commenced or the employee reached the five year period of employment part way through the vacation entitlement period.

The question arises however as to how employees who are paid vacation pay on a pay period by pay period basis will be paid vacation pay in a vacation entitlement period in which the employee reaches the five year period of employment threshold.

Although s. 35.2 ties the right to vacation pay to the completion of vacation entitlement periods, employees accrue vacation pay on an ongoing basis as a result of the application of the Apportionment Act, RSO 1990, c A.23. See also the discussion regarding payment of vacation pay on cessation of employment in ESA Part XI, s. 38.

As a consequence, an employee who is paid their accrued vacation pay on each pay day will be paid four per cent of the wages earned in each pay period as vacation pay until the employee reaches the five year period of employment threshold. At that time, the employee's entitlement increases to six per cent vacation pay on all wages earned in the vacation entitlement period and so an additional two percent of vacation pay will be due and payable on the wages earned to the date the five year threshold is reached. From that date forward, the employee would be paid six percent of the wages earned in each pay period as vacation pay.

Example – Payment of Vacation pay on a pay period by pay period basis:

- Employee's vacation entitlement year is January 1 to December 31
- Employee is entitled to be paid vacation pay on a pay period by pay period basis
- Employee reaches five year period of employment threshold on July 1

The employee is entitled to be paid four per cent on the wages earned between January 1 and June 30 as vacation pay because the employee's period of employment is less than five years.

However, on July 1 the employee reaches the five year period of employment threshold and as a consequence the vacation pay entitlement for that vacation year increases from four per cent to six per cent of all the wages earned in the vacation entitlement year.

The employer will therefore be required to "top-up" the four per cent vacation pay earned up to and including June 30 with an additional two per cent. This payment will be due on the pay day for the pay period in which July 1 falls.

The employee will then be paid six per cent vacation pay on the wages earned from July 1 to December 31.

Employee's Right to Vacation Pay

An employee has the right to be provided with vacation pay of at least four per cent or six per cent as the case may be of the total wages (excluding any vacation pay) earned during the period of employment for which the vacation is given.

As an employment standard, vacation pay is mandatory and cannot be waived pursuant to ESA Part III, s. 5(1). Accordingly, an employer cannot reduce or eliminate vacation pay to compensate for the incompetence of the employee – see MacNamarra v Hanrath (February 23, 1980), ESC 717 (Adamson). Nor is an employer excused from the obligation under s. 38 where the employee has committed a criminal offence – see Burlington Carpet Mills Canada Ltd. v Smitten (May 16, 1974), ESC 227 (Magerman). Both of the aforementioned decisions were decided under the former Employment Standards Act.

In Tim Wilkins Pontiac Buick Ltd. d.b.a. Lorne Brett Motos Ltd. v Ojamae et al (October 2, 1980), ESC 878 (Davis), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, Referee Davis ruled that where a monthly-salaried employee receives a full month's salary for a month in which the employee took a one-week vacation, the amount of vacation pay to be considered to have been paid is not one-quarter of the monthly salary but rather an amount equal to the monthly salary divided by 4.33. This is because a month is a slightly longer period than four weeks.

In Laurentian University of Sudbury v Kretzchmar (September 30, 1983), ESC 1492 (Betcherman), the employer and employee agreed that if the employee did not take any vacation, no payment in lieu of vacation would be paid. In confirming the order for pay in lieu of vacation pay under the former Employment Standards Act, the referee held that any agreement between an employee and employer that represents a waiver of the rights to vacation pay under s. 28 of the former Employment Standards Act (corresponding to s. 35.2 of the ESA 2000) was void pursuant to s. 3 of the former Employment Standards Act (corresponding to ESA Part III, s. 5 of the ESA 2000). In this regard, see also John Bear Pontiac Buick Limited v Wade (December 17, 1985), ESC 2001 (Egan). Furthermore, although ESA Part XI, s. 41(1) of the ESA 2000 now expressly allows an employee to agree to forego their vacation time (with the Director's approval), ESA Part XI, s. 41(2) precludes any agreement to forego vacation pay.

Calculating Vacation Pay

Vacation pay accumulates as wages are earned. Vacation pay is the equivalent of four or six per cent of wages for the period of employment for which the vacation is given, except that in calculating wages, any vacation pay previously paid must be excluded.

Vacation pay is payable on wages as defined in ESA Part I, s. 1(1):

"wages" means,

(a) monetary remuneration payable by an employer to an employee under the terms of an employment contract, oral or written, express or implied,

(b) any payment required to be made by an employer to an employee under this Act, and

(c) any allowances for room or board under an employment contract or prescribed allowances,

but does not include,

(d) tips or other gratuities,

(e) any sums paid as gifts or bonuses that are dependent on the discretion of the employer and that are not related to hours, production or efficiency,

(f) expenses and travelling allowances, or

(g) subject to subsections 60(3) or 62(2), employer contributions to a benefit plan and payments to which an employee is entitled from a benefit plan.

For a more detailed discussion refer to ESA Part I, s. 1. Note that wages includes payments made under the ESA 2000 relating to Part XIV domestic violence leave pay.

The decisions cited below (all decided under the former Employment Standards Act) hold that the following items are included in wages for the purposes of calculating vacation pay:

- Termination pay – see Inco. Ltd. v. U.S.W.A
- Any bonus that qualifies as wages – see Studio Sound Limited v Hobbs and Taylor (October 25, 1985), ESC 1968 (Sherwood) and Tim Wilkins Pontiac Buick Ltd. d.b.a. Lorne Brett Motos Ltd. v Ojamae et al (October 2, 1980), ESC 878 (Davis)
- Commissions – see Studio Sound Limited v Hobbs and Taylor and Lorne Brett Motos Ltd. v Ojamae et al
- Overtime – see Bruce's Appliance Service v Doyle (June 20, 1974), ESC 223 (McNish)
- The pro-rata allocation of profit-sharing bonuses (that is, that which is paid to the employee and attributable to the period in which the employee took their vacation, regardless of when it is paid) – see Lorne Brett Motos Ltd. v Ojamae et al.

Early referee decisions were not settled on whether termination pay should be considered wages for the purpose of calculating vacation pay. Program policy however, is that termination pay is taken into account when calculating the wages upon which vacation pay will be assessed. The Program's policy that vacation pay is payable on termination pay has been confirmed by the Ontario Divisional Court in Inco Ltd. v. U.S.W.A.

Where notice of termination is provided under ESA Part XV, s. 60, vacation pay is calculated on wages earned during the notice period. If the employer does not provide notice but gives the employee pay in lieu under ESA Part XV, s. 61, the employer is required to pay the employee the amount the employee would have received "had notice been given". Consequently, the pay in lieu would include vacation pay on the wages the employee would have earned during the notice period. If it were otherwise, an employer would realize a monetary advantage in choosing to provide pay in lieu instead of giving the employee notice. However, vacation pay is not payable on severance pay as severance pay is not compensation for lack of notice of termination. Rather, severance pay is an entitlement that crystallizes after the employment relationship has ended and is provided as compensation for loss of seniority and job-related benefits and also for the investment of long service with the employer.

ESA Part XI Section 36 - When to Pay Vacation Pay

When to Pay Vacation Pay - s. 36(1)

36(1) Subject to subsections (2) to (4), the employer shall pay vacation pay to the employee in a lump sum before the employee commences his or her vacation.

Section 36(1) requires employers to pay vacation pay in a lump sum before the vacation time is taken, subject to ss. 36(2), 36(3) and 36(4).

It should be noted that s. 36(1) does not specify when the vacation pay is to be paid beyond the requirement that it be paid before the vacation is taken. The Act does not require the employer to pay it for example, the day before the vacation commences, the week before the vacation commences or on any other particular date prior to the commencement of the vacation.

In Grand & Toy Limited v Ontario (Director of Employment Standards), 2006 CanLII 39100 (ON LRB), the vacation pay accruing during the vacation entitlement year was paid on a date shortly after the vacation entitlement year ended and sometime before the employee took vacation. On that basis, the Ontario Labour Relations Board found that the payment was in conformity with s. 36(1). Further, because the payment was made in conformity with s. 36(1), there was no need for an agreement in writing to fix a date for the payment as per s. 36(4).

Same - s. 36(2)

36(2) If the employer pays the employee his or her wages in accordance with subsection 11(4) or the employee does not take his or her vacation in complete weeks, the employer may pay the employee his or her vacation pay on or before the pay day for the period in which the vacation falls.

Section 36(2) sets out an exception to the general rule of advance payment of vacation pay set out in s. 36(1) and permits employers to pay vacation pay on or before the employee's pay day for the period in which the vacation falls.

For example, if an employee takes vacation during week of September 9 to 13, and the pay day for the pay period September 1 to 15 is September 21, then the employee's vacation pay is due on or before September 21.

Section 36(2) applies in the following two situations only:

1. If the employer pays the employee in accordance with s. 11(4), that is, by direct deposit, or
2. If the employee does not take their vacation in complete weeks.

ESA Part V, s. 11(4) provides as follows:

11(4) An employer may pay an employee's wages by direct deposit into an account of a financial institution if,

(a) the account is in the employee's name;

(b) no person other than the employee or a person authorized by the employee has access to the account; and

(c) unless the employee agrees otherwise, an office or facility of the financial institution is located within a reasonable distance from the location where the employee usually works.

Same - s. 36(3)

36(3) The employer may pay the employee vacation pay that accrues during a pay period on the pay day for that period if the employee agrees that it may be paid in that manner and,

(a) the statement of wages provided for that period under subsection 12(1) sets out, in addition to the information required by that subsection, the amount of vacation pay that is being paid separately from the amount of other wages that are being paid; or

(b) a separate statement setting out the amount of vacation pay that is being paid is provided to the employee at the same time that the statement of wages is provided under subsection 12(1).

Section 36(3) has the effect of permitting an employee and an employer to agree in writing that the employer may pay the vacation pay that accrues during each pay period on the pay day for that period. See ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and s. 1(3.1) for information on agreements in writing. This method of paying vacation pay may only be used if the following criteria are met:

1. The employer and the employee agree to this method of payment, in writing.
2. The employee must be informed, with each pay period that the monies received include an amount in respect of vacation pay. The employer may fulfil this requirement by:
    - Setting out the amount of vacation pay being paid separately from the amount of other wages being paid in the statement of wages required under s. 12(1), or
    - Issuing the employee a separate statement of the vacation pay paid with respect to that pay period at the same time the statement of wages required under s. 12(1) is provided.

It should be noted that although ESA Part XI, s. 35 and s. 35.1 require vacation time to be taken (completed) within the 10 months following the period in which the vacation is earned, these provisions do not impose a time limit with respect to the payment of vacation pay where the employer and employee have made an agreement under s. 36(3) or s. 36(4). Where the employer and employee have made such an agreement, the obligations with respect to the payment of vacation pay are independent from the requirements to schedule vacation time.

Same - s. 36(4)

36(4) The employer may pay the employee vacation pay at a time agreed to by the employee.

This provision permits the employer and the employee to agree in writing to pay the employee vacation pay at a time they mutually choose. See ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and s. 1(3.1) for information on agreements in writing. Agreements made pursuant to s. 36(4) do not require approval from the Director of Employment Standards.

It should be noted that although ESA Part XI, s. 35 and s. 35.1 require vacation time to be taken (completed) within the 10 months following the period in which the vacation is earned, these provisions do not impose a time limit with respect to the payment of vacation pay where the employer and employee have made an agreement under s. 36(4) or s. 36(3). Where the employer and employee have made such an agreement, the obligations with respect to the payment of vacation pay are independent from the requirements to schedule vacation time.

ESA Part XI Section 37 - Payment During Labour Dispute

Payment During Labour Dispute - s. 37(1)

37(1) If the employer has scheduled vacation for an employee and subsequently the employee goes on strike or is locked out during a time for which the vacation had been scheduled, the employer shall pay to the employee the vacation pay that would have been paid to him or her with respect to that vacation.

This provision introduced by the Employment Standards Act, 2000. It codifies Program policy that applied with respect to the application of s. 29(3) of the former Employment Standards Act.

Section 37(1) requires employers to pay employees their vacation pay at the time of their scheduled vacation, despite any strike or lock-out during the scheduled vacation period. Sections 29(2) and 29(3) under the former Employment Standards Act permitted this result but did not require it. Section 29(2) gave the Director the power to require an employer to pay vacation pay to an employee (who was entitled to vacation pay) at any time. Section 29(3) provided that the Director's power under s. 29(2) applied even in the context of a strike or lock-out.

Cancellation - s. 37(2)

37(2) Subsection (1) applies despite any purported cancellation of the vacation.

This provision was introduced by the ESA 2000. The effect of this provision is to require an employer to pay vacation pay to an employee in respect of a pre-approved and scheduled vacation that falls during a strike or lock-out, despite a purported cancellation of that previously scheduled vacation.

ESA Part XI Section 38 – If Employment Ends

38 If an employee's employment ends at a time when vacation pay has accrued with respect to the employee, the employer shall pay the vacation pay that has accrued to the employee in accordance with subsection 11(5).

This section provides that when an employee's employment ends, for any reason, the employee is entitled to any accrued vacation pay that is outstanding at the time the employment ended and the employer is required to pay any such vacation pay within the later of seven days of the date the employment ended or on the day that would have been the employee's next pay day as per ESA Part V, s. 11(5). Note also that ESA Part V, s. 12.1 sets out a requirement to provide a statement of the wages paid (including vacation pay) when employment ends.

Vacation Pay Entitlements on Cessation of Employment

An employee whose employment has ended and has not been given a vacation with pay in respect of a completed stub period or 12-month vacation entitlement year is entitled to vacation pay on wages (excluding any vacation pay previously paid) for the stub period or vacation entitlement year.

If the employee has not completed a vacation entitlement period, the employee is not entitled to vacation time and, under ESA Part XI, s. 35.2, the right to accrue vacation pay appears to be explicitly tied to the completion of a vacation entitlement period.

However, by application of another piece of legislation called the Apportionment Act, RSO 1990, c A.23, employees have the right to accrue vacation pay on an ongoing day by day basis and therefore, the right to accrue vacation pay does not depend upon the completion of a vacation entitlement period. Even if an employee is hired and is terminated after working just one hour, the employee has accrued vacation pay on those wages.

The employee whose employment has ended will, therefore, receive at least four per cent or six per cent of the wages earned in any period of employment (whether a completed vacation entitlement year or stub period or not) for which vacation pay has not been given.

Because the entitlement to six per cent vacation pay is determined by whether an employee has reached the five year period of employment threshold, an employee whose employment is terminated during a vacation entitlement period before the employee has reached the five year threshold will be entitled on termination to vacation pay calculated as four per cent of the wages earned during the last (partially completed) vacation entitlement period (plus any outstanding vacation pay earned in previously completed vacation entitlement periods).

An employee who reached the five year period of employment threshold in that last (partially completed) vacation entitlement period is entitled to six per cent of all of the wages earned in that period (plus any outstanding vacation pay earned in previously completed vacation entitlement periods).

Example 1 – employee's period of employment less than five years on termination of employment

- Employee's vacation entitlement year is January 1 to December 31
- Employee would reach five year period of employment threshold on July 1
- Employment is terminated March 31

Employee's vacation pay for the period January 1 to March 31 is calculated as four per cent of all wages earned January 1 to March 31 because the employee had not reached the five year period of employment threshold prior to the termination.

Example 2 – employee's period of employment five years or more on termination of employment

- Employee's vacation entitlement year is January 1 to December 31
- Employee would reach five year period of employment threshold on July 1
- Employment is terminated November 1

The employee's vacation pay for the period January 1 to November 1 is calculated as six per cent of all wages earned January 1 to November 1 because the employee had reached the five year period of employment threshold prior to the termination.

Pursuant to s. 38, the employee is entitled to payment of that vacation pay on cessation of employment in accordance with ESA Part V, s. 11(5).

Deductions from Section 38 Payments (Section 13)

The standard rules with respect to permissible and non-permissible deductions from wages apply to s. 38 payments. For a detailed discussion, refer to ESA Part V, s. 13.

Where no records have been kept of vacations taken or payments of vacation pay, and there has been no separate item for vacation pay on wage statements, referees (in decisions made under the former Employment Standards Act) have consistently rejected employers' claims that the rate of pay included vacation pay and that it should therefore be deducted from vacation pay owing under s. 30 of the former Employment Standards Act (which correspond to s. 38 of the ESA 2000) or that vacation had already been taken. See the following decisions decided under the former Employment Standards Act: Natalizio c.o.b. The Lords Men's Hairstyling and Nataligio Enterprises Inc. c.o.b. L'Image Harstudio v Kraft et al (June 16, 1986), ESC 2132 (Egan); Roundhill Apartments v Turcaj (January 2, 1979), ESC 564 (Franks); Legal Personnel Consultants Ltd. v Strauss (December 8, 1979), ESC 673 (Green); Baker v Newland (July 22, 1980) ESC 821 (Bigelow); and Snow-Sport Limited v Bondy (May 26, 1986), ESC 2119 (Houston).

In Ener-Temp Mechanical v Bristow (February 1, 1985) ESC 1777 (Eaton), vacation pay was incorporated into the hourly rate, but the employee did not understand the method of payment. An order for vacation pay was affirmed.

In addition, no paid time-off will be deducted from a vacation payment under s. 38 unless both the employee and the employer agreed that such time-off constituted vacation with pay.

Finally, an employer is prohibited from deducting or setting off vacation pay from any vacation pay or a vacation with pay previously paid to an employee in excess of the employer's obligations under ESA Part XI Vacation with Pay. In Re Harold J. O'Brien (a decision under the former Employment Standards Act), where the employee had received three weeks' paid vacation – 1 week in excess of the applicable minimum standard, the employer was not allowed to set off the excess one-week paid vacation from the amount subsequently owed to the employee under s. 30 (now s. 38). However, the payment of vacation in excess of the Part XI Vacation with Pay requirements must be carefully reviewed in order to determine its characterization and the intent of the payment at the time it was made. If it was intended and characterized as an advance on a vacation pay payment, as opposed to an intentional payment of a greater contractual benefit than the Part XI Vacation with Pay standard, then it will be considered as a wage advance as opposed to wages earned. In that case, any adjustment on a subsequent vacation pay payment will be accepted as a proper reconciliation of wages due, i.e., a determination of wages earned, wages paid and those remaining outstanding, as opposed to a deduction or set-off prohibited by ESA Part V, s. 13. The employment standards officer would, in addition to ascertaining the employer's and employee's understanding of the payments, review the relevant employer's payroll records, as well as wage statements to determine if any evidence of intent or characterization of the payments exists.

ESA Part XI Section 39 - Multi-Employer Plans

39 Sections 36, 37 and 38 do not apply with respect to an employee and his or her employer if,

(a) the employee is represented by a trade union; and

(b) the employer makes contributions for vacation pay to the trustees of a multi-employer vacation benefit plan.

This provision was introduced by the Employment Standards Act, 2000 and codifies Program policy that applied with respect to s. 31 of the former Employment Standards Act. The provision has the effect of permitting unionized employers to participate in multi-employer vacation plans, where the types of obligations described in ss. 36, 37 and 38 of the ESA 2000 are performed by the administrator of the multi-employer plan as opposed to the employee's specific employer. These types of arrangements are common in the construction industry.

Where such a plan is in place, ss. 36, 37 and 38 of the Act which deal with:

1. When vacation pay is to be paid;
2. Vacation pay payments during labour disputes; and
3. Payment of vacation pay when employment ends, do not apply.

ESA Part XI Section 40 - Vacation Pay in Trust

Vacation Pay in Trust - s. 40(1)

40(1) Every employer shall be deemed to hold vacation pay accruing due to an employee in trust for the employee whether or not the employer has kept the amount for it separate and apart.

This provision, together with s. 40(2), is substantially the same as s. 15 of the former Employment Standards Act. Section 40(1) creates a statutory "deemed trust" for vacation pay. In doing this, the provision gives employee vacation pay a status equivalent to property that has been held in trust by an employer for another party. In other words, trust property is not the employer's property and does not form part of the employer's estate.

Trust claims receive priority over the claims of most other creditors of the employer, including many secured creditors. However, the courts have ruled that a statutory deemed trust, such as the s. 40 provision, does not meet the requirements of an actual trust under the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, RSC 1985, c B-3 ("BIA"). Therefore, vacation pay entitlements receive preferred but unsecured status in a distribution by a trustee in bankruptcy, in accordance with the scheme of distribution set out in s. 136 of the BIA.

Bankruptcy

In British Columbia v Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., [1989] 2 SCR 24, 1989 CanLII 43 (SCC) the Supreme Court of Canada considered the effect of a deemed trust provision in the British Columbia Social Services Tax Act, RSBC 1996, c 431 [repealed]. The Court ruled that a deemed trust created by statute was not a trust as contemplated by the former Bankruptcy Act ("BIA"). British Columbia v Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd. has been applied consistently. For example, in I.B.L. Industries Ltd. (Re) (Bkcy.), 1991 CanLII 7223 (ON SC), the Ontario Divisional Court held that an attempt to impose a deemed trust on the property of a bankrupt could not succeed. (If, however, an employer creates an actual trust by keeping the vacation pay separate and apart from other monies, the vacation pay would not form part of the property of the bankrupt and therefore will have priority over the interests of most other creditors, including secured creditors, as a trust under the BIA. Vacation pay is seldom placed in an actual trust by employers.)

In Abraham v Coopers & Lybrand Ltd. Trustee in bankruptcy for Canadian Admiral Corp., 1993 CanLII 8538 (ON SC) the Ontario Divisional Court quashed the referee's decision in Coopers & Lybrand Limited v Abraham et al (January 26, 1993), ES 08/93 (Wacyk) and indicated that vacation pay falls within the BIA definition of wages and therefore constitutes a preferred claim under s. 136(1)(d). Therefore, in a bankruptcy, vacation pay is subordinate to the claims of secured creditors, although it does have priority over other unsecured creditors with regards to what has accrued during the six months prior to the bankruptcy, to a maximum of $2,000 per employee (the maximum of $2,000 as set out in the BIA). If the bankruptcy occurred prior to August 1, 1992, the vacation pay would only have a priority to the extent of what has accrued during the three months prior to the bankruptcy, to a maximum of $500 per employee. The Divisional Court's decision in Abraham v Coopers & Lybrand Ltd. is consistent with the Divisional Court's decision in Armstrong et al. v Coopers & Lybrand Ltd. et al., 1986 CanLII 2621 (ON SC).

Section 136(1)(d) of the BIA now reads:

136(1) Subject to the rights of secured creditors, the proceeds realized from the property of a bankrupt shall be applied in priority of payment as follows:

(d) wages, salaries, commissions or compensation of any clerk, servant, travelling salesman, labourer or workman for services rendered during the six months immediately preceding the bankruptcy to the extent of two thousand dollars in each case, together with, in the case of a travelling salesman, disbursements properly incurred by that salesman in and about the bankrupt's business, to the extent of an additional one thousand dollars in each case, during the same period, and for the purposes of this paragraph commissions payable when goods are shipped, delivered or paid for, if shipped, delivered or paid for within the six month period, shall be deemed to have been earned therein[.]

It should be emphasized that in many bankruptcies, this section will not greatly improve the prospects for recovery of wage entitlements, since it does not give wages priority over the secured creditors of the employer.

Receiverships

The "deemed trust" for vacation pay continues to apply in receivership and other formal insolvency proceedings that are not bankruptcies, to ensure the trust status and priority for the vacation pay claims of employees over the claims of other creditors, including secured creditors. In this regard, see the Divisional Court's decision in in Abraham v. Coopers & Lybrand Ltd.

In that case, the court upheld the decision of the referee, who had determined that vacation pay took priority over a bank's secured claims in the form of a registered debenture and general security agreement under the Personal Property Security Act, RSO 1990, c P.10 ("PPSA"). The receiver argued that the bank's security took priority over the trust claim, as a prior "fixed" charge duly registered under the PPSA. The Court disagreed. In dismissing the receiver's application, the Court noted that according to s. 3(1)(a) of the PPSA (now s. 4(1)(a)), the PPSA does not apply to a lien given by statute.

Same - s. 40(2)

40(2) An amount equal to vacation pay becomes a lien and charge upon the assets of the employer that in the ordinary course of business would be entered in books of account, even if it is not entered in the books of account.

This provision together with s. 40(1) is substantially the same as s. 15 of the former Employment Standards Act. It has the effect of deeming a lien or charge on the assets of the employer. A lien or charge is a means of enforcing a debt or what may or will become a debt. In this case it is an unsecured debt. This is so, irrespective of whether the charge or lien is ever recorded in the employer's books of account.

ESA Part XI Section 41 - Approval to Forego Vacation

41(1) If the Director approves and an employee's employer agrees, an employee may be allowed to forego taking vacation to which he or she is entitled under this part.

(2) Nothing in subsection (1) allows the employer to forego paying vacation pay.

Section 41(1) has the effect of permitting employees and employers to agree in writing that the employee will forego their entitlement to time off for vacation. It should be noted that because the right to forego vacation is limited to vacation to which the employee is entitled, an employee cannot forego future vacation entitlements. See ESA Part I, s. 1(3) and s. 1(3.1) for information on agreements in writing.

Under the Act, an employee's right to vacation time is earned through completion of a stub period or vacation entitlement year. An employee cannot therefore agree to forego the vacation entitlement in any stub period or vacation entitlement year until the completion of that stub period or vacation entitlement year.

The agreement must be approved by the Director to be valid. However, as per s. 41(2), the employer is not permitted to forego paying the employee their vacation pay even though they have chosen to forego taking vacation time under s. 41(1).

ESA Part XI Section 41.1 – Vacation Statements

Vacation Statements – s. 41.1(1)

41.1(1) An employee is entitled to receive the following statements on making a written request:

1. After the end of a vacation entitlement year, a statement in writing that sets out the information contained in the record the employer is required to keep under subsection 15.1(2).

2. After the end of a stub period, a statement in writing that sets out the information contained in the record the employer is required to keep under subsection 15.1(3).

Section 41.1 was introduced by the Government Efficiency Act, 2002, SO 2002, c 18 ("GEA 2002"), effective November 26, 2002. It sets out employees' rights to statements regarding vacation time and pay statements, except where vacation pay is paid on each pay day as it accrues over each pay period as per ESA Part XI, s. 36(3).

Section 41.1(1) requires the employer to provide a statement containing the same information the employer is required to record under the new ESA Part VI, ss.15.1(2) and (3), on the written request of the employee, no more than once with respect to each vacation entitlement year or stub period.

When Statement to Be Provided – s. 41.1(2)

41.1(2) Subject to subsection (3), the statement shall be provided to the employee not later than the later of,

(a) seven days after the employee makes his or her request; and

(b) the first pay day after the employee makes his or her request.

Section 41.1(2) requires that, subject to s. 41.1(3), the vacation statement under s. 41.1(1) must be provided either seven days after the written request was made or the first pay day after the request was made, whichever is later.

Same – s. 41.1(3)

41.1 (3) If the request is made during the vacation entitlement year or stub period to which it relates, the statement shall be provided to the employee not later than the later of,

(a) seven days after the start of the next vacation entitlement year or the first vacation entitlement year, as the case be; and

(b) the first pay day of the next vacation entitlement year or of the first vacation entitlement year, as the case may be.

Section 41.1(3) provides that where the employee has made a written request for vacation information during the course of a current vacation entitlement year or stub period, the employer is required to provide the information either:

- Seven days after the end of that vacation entitlement year or stub period, or
- On the first regular pay of the next vacation entitlement year or first vacation entitlement year, whichever is later.

Restriction Re Frequency – s. 41.1(4)

41.1(4) The employer is not required to provide a statement to an employee more than once with respect to a vacation entitlement year or stub period.

Section 41.1(4) provides that an employer is required to provide a vacation information statement not more than once with respect to any vacation entitlement year or stub period.

Exception – s. 41.1(5)

41.1(5) This section does not apply with respect to an employee whose employer pays vacation pay in accordance with subsection 36(3).

Section 41.1(5) provides that the vacation statement obligations in s. 41.1 do not apply where the employer pays vacation pay in accordance with ESA Part XI, s. 36(3) (i.e., the employer and employee have agreed that the vacation pay that accrues in each pay period is to be paid on the pay day for that pay period). Under s. 36(3), the employer must provide information regarding the vacation pay paid each pay day as a separate item on the statement of wages required under ESA Part V, s. 12(1) or on a separate statement at the same time the employee is given the wage statement.

ESA Part XII - Equal Pay for Equal Work

Although the equal pay legislation was initially written to redress the problem of lower wages paid to females, Part XII of the Employment Standards Act, 2000 ensures that employees (both male and female) in Ontario are not paid a lower wage than their co-workers simply because of their sex.

Equal Pay for Equal Work vs. Pay Equity

The Pay Equity Act, RSO 1990, c P.7, was enacted in 1987 and came into force on January 1, 1988. It imposes a requirement commonly referred to in this country as "equal pay for work of equal value", which is also known as "comparable worth" in the United States and "equal pay for equal value" in Europe.

The purpose of the Pay Equity Act is to remove systemic gender discrimination from employers' compensation practices.

Pay equity is different from the s. 42 equal pay provision under the ESA 2000 in that the pay equity legislation compares wage rates of female job classes to male job classes to ensure that women performing jobs that are different from but of equal value to jobs performed by men will receive equal pay. (Note: subsequent amendments to the Pay Equity Act also imposed a "proportional value" requirement where the jobs are not equal.) Section 42 of the ESA 2000, on the other hand, requires that women performing substantially the same job as men, and vice versa, receive equal pay.

The Pay Equity Act is intended to eliminate the wage gap that exists due to the undervaluation of what is typically thought of as "women's work". Therefore, the equal pay provision in the ESA 2000 continues to be a remedy where a wage gap exists between men and women performing substantially the same jobs.

The Pay Equity Act is administered by the Pay Equity Commission, under the direction of a Pay Equity Commissioner who reports to the Minister of Labour. Inquiries concerning pay equity should be directed to the Pay Equity Commission.

ESA Part XII Section 41.2 – Interpretation

41.2 In this Part,

“substantially the same” means substantially the same but not necessarily identical.

Section 41.2 clarifies that for the purposes of the equal pay for equal work provisions in ESA Part XII, “substantially the same” means substantially the same but not necessarily identical. This provision informs the interpretation of the ESA Part XII, s. 42(1), s. 42.1(1) and s. 42.2(1).

ESA Part XII Section 42 – Equal Pay for Equal Work

Equal Pay for Equal Work – s. 42(1)

42(1) No employer shall pay an employee of one sex at a rate of pay less than the rate paid to an employee of the other sex when,

(a) they perform substantially the same kind of work in the same establishment;

(b) their performance requires substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility; and

(c) their work is performed under similar working conditions.

This section prohibits an employer from paying an employee a lower rate of pay than another employee on the basis of sex, where the employees perform “equal work”, as established in clauses (a) through (c). This requirement is subject to certain exceptions that are set out in s. 42(2) of the ESA 2000.

Employees of Different Sexes

Section 42 addresses a difference in the rate of pay between a male and a female, and vice versa. Two males, or alternately, two females, could be paid different rates of pay for performing “equal work” with no violation of this section occurring. Accordingly, the comparison must be between a male and female. Either a male or a female may be the lower paid employee, requiring the situation to be redressed.

Rate of Pay

For this provision to apply, there must be a difference in the rate of pay between a female and a male employee who perform “equal work”.

“Rate of pay” is not defined in the legislation.

It is Program policy that, for the purposes of Part XII, rate of pay generally includes:

- Hourly rates
- Salaries
- Piece work rates
- Commission rates
- Overtime pay rates

It is Program policy that, for the purposes of Part XII, rate of pay generally does not include:

- Vacation pay rates
- Tips or other gratuities, including tip pool percentages
- Expenses and travel allowances
- Benefit plans (or a payment in lieu of benefits)

There may be other forms of remuneration that could be captured under “rate of pay” that are not addressed in the list above. For example, there may be situations where certain bonus structures would properly fall under “rate of pay”, whereas other bonus structures would not. In assessing whether particular remuneration contributes to an employee’s “rate of pay”, an employment standards officer will consider all relevant factors, including the specifics of the compensation system, its purpose, and the legislative intent behind Part XII.

When determining whether there is a difference in the rate of pay between employees earning commissions, or employees who are subject to piece work rates, an employment standards officer will compare the rates applicable to both employees. For example, if a female and male employee both earn minimum wage plus 15% commission on all sales, the employees will be considered to be paid the same rate of pay even if one of the employees takes home a greater dollar amount because he or she made more sales. A similar approach will be taken with respect to overtime. As long as two employees are subject to the same overtime rate and overtime threshold, there would not be a difference in the rate of overtime pay between the two employees. One employee may earn more overtime pay than another because they work more hours, but this would not mean that there is a difference in the overtime rate between the employees.

One question that might arise is how to conduct a comparison in rate of pay between two employees who do “equal work” but who are paid pursuant to different compensation schemes. Comparing a set hourly rate or yearly salary to earnings that may fluctuate based on employee performance, such as commission or piece work, is not a viable assessment. It is Program policy that, generally, comparisons can only be made between two employees with the same remuneration scheme – in other words, only by comparing “apples to apples”. For example, if a female employee earns $24 an hour, an employment standards officer will not compare her rate of pay with a male employee who earns $18 an hour plus a commission rate. One exception, however, is the comparison between employees earning an hourly, weekly, or monthly rate, or a yearly salary; the comparison becomes “apples to apples” once it is established what each employee earns as an hourly rate and thus a direct comparison is possible. Similarly, an “apples to apples” comparison is possible where two employees, for example, both earn $25 per hour but one of the two also earns a 10% commission on sales. In this case, though there are different remuneration schemes, a direct comparison is possible because the employees earn exactly the same rate in one element of the remuneration scheme. In this example, the obvious outcome is that the rates of pay are not the same.

“Equal Work”

For this provision to apply, the female and male employees who are being compared must perform “equal work”. The elements that make up “equal work” are established in clauses 42(1)(a) through (c). In order for work to be considered equal, all of the following must be present:

1. The employees perform substantially the same kind of work;
2. The work is performed in the same establishment;
3. The work being performed requires substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility; and
4. The work is performed under similar working conditions.

Each of these elements is examined individually in the analysis below.

1. Substantially the Same Kind of Work

Until January 1, 1975, the equal pay section of the Act set out that the male and female employees were to be paid the same wage "... for the same kind of work... the performance of which requires equal skill, effort and responsibility. . ."

In Regina v Howard et al., Ex parte Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, 1970 CanLII 395 (ON CA), the Ontario Court of Appeal overturned a lower court decision and stated that "to construe ‘the same work’ as meaning ‘the identical work’ is to render completely redundant the words following ‘the performance of which requires equal skill, effort and responsibility.’" This decision led to legislative amendment of this section of the Act to its current wording in s. 42(1)(a) i.e. to reflect the court’s ruling, which was consistent with the policy intent of the provision.

Further to that, the Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017 introduced a definition to Part XII of the ESA 2000 that took effect on April 1, 2018. Section 41.2 defines “substantially the same” to mean substantially the same but not necessarily identical.

"Substantially the same kind of work" refers to the main characteristics or the core duties of the work. Jobs do not have to be identical for this standard to apply. Minor differences in job content do not, in and of themselves, make the section inapplicable.

When considering whether the kind of work is “substantially the same”, the work to be compared is work that the employees are performing contemporaneously. The comparison is to be made on the basis of the actual work the employees perform, not the terms of hiring, or the job descriptions.

An officer must look at the jobs as a whole and consider all information that is relevant in the particular circumstances. There are a number of different possible scenarios where a finding of substantially the same kind of work may be made.

For example, where two employees perform identical tasks 90% of the time and different tasks only 10% of the time, an officer may conclude that the employees perform substantially the same kind of work – i.e. the time spent on different tasks is not so extensive as to support a finding that the overall kind of work being performed is not substantially the same.

Similarly, a finding that substantially the same kind of work is being performed may be made where 90% of the employees' time is spent performing tasks that, although not identical, are so alike as to warrant that finding even though 10% of their time is spent on tasks that are different. Note that in the context of these provisions, it is the work itself that is being compared, not the value of the work (as is the case in the pay equity context).

The examples above are provided as illustrations of possible scenarios where a finding of substantially the same kind of work may be made. They are not intended to be an exhaustive list of such scenarios or to suggest that, as a threshold, 90% of the employees’ time must be spent on work that is identical or so alike before a finding that substantially the same kind of work is being performed can be made. Rather, the examples are provided as a point of reference only and are meant to assist in achieving general consistency in the interpretation of this provision. The examples do not establish a “rule” or a “test” and they should not be applied in a formulaic way without consideration of all relevant information. There may be situations where a higher or lower percentage of time may be spent on tasks that are identical or so alike, such that a finding that substantially the same kind of work is being performed is appropriate.

2. In the Same Establishment

The term "establishment" is defined in s. 1 of the ESA 2000 as follows:

"establishment", with respect to an employer, means a location at which the employer carries on business but, if the employer carries on business at more than one location, separate locations constitute one establishment if,

(a) the separate locations are located within the same municipality, or

(b) one or more employees at a location have seniority rights that extend to the other location under a written employment contract whereby the employee or employees may displace another employee of the same employer.

"Establishment" means a location where the employer carries on business. However, two or more locations of the employer will be considered a single establishment if:

1. They are in the same municipality; or

2. There are common bumping rights for at least one employee across municipal boundaries.

See ESA Part I, s. 1 of the Manual for further information regarding the definition of establishment.

3. Performance Requires Substantially the Same Skill, Effort and Responsibility

Per s. 42(1)(b), the performance of the work must require substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility. These are three separate requirements, each of which must be met in order for s. 42 to apply.

The Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017 introduced a definition in Part XII of the ESA 2000 that took effect on April 1, 2018. Section 41.2 defines "substantially the same" to mean substantially the same but not necessarily identical.

This further clarified that the skill, effort and responsibilities do not need to be exactly the same or identical to be considered substantially the same. Minor or inconsequential differences do not render the standard inapplicable.

The requirement for skill, effort and responsibility are applied to the actual work that the employees perform, and not their terms of hiring, job description or job title. The work that is to be compared is work that the employees are performing contemporaneously. The jobs must be evaluated as a whole. The fact that there are some differences in tasks between two jobs would not be a sufficient reason, in and of itself, to establish that the jobs do not require the same skill, effort or responsibility.

(i) Performance Requires Substantially the Same Skill

Skill refers to the degree or amount of knowledge or physical or motor capability needed by the employee performing the job. It includes factors such as education, manual dexterity, experience and training, and is measured in terms of performance requirements.

(ii) Performance Requires Substantially the Same Effort

Effort is the physical or mental exertion needed to perform a job. An example of physical effort is the amount of strength a labourer needs to lift packed boxes. An example of mental effort is the amount of thinking and concentration required by a bookkeeper to balance the books.

When determining whether the performance of the work requires substantially the same effort, the evaluation is based on the effort required for the work itself, and not on the effort expended by a particular individual. For example, where two employees lift 50 pound boxes, it is irrelevant that one employee finds the task to be very physically demanding while the other employee finds the same task to be quite effortless. However, it would take substantially more effort for an employee to lift 80 pound boxes as compared to an employee who lifts boxes that weigh only 10 pounds. As a result, where two jobs have different weight lifting requirements (e.g. 80 pounds versus 10 pounds), they may not satisfy the requirement that the work require substantially the same amount of effort.

The sporadic performance of an activity that may require extra physical or mental effort does not suffice to establish that the jobs require substantially different levels of effort.

(iii) Performance Requires Substantially the Same Responsibility

Responsibility is measured by the number and nature of an employee's job obligations, the degree of accountability and the degree of authority exercised by an employee in the performance of the job. Some factors to consider include:

- Responsibility for the safety of others;
- Supervision of others;
- Handling of cash;
- Safeguarding of confidential or restricted information; and
- Supervision received by the employee.

For example, an employee who always performs assigned tasks and duties in accordance with specific, detailed instructions would not have substantially the same degree of responsibility as an employee who works only from general policy objectives and refers to superiors on an infrequent basis only, when interpretations of organizational policy are in question.

As another example, where one employee is responsible for collecting and providing the money from individual cash registers to the accounting department, that employee would likely have more responsibility than an employee who does not handle any cash, or who handles cash only rarely in the performance of their job.

4. Similar Working Conditions

The working conditions between the two jobs being compared must be “similar”. (Note this is a lower threshold than “substantially the same,” as defined in s. 41.2 and applied in the “substantially the same kind of work” and “substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility” parts of the test).

"Working conditions" generally refer to factors such as:

- the working environment, such as an office or warehouse
- exposure to the elements, such as work that must be performed in severe weather conditions
- health and safety hazards, such as working at heights or exposure to chemicals

For example, appliance repairers who spend all their time on the employer’s premises do not have similar working conditions to appliance repairers who do their work attending at customers’ homes.

The performance of work in different departments generally does not, in and of itself, make the working conditions dissimilar.

Whether working at different times of the day makes the working conditions dissimilar depends on the particular circumstances. For example, it could be that an employee who works at night is regularly exposed to safety risks that an employee who works during the day is not, such that the working conditions may be dissimilar.

Note that where two employees work at different times of the day, but the working conditions remain similar, the difference in the timing of the shifts might still provide a basis for a differential in pay pursuant to the exception in s. 42(2)(d). This might arise, for example, if an employer pays a premium to an employee for working a particular shift (e.g. the night shift). See s. 42(2)(d) for more discussion on this point.

Exception – s. 42(2)

42(2) Subsection (1) does not apply when the difference in the rate of pay is made on the basis of,

(a) a seniority system;

(b) a merit system;

(c) a system that measures earnings by quantity or quality of production; or

(d) any other factor other than sex.

The prohibition against paying different rates of pay to employees of different sexes who perform "equal work", per s. 42(1) does not apply if the difference in the rate of pay is made on the basis of one of the exceptions set out in subsection (2).

(a) A Seniority System – s. 42(2)(a)

In order to fall within this exception, the difference in rate of pay must result from a system established by the employer in which employees' compensation is at least partially based on their length of service or accumulated number of hours worked. The same system must apply to both employees being compared.

For example, where a seniority system provides employees with a wage increase after every 500 hours worked, male and female employees might have different earnings based on where they fall in the seniority system; this would be in accordance with the exception in s. 42(2)(a) because it is the accumulated number of hours worked that determines the wage rate.

Note that where the employer does not have an established seniority system, a difference in rate of pay may be still be based on a "seniority-like" factor per subsection (d) below. For example, a longer-term employee may earn a higher rate of pay than a newly hired employee based informally on years of service.

(b) A Merit System – s. 42(2)(b)

In order to fall within this exception, the difference in rate of pay must result from a system established by the employer in which employees' compensation is at least partially based on their achievements and/or how well they perform their jobs. The system must apply to both employees being compared.

For example, an employer may increase employees' hourly wages by a set percentage if they meet a pre-established sales target. If an employee of one sex reaches the sales target before an employee of the opposite sex, and therefore earns a greater hourly wage, the difference in rate of pay is permissible under this provision.

Note that where the employer does not have an established merit system, a difference in rate of pay may be still be based on a "merit-like" factor (such as high productivity, above-average sales, exceptional customer service etc.) per subsection (d) below. Please see the discussion below for more information.

(c) A System that Measures Earnings by Quantity or Quality of Production – s. 42(2)(c)

This exception provides that a difference in rate of pay is not prohibited where the workplace has a system in place that measures earnings by quantity or quality of production. In order for this exception to apply, the system must apply to both employees being compared.

For example, an employer operates a widget factory and employs manufacturing employees who perform equal work. All employees receive $1.00 per completed widget, and receive a pay increase of 15 cents per widget after they complete 1,000 widgets. A difference in rate of pay will be justified where an employee of one sex earns $1.00 per completed widget because the employee has not yet reached the 1,000 threshold, while a comparator employee of the opposite sex who has already completed 1,000 widgets earns $1.15 per widget.

(d) Any Other Factor Other than Sex – s. 42(2)(d)

Note that between April 1, 2018 and December 31, 2018, this provision read as “Any other factor other than sex or employment status”. “Employment status” was added to s. 42(2)(d) on April 1, 2018 as a result of the Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017; the amendment was consistent with the prohibition set out in s. 42.1 that also came into force on April 1, 2018. The “or employment status” wording was repealed on January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018, which also repealed s. 42.1 in its entirety.

This clause provides that the prohibition against paying different rates of pay to two employees of different sexes performing “equal work” per s. 42(1) does not apply if the difference is based on any factor other than sex. The broad scope of this exception acknowledges the myriad of factors other than sex that come into play when pay rates are determined. In practice, this exception allows for a differentiation in rate of pay based on a wide variety of factors, including those that are subjective. Note, however, that the factor (or factors) that the employer provides as the reason(s) for the pay differential must be the actual reason(s). Employment standards officers will review and assess the credibility of any available evidence (which may in some cases be limited to the employer’s assertions) in order to satisfy themselves that the reason(s) provided are in fact the actual reason(s) for the pay differential. Note that it is possible for a “factor” used to support a difference in the rate of pay to fit within the s. 42(2)(d) exception, but to be prohibited by legislation that is not administered by the Ministry of Labour, such as the Ontario Human Rights Code.

The key determination to be made in applying this provision is whether the “factor” used to support the difference in the rate of pay is sex. The question to be answered is whether the employee is earning a particular rate of pay because he is male or she is female. If the answer is yes, this exception does not apply and equal pay is required. If the factor is anything other than sex, then this exception generally does apply.

Some examples of factors that the Program generally considers to fall under “any other factor other than sex” include:

Differences in experience or educational achievement

Even where the work is “equal”, a difference in relevant experience with another employer or educational achievement may be a “factor other than sex”, such that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Length of Service with the Employer

Where the employer does not have an established seniority system, a “seniority-like” factor may be a “factor other than sex”, such that the requirement for equal pay would not apply. For example, a new hire may receive a lesser rate of pay than an employee who has been employed for a longer period of time on the basis that they have less service.

Coverage under a Collective Agreement

Where one of the two employees being compared is covered by a collective agreement: the Program considers a difference in rate of pay that arises out of the collective bargaining process to be a “factor other than sex” such that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

This policy does not apply where the two employees being compared are covered by the same collective agreement. Note, however, that in this situation, differences in rate of pay might be substantiated under other exceptions.

Red Circling

Some employers engage in the practice of “red circling”. This means they maintain an employee's rate of pay, even after transferring the employee to a job that normally pays a lower rate. An example of this is an employee transferred to a lower paying job due to a company reorganization. Under a pure "red-circling" system, the higher-paid employee would remain at the present rate of pay until the lower paid employees catch up. "Red circling" is generally considered to be a “factor other than sex”, meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Job Market Conditions

The nature of the job market at a particular point in time may require an employer to offer a higher rate of pay to attract an employee to fill a particular role in its organization if the supply of qualified candidates is low. This is generally considered to be a “factor other than sex”, meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Nepotism

Paying an employee more (or less) than another employee because they are part of the employer’s family is a “factor other than sex”, meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Wage Premiums

In some cases, a difference in the shifts that are being worked by employees may mean that “equal work” is not being performed (e.g. a security guard on the day shift and a security guard on the night shift who have very different duties, level of responsibility and working conditions).

In certain situations, despite work between two employees on different shifts being “equal” per s. 42(1), the employer may pay a wage premium. This may be, for example, to compensate employees who work the evening shift for the inconvenience of working at that time. This rationale for providing a wage premium is considered to be a “factor other than sex”, meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Temporarily Working in Another Role

The question may arise as to whether an employee temporarily working in another role is an exception to the requirement in s. 42. An employee, for example, may temporarily occupy another position that has a different rate of pay, yet maintain the rate of pay associated with their “home” position (which may be higher or lower than the pay rate of the other employees in the temporary position.)

Whether or not this raises equal pay concerns will depend on the circumstances. For example, there may be an issue as to whether the employee who is temporarily performing the duties of another position is performing “equal work” to the other employees in that position. For example, the employee who is temporarily performing the duties may have substantially fewer or more responsibilities than the other employee(s) (e.g. a non-managerial employee may be in an acting assignment as manager but not be required to perform the tasks associated with disciplining employees).

If “equal work” is being performed by the employee who is temporarily in the position and an employee of the opposite sex whose “regular” job is to work in that position, the employer may nonetheless be permitted to maintain the differential in their rates of pay on the basis of any other factor other than sex. For example, assume that an employee who is temporarily in a position is permitted to maintain their usual, higher rate of pay for the duration of the temporary assignment. The employer may maintain that the difference in pay rate was based on the sudden or urgent need to fill the position and that the only practical way to do so was to transfer the higher-paid employee at their current rate of pay. The employer might also have a policy establishing as its regular practice that employees who temporarily “fill in” doing work in another role maintain their higher rate of pay. These reasons both constitute “any other factor other than sex” under s. 42(2)(d).

Conversely, if the employee who is temporarily in the position has a lower rate of pay than an employee doing “equal work”, the employer may pay that employee less because – although the work is “equal” (as per s. 42(1)) – the employee temporarily in the position is less experienced, not expected to perform all of the duties normally associated with that position, or on the basis of any other factor as discussed elsewhere in this section. All of these reasons constitute “any other factor other than sex”. However, if the difference in rate of pay is not based on a factor other than sex, the employer will be required to equalize the pay rates.

Other

An employer may pay an employee a higher rate of pay based on a factor such as the employee being well liked by key clients, being particularly friendly or because that employee is seen as always “going the extra mile”. Examples such as these, even though they may be based on the subjective opinion of the employer, may still constitute a “factor other than sex” meaning the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Reduction Prohibited – s. 42(3)

42(3) No employer shall reduce the rate of pay of an employee in order to comply with subsection (1).

Section 42(3) prohibits an employer from reducing an employee’s rate of pay to comply with s. 42(1). This means that where there is a difference in the rate of pay between employees in contravention of section 42, the employer cannot lower the higher-paid employee’s rate of pay to correct the violation.

For example, a male and a female both work as lifeguards performing equal work and none of the exceptions in s. 42(2) apply. The male employee earns a salary of $45,000 per year. The female employee earns $3,500 per month, which is equivalent to $42,000 per year. The employees work the same number of hours. The employer is prohibited from reducing the male employee’s rate of pay to $42,000 per year to comply with s. 42(1).

Organizations – s. 42(4)

42(4) No trade union or other organization shall cause or attempt to cause an employer to contravene subsection (1).

This section reinforces s. 5(1) of the ESA 2000, which states:

5(1) Subject to subsection (2), no employer or agent of an employer and no employee or agent of an employee shall contract out of or waive an employment standard and any such contracting out or waiver is void.

A trade union or other organization is prohibited from causing or attempting to cause the employer to pay different rates of pay to employees who do "equal work" per s. 42(1) on the basis that they are different sexes.

Deemed Wages – s. 42(5)

42(5) If an employment standards officer finds that an employer has contravened subsection (1), the officer may determine the amount owing to an employee as a result of the contravention and that amount shall be deemed to be unpaid wages for that employee.

This section permits an employment standards officer to determine the amount owed to an employee as a result of the contravention of s. 42(1), and deems that amount owing to be unpaid wages. An employment standards officer may consequently issue an order to pay wages under ESA Part XXII, s. 103 against an employer. This order may include the amount necessary to correct the inequality in the rate of pay between employees and may also include amounts owing under other standards that were calculated in the relevant period using the rate of pay that was found to violate s. 42. This may include, for example, vacation pay, public holiday pay, overtime pay, termination pay, etc.

Note that a director order to pay cannot be issued in relation to these deemed wages per s. 81(3).

Written Response – s. 42(6)

Subsection 42(6) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is therefore no longer in force. However, the Program's interpretation of this provision remains in this publication as complaints may still arise relating to the period of time when the provision was in force: from April 1, 2018 to December 31, 2018.

42(6) An employee who believes that their rate of pay does not comply with subsection (1) may request a review of their rate of pay from the employee's employer, and the employer shall,

(a) adjust the employee's pay accordingly; or

(b) if the employer disagrees with the employee's belief, provide a written response to the employee setting out the reasons for the disagreement.

Subsection 42(6) came into force on April 1, 2018. It was added to section 42 as a result of the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017. It was repealed pursuant to the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018 effective January 1, 2019.

This subsection provides that employees who believe that their employer is not complying with s. 42(1) may ask the employer to review their rate of pay. In response, the employer must review the employee's rate of pay and either adjust it upwards to address the contravention, or provide a written response that sets out the reasons why the employer disagrees with the employee's belief that there is a contravention.

The requirement that the employer's response be in writing is satisfied if the response is provided to the employee on paper (for example, in a printed letter) or electronically.

Section 42(6)(b) does not specify a timeline within which the employer must provide the written response. It is Program policy that the employer's response must be provided within a reasonable timeframe; what is reasonable will depend on the particular circumstances.

Note that this section does not require an employee to request a review of their rate of pay as a prerequisite to filing a claim under ESA Part XXII, s. 96(1). In other words, an employee who believes their rate of pay does not comply with s. 42(1) may file a claim without ever requesting a rate of pay review from the employer.

The requirement in this subsection to adjust the employee's pay rate applies prospectively only; it does not require the employer to retroactively pay the employee what they would have earned had they received equal pay prior to the adjustment. However, an employee may file a claim to recover any amounts owing prior to the adjustment (subject to the limitations on recovery set out in section 111).

ESA Part XII Section 42.1 – Difference in Employment Status - REPEALED

Section 42.1 of the ESA 2000 was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This section is therefore no longer in force. However, employees may still have a complaint relating to section 42.1 that arose during the period of time when the section was in force: from April 1, 2018 to December 31, 2018. For that reason, the Program's interpretation of this section remains as part of this publication, though the text appears in red to highlight that the relevant provisions have been repealed.

Difference in Employment Status – s. 42.1(1) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.1(1) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.1(1) No employer shall pay an employee at a rate of pay less than the rate paid to another employee of the employer because of a difference in employment status when,

(a) they perform substantially the same kind of work in the same establishment;

(b) their performance requires substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility; and

(c) their work is performed under similar working conditions.

Section 42.1 was added to the ESA 2000 as a result of the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017; it came into effect on April 1, 2018. It was repealed effective January 1, 2019 by the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018.

This section prohibits an employer from paying an employee a lower rate of pay than another employee on the basis of a difference in employment status, where the employees perform "equal work", as established in clauses (a) through (c). This requirement is subject to certain exceptions that are set out in s. 42.1(2) of the ESA 2000.

Note that certain employees are exempted from s. 42.1 – see O Reg 285/01, s. 9.1 for further information.

Employees of Different Employment Status

Section 42.1 addresses a difference in the rate of pay between two employees of the same employer with different employment status.

Section 1 of the ESA defines difference in employment status as follows:

"difference in employment status", in respect of one or more employees, means,

(a) a difference in the number of hours regularly worked by the employees; or

(b) a difference in the term of their employment, including a difference in permanent, temporary, seasonal or casual status; ("situation d'emploi différente")

See ESA Part I, s. 1 for a discussion of this definition.

Under this provision, the comparison of work performed must be between employees with a difference in employment status. Two employees of the same "employment status" could be paid different rates of pay for performing "equal work" with no violation of this section occurring. The work being compared is work that is being performed by the two employees contemporaneously.

Note that subject to certain exceptions, s. 42(1) prohibits employers from paying employees different rates of pay for "equal work" if one employee is being paid less due to a difference in sex. As such, although it would not be a violation of s. 42.1 for two employees of the same "employment status" to be paid differently, a potential violation could exist under sections 42 if there is a difference in sex between these employees. Also, where an employee is an assignment employee, the employer is prohibited from paying the assignment employee at a rate of pay less than the rate paid to an employee of the client when performing equal work, see section 42.2.

Rate of Pay

For this provision to apply, there must be a difference in the rate of pay between two employees of different employment status who perform "equal work".

"Rate of pay" is not defined in the legislation.

It is Program policy that, for the purposes of Part XII, rate of pay generally includes:

- Hourly rates
- Salaries
- Piece work rates
- Commission rates
- Overtime pay rates

It is Program policy that, for the purposes of Part XII, rate of pay generally does not include:

- Vacation pay rates
- Tips or other gratuities, including tip pool percentages
- Expenses and travel allowances
- Benefit plans (or a payment in lieu of benefits)

There may be other forms of remuneration that could be captured under “rate of pay” that are not addressed in the list above. For example, there may be situations where certain bonus structures would properly fall under “rate of pay”, whereas other bonus structures would not. In assessing whether particular remuneration contributes to an employee’s “rate of pay”, an employment standards officer will consider all relevant factors, including the specifics of the compensation system, its purpose, and the legislative intent behind Part XII.

When determining whether there is a difference in the rate of pay between employees earning commissions, or employees who are subject to piece work rates, an employment standards officer will compare the rates applicable to both employees. For example, if a full-time and a part-time employee both earn minimum wage plus 15% commission on all sales, the employees will be considered to be paid the same rate of pay even if one of the employees takes home a greater dollar amount because that employee made more sales. A similar approach will be taken with respect to overtime. As long as two employees are subject to the same overtime rate and overtime threshold, there would not be a difference in the rate of overtime pay between the two employees. One employee may earn more overtime pay than another because they work more hours, but this would not mean that there is a difference in the overtime rate between the employees.

One question that might arise is how to conduct a comparison in rate of pay between two employees who do “equal work” but who are paid pursuant to different compensation schemes. Comparing a set hourly rate or yearly salary to earnings that may fluctuate based on employee performance, such as commission or piece work, is not a viable assessment. It is Program policy that, generally, comparisons can only be made between two employees with the same remuneration scheme – in other words, only by comparing “apples to apples”. For example, if a female employee earns $24 an hour, an employment standards officer will not compare her rate of pay with a male employee who earns $18 an hour plus a commission rate. One exception, however, is the comparison between employees earning an hourly, weekly, or monthly rate, or a yearly salary; the comparison becomes “apples to apples” once it is established what each employee earns as an hourly rate and thus a direct comparison is possible. Similarly, an “apples to apples” comparison is possible where two employees, for example, both earn $25 per hour but one of the two also earns a 10% commission on sales. In this case, though there are different remuneration schemes, a direct comparison is possible because the employees earn exactly the same rate in one element of the remuneration scheme. In this example, the obvious outcome is that the rates of pay are not the same.

“Equal Work”

For this provision to apply, employees of different employment status who are being compared must perform “equal work”. The elements that make up “equal work” are established in clauses 42.1(a) through (c). In order for work to be considered equal, all of the following must be present:

1. The employees perform substantially the same kind of work;
2. The work is performed in the same establishment;
3. The work being performed requires substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility; and
4. The work is performed under similar working conditions.

Each of these elements is examined individually in the analysis below.

1. Substantially the Same Kind of Work

The employees being compared must perform substantially the same kind of work. The Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017 introduced a definition to Part XII of the ESA 2000 that took effect on April 1, 2018. Section 41.2 defines “substantially the same” to mean substantially the same but not necessarily identical.

In other words, jobs do not have to be identical for this standard to apply. "Substantially the same kind of work" refers to the main characteristics or the core duties of the work. Minor differences in job content do not, in and of themselves, make the section inapplicable.

When considering whether the kind of work is “substantially the same”, the work to be compared is generally work that the employees are performing contemporaneously. The comparison is to be made on the basis of the actual work the employees perform, not the terms of hiring, or the job descriptions.

An officer must look at the jobs as a whole and consider all information that is relevant in the particular circumstances. There are a number of different possible scenarios where a finding of substantially the same kind of work may be made.

For example, where two employees perform identical tasks 90% of the time and different tasks only 10% of the time, an officer may conclude that the employees perform substantially the same kind of work – i.e. the time spent on different tasks is not so extensive as to support a finding that the overall kind of work being performed is not substantially the same.

Similarly, a finding that substantially the same kind of work is being performed may be made where 90% of the employees' time is spent performing tasks that, although not identical, are so alike as to warrant that finding even though 10% of their time is spent on tasks that are different. Note that in the context of these provisions, it is the work itself that is being compared, not the value of the work (as is the case in the pay equity context).

The examples above are provided as illustrations of possible scenarios where a finding of substantially the same kind of work may be made. They are not intended to be an exhaustive list of such scenarios or to suggest that, as a threshold, 90% of the employees’ time must be spent on work that is identical or so alike before a finding that substantially the same kind of work is being performed can be made. Rather, the examples are provided as a point of reference only and are meant to assist in achieving general consistency in the interpretation of this provision. The examples do not establish a “rule” or a “test” and they should not be applied in a formulaic way without consideration of all relevant information. There may be situations where a higher or lower percentage of time may be spent on tasks that are identical or so alike, such that a finding that substantially the same kind of work is being performed is appropriate.

2. In the Same Establishment

The term "establishment" is defined in s. 1 of the ESA 2000 as follows:

"establishment", with respect to an employer, means a location at which the employer carries on business but, if the employer carries on business at more than one location, separate locations constitute one establishment if,

(a) the separate locations are located within the same municipality, or

(b) one or more employees at a location have seniority rights that extend to the other location under a written employment contract whereby the employee or employees may displace another employee of the same employer.

"Establishment" means a location where the employer carries on business. However, two or more locations of the employer will be considered a single establishment if:

1. They are in the same municipality; or
2. There are common bumping rights for at least one employee across municipal boundaries.

See ESA Part I, s. 1 of the Manual for further information regarding the definition of establishment.

3. Performance Requires Substantially the Same Skill, Effort and Responsibility

Per s. 42.1(1)(b), the performance of the work must require substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility. These are three separate requirements, each of which must be met in order for s. 42.1 to apply.

The Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017 introduced a definition in Part XII of the ESA 2000 that took effect on April 1, 2018. Section 41.2 defines “substantially the same” to mean substantially the same but not necessarily identical.

This clarifies that the skill, effort and responsibilities do not need to be exactly the same or identical in every respect to be considered substantially the same. Minor or inconsequential differences do not render the standard inapplicable.

The requirement for skill, effort and responsibility are applied to the actual work that the employees perform, and not their terms of hiring, job description or job title. The work that is to be compared is work that the employees are performing contemporaneously. The jobs must be evaluated as a whole. The fact that there are some differences in tasks between two jobs would not be a sufficient reason, in and of itself, to establish that the jobs do not require the same skill, effort or responsibility.

(i) Performance Requires Substantially the Same Skill

Skill refers to the degree or amount of knowledge or physical or motor capability needed by the employee performing the job. It includes factors such as education, manual dexterity, experience and training, and is measured in terms of performance requirements.

(ii) Performance Requires Substantially the Same Effort

Effort is the physical or mental exertion needed to perform a job. An example of physical effort is the amount of strength a labourer needs to lift packed boxes. An example of mental effort is the amount of thinking and concentration required by a bookkeeper to balance the books.

When determining whether the performance of the work requires substantially the same effort, the evaluation is based on the effort required for the work itself, and not on the effort expended by a particular individual. For example, where two employees lift 50 pound boxes, it is irrelevant that one employee finds the task to be very physically demanding while the other employee finds the same task to be quite effortless. However, it would take substantially more effort for an employee to lift 80 pound boxes as compared to an employee who lifts boxes that weigh only 10 pounds. As a result, where two jobs have different weight lifting requirements (e.g. 80 pounds versus 10 pounds), they may not satisfy the requirement that the work require substantially the same amount of effort.

The sporadic performance of an activity that may require extra physical or mental effort does not suffice to establish that the jobs require substantially different levels of effort.

(iii) Performance Requires Substantially the Same Responsibility

Responsibility is measured by the number and nature of an employee's job obligations, the degree of accountability and the degree of authority exercised by an employee in the performance of the job. Some factors to consider include:

- Responsibility for the safety of others;
- Supervision of others;
- Handling of cash;
- Safeguarding of confidential or restricted information; and
- Supervision received by the employee.

For example, an employee who always performs assigned tasks and duties in accordance with specific, detailed instructions would not have substantially the same degree of responsibility as an employee who works only from general policy objectives and refers to superiors on an infrequent basis only, when interpretations of organizational policy are in question.

As another example, where one employee is responsible for collecting and providing the money from individual cash registers to the accounting department, that employee would likely have more responsibility than an employee who does not handle any cash, or who handles cash only rarely in the performance of their job.

4. Similar Working Conditions

The working conditions between the two jobs being compared must be “similar”. (Note this is a lower threshold than “substantially the same” as defined in s. 41.2 and applied in in the “substantially the same kind of work” and “substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility” parts of the test.)

"Working conditions" generally refer to factors such as:

- the working environment, such as an office or warehouse
- exposure to the elements, such as work that must be performed in severe weather conditions
- health and safety hazards, such as working at heights or exposure to chemicals

For example, appliance repairers who spend all their time on the employer’s premises do not have similar working conditions to appliance repairers who do their work attending at customers’ homes.

The performance of work in different departments generally does not, in and of itself, make the working conditions dissimilar.

Whether working at different times of the day makes the working conditions dissimilar depends on the particular circumstances. For example, it could be that an employee who works at night is regularly exposed to safety risks that an employee who works during the day is not, such that the working conditions may be dissimilar.

Note that where two employees work at different times of the day, but the working conditions remain similar, the difference in the timing of the shifts might still provide a basis for a differential in pay pursuant to the exception in s. 42.1(2)(d). This might arise, for example, if an employer pays a premium to an employee for working a particular shift (e.g. the night shift). See s. 42.1(2)(d) for more discussion on this point.

Exception – s. 42.1(2) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.1(2) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.1(2) Subsection (1) does not apply when the difference in the rate of pay is made on the basis of,

(a) a seniority system;

(b) a merit system;

(c) a system that measures earnings by quantity or quality of production; or

(d) any other factor other than sex or employment status.

The prohibition against paying different rates of pay to employees of different employment status who perform "equal work", per s. 42.1(1) does not apply if the difference in the rate of pay is made on the basis of one of the exceptions set out in subsection (2).

(a) A Seniority System – s. 42.1(2)(a)

In order to fall within this exception, the difference in rate of pay must result from a system established by the employer in which employees' compensation is at least partially based on their length of service or accumulated number of hours worked. The same system must apply to both employees being compared.

For example, where a seniority system provides employees with a wage increase after every 500 hours worked, permanent and temporary employees might have different earnings based on where they fall in the seniority system; this would be in accordance with the exception in s. 42.1(2)(a) because it is the accumulated number of hours worked that determines the wage rate.

Note that where the employer does not have an established seniority system, a difference in rate of pay may be still be based on a "seniority-like" factor per subsection (d) below. For example, a longer-term employee may earn a higher rate of pay than a newly hired employee based informally on years of service. Please see the discussion under clause (d) for more information.

(b) A Merit System – s. 42.1(2)(b)

In order to fall within this exception, the difference in rate of pay must result from a system established by the employer in which employees' compensation is at least partially based on their achievements and/or how well they perform their jobs. The system must apply to both employees being compared.

For example, an employer may increase employees' hourly wages by a set percentage if they meet a pre-established sales target. If an employee of one employment status reaches the sales target before an employee with a different employment status, and therefore earns a greater hourly wage, the difference in rate of pay is permissible under this provision.

Note that where the employer does not have an established merit system, a difference in rate of pay may be still be based on a "merit-like" factor (such as high productivity, above-average sales, exceptional customer service etc.) per subsection (d) below. Please see the discussion under clause (d) for more information.

(c) A System that Measures Earnings by Quantity or Quality of Production – s. 42.1(2)(c)

This exception provides that a difference in rate of pay is not prohibited where the workplace has a system in place that measures earnings by quantity or quality of production. In order for this exception to apply, the system must apply to both employees being compared.

For example, an employer operates a widget factory and employs manufacturing employees who perform equal work. All employees receive $1.00 per completed widget, and receive a pay increase of 15 cents per widget after they complete 1,000 widgets. A difference in rate of pay will be justified where a temporary employee earns $1.00 per completed widget because they had not yet reached the 1,000 threshold, while a permanent employee who has already completed 1,000 widgets earns $1.15 per widget.

(d) Any Other Factor Other than Sex or Employment Status – s. 42.1(2)(d)

This clause provides that the prohibition against giving different rates of pay to two employees of different employment status performing “equal work” per s. 42.1(1) does not apply if the difference is based on any factor other than sex or employment status. The broad scope of this exception acknowledges the myriad of factors other than sex or employment status that come into play when pay rates are determined. In practice, this exception allows for a differentiation in rate of pay based on a wide variety of factors, including those that are subjective. Note, however, that the factor (or factors) that the employer provides as the reason(s) for the pay differential must be the actual reason(s). Employment standards officers will review and assess the credibility of any available evidence (which may in some cases be limited to the employer’s assertions) in order to satisfy themself that the reason(s) provided are in fact the actual reason(s) for the pay differential. Note that it is possible for a “factor” used to support a difference in the rate of pay to fit within the s. 42.1(2)(d) exception, but to be prohibited by legislation that is not administered by the Ministry of Labour, such as the Ontario Human Rights Code.

The key determination to be made in applying this provision is whether the “factor” used to support the difference in rate of pay is sex or employment status. If it is, this exception does not apply. If the factor is anything other than sex or employment status, then generally this exception does apply.

When determining whether the difference in rate of pay is based on “employment status”, the question to be answered is whether the employee is earning a particular rate of pay because of the number of hours they regularly work or because of the term of their employment (such as permanent, temporary, seasonal, or casual).

When determining whether the difference in rate of pay is based on “sex”, the question to be answered is whether the employee is earning a particular rate of pay because he is male or she is female.

If the answer to any of these three questions is yes, then the exception does not apply and equal pay is required per subsection 42.1(1).

Some examples of factors that the Program generally considers to fall under “any other factor other than sex or employment status” include:

Differences in experience or educational achievement

Even where the work is “equal”, a difference in relevant experience with another employer or educational achievement may be a “factor other than sex or employment status”, such that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Length of Service with the Employer

Where the employer does not have an established seniority system, a “seniority-like” factor may be a “factor other than sex or employment status”, such that the requirement for equal pay would not apply. For example, a new hire may receive a lesser rate of pay than an employee who has been employed for a longer period of time on the basis that they have less service.

Coverage under a Collective Agreement

Where one of the two employees being compared is covered by a collective agreement: the Program considers a difference in rate of pay that arises out of the collective bargaining process to be a “factor other than sex or employment status” such that the requirement for equal pay would not apply. For practical purposes, this means that a non-unionized employee and a unionized employee of different employment status can receive different rates of pay for performing “equal work”.

This policy does not apply where the two employees being compared are covered by the same collective agreement. Note, however, that in this situation, differences in rate of pay might be substantiated under other exceptions.

Red Circling

Some employers engage in the practice of “red circling”. This means they maintain an employee's rate of pay, even after transferring the employee to a job that normally pays a lower rate. An example of this is an employee transferred to a lower paying job due to a company reorganization. Under a pure "red-circling" system, the higher-paid employee would remain at the present rate of pay until the lower paid employees catch up. "Red circling" is generally considered to be a “factor other than sex or employment status”, meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Job Market Conditions

The nature of the job market at a particular point in time may require an employer to offer a higher rate of pay to attract an employee to fill a particular role in its organization if the supply of qualified candidates is low. This is generally considered to be a “factor other than sex or employment status”, meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Nepotism

Paying an employee more (or less) than another employee because they are part of the employer’s family is a “factor other than sex or employment status”, meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Wage Premiums

In some cases, a difference in the shifts that are being worked by employees may mean that “equal work” is not being performed (e.g. a security guard on the day shift and a security guard on the night shift who have very different duties, level of responsibility and working conditions).

In certain situations, despite work between two employees on different shifts being “equal” per s. 42.1(1), the employer may pay a wage premium. This may be, for example, to compensate employees who work the evening shift for the inconvenience of working at that time. This rationale for providing a wage premium is considered to be a “factor other than sex or employment status”, meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Temporarily Working in Another Role

The question may arise as to whether an employee temporarily working in another role is an exception to the requirement in s. 42.1. An employee, for example, may temporarily occupy another position that has a different rate of pay, yet maintain the rate of pay associated with their “home” position (which may be higher or lower than the pay rate of the other employees in the temporary position).

Whether or not this raises equal pay concerns will depend on the circumstances. For example, there may be an issue as to whether the employee who is temporarily performing the duties of another position is performing “equal work” to the other employees in that position. For example, the employee who is temporarily performing the duties may have substantially fewer or more responsibilities than the other employee(s) (e.g. a non-managerial employee may be in an acting assignment as manager but not be required to perform the tasks associated with disciplining employees).

If “equal work” is being performed by the employee who is temporarily in the position and an employee of a different employment status whose “regular” job is to work in that position, the employer may nonetheless be permitted to maintain the differential in their rates of pay on the basis of any other factor other than sex or employment status. For example, assume that an employee who is temporarily in a position is permitted to maintain their usual, higher rate of pay for the duration of the temporary assignment. The employer may maintain that the difference in pay rate was based on the sudden or urgent need to fill the position and that the only practical way to do so was to transfer the higher-paid employee at their current rate of pay. The employer might also have a policy establishing as its regular practice that employees who temporarily “fill in” doing work in another role maintain their higher rate of pay. These reasons both constitute “any other factor other than sex or employment status” under s. 42.1(2)(d).

Conversely, if the employee who is temporarily in the position has a lower pay rate than an employee doing “equal work”, the employer may pay that employee less because – although the work is “equal” (as per s. 42.1(1)) – the employee temporarily in the position is less experienced, not expected to perform all of the duties normally associated with that position, or on the basis of any other factor as discussed elsewhere in this section. All of these reasons constitute “any other factor other than sex or employment status”. However, if the difference in rate of pay is not based on a factor other than sex or employment status, the employer will be required to equalize the pay rates.

(Note that temporarily working in another position does not necessarily involve a change in employment status. For example, a permanent full-time employee may remain a permanent full-time employee when taking on a temporary work assignment.)

Other

An employer may pay an employee a higher rate of pay based on a factor such as the employee being well liked by key clients, being particularly friendly or because that employee is seen as always “going the extra mile”. Examples such as these, even though they may be based on the subjective opinion of the employer, constitute a “factor other than sex or employment status” meaning the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Reduction Prohibited – s. 42.1(3) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.1(3) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.1(3) No employer shall reduce the rate of pay of an employee in order to comply with subsection (1).

Section 42.1(3) prohibits an employer from reducing an employee’s rate of pay to comply with s. 42.1(1). This means that where there is a difference in the rate of pay between employees in contravention of section 42.1, the employer cannot lower the higher-paid employee’s rate of pay to correct the violation.

For example, two employees of different employment status both work as cooks performing equal work and none of the exceptions in s. 42.1(2) apply. The permanent employee earns a salary of $45,000 per year. The temporary employee earns $3,500 per month, which is equivalent to $42,000 per year. The employees work the same number of hours.The employer is prohibited from reducing the first employee’s rate of pay to $42,000 per year to comply with s. 42.1(1).

Organizations – s. 42.1(4) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.1(4) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.1(4) No trade union or other organization shall cause or attempt to cause an employer to contravene subsection (1).

This section reinforces s. 5(1) of the Act, which states:

5(1) Subject to subsection (2), no employer or agent of an employer and no employee or agent of an employee shall contract out of or waive an employment standard and any such contracting out or waiver is void.

A trade union or other organization is prohibited from causing or attempting to cause the employer to pay different rates of pay to employees who do “equal work” per s. 42.1(1) on the basis that the employees have different employment status.

Deemed Wages – s. 42.1(5) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.1(5) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.1(5) If an employment standards officer finds that an employer has contravened subsection (1), the officer may determine the amount owing to an employee as a result of the contravention and that amount shall be deemed to be unpaid wages for that employee.

This section permits the employment standards officer to determine the amount owed to an employee as a result of the contravention of s. 42.1(1), and deems that amount owing to be unpaid wages. An employment standards officer may consequently issue an order to pay wages under ESA Part XXII, s. 103 against an employer. This order may include the amount necessary to correct the inequality in the rate of pay between employees and may also include amounts owing under other standards that were calculated in the relevant period using the rate of pay that was found to violate s. 42.1. This may include, for example, vacation pay, public holiday pay, overtime pay, termination pay, etc.

Note that a director order to pay cannot be issued in relation to these deemed wages per s. 81(3).

Written Response – s. 42.1(6) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.1(6) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.1(6) An employee who believes that their rate of pay does not comply with subsection (1) may request a review of their rate of pay from the employee's employer, and the employer shall,

(a) adjust the employee's pay accordingly; or

(b) if the employer disagrees with the employee's belief, provide a written response to the employee setting out the reasons for the disagreement.

This subsection provides that employees who believe that their employer is not complying with s. 42.1(1) may ask the employer to review their rate of pay. In response, the employer must review the employee's rate of pay and either adjust it upwards to address the contravention, or provide a written response that sets out the reasons why the employer disagrees with the employee's belief that there is a contravention.

The requirement that the employer's response be in writing is satisfied if the response is provided to the employee on paper (for example, in a printed letter) or electronically.

Section 42.1(6)(b) does not specify a timeline within which the employer must provide the written response. It is Program policy that the employer's response must be provided within a reasonable timeframe; what is reasonable will depend on the particular circumstances.

Note that this section does not require an employee to request a review of their rate of pay as a prerequisite to filing a claim under ESA Part XXII, s. 96(1). In other words, an employee who believes their rate of pay does not comply with s. 42.1(1) may file a claim without ever requesting a review of their rate of pay from their employer.

The requirement in this subsection to adjust the employee's pay rate applies prospectively only; it does not require the employer to retroactively pay the employee what they would have earned had they received equal pay prior to the adjustment. However, an employee may file a claim in order to recover any amounts owing prior to the adjustment (subject to the limitations on recovery set out in section 111).

Transition, Collective Agreement – s. 42.1(7) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.1(7) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.1(7) If a collective agreement that is in effect on April 1, 2018 contains a provision that permits differences in pay based on employment status and there is a conflict between the provision of the collective agreement and subsection (1), the provision of the collective agreement prevails.

Same, Limit – s. 42.1(8) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.1(8) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.1(8) Subsection (7) ceases to apply on the earlier of the date the collective agreement expires and January 1, 2020.

These provisions, read together, provide that if a collective agreement that that is in effect on April 1, 2018 contains a provision that permits differences in the rate of pay based on employment status, the provision of the collective agreement will prevail even if it conflicts with the ESA. However, the conflicting provisions will cease to prevail on the earlier of the date the collective agreement expires or January 1, 2020.

ESA Part XII Section 42.2 – Difference in Assignment Employee Status – REPEALED

Section 42.2 of the ESA 2000 was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This section is therefore no longer in force. However, employees may still have a complaint relating to section 42.2 that arose during the period of time when the section was in force: from April 1, 2018 to December 31, 2018. For that reason, the Program's interpretation of this section remains as part of this publication, though the text appears in red to highlight that the relevant provisions have been repealed.

Difference in Assignment Employee Status – s. 42.2(1) – REPEALED

Subsection 42.2(1) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.2(1) No temporary help agency shall pay an assignment employee who is assigned to perform work for a client at a rate of pay less than the rate paid to an employee of the client when,

(a) they perform substantially the same kind of work in the same establishment;

(b) their performance requires substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility; and

(c) their work is performed under similar working conditions.

Section 42.2 was added to the ESA 2000 as a result of the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017; it came into effect on April 1, 2018. It was repealed effective January 1, 2019 by the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018.

This section prohibits a temporary help agency from paying an assignment employee a lower rate of pay than that paid to an employee of the client, where the employees perform “equal work” as established in clauses (a) through (c). This requirement is subject to the exception set out in s. 42.2(2) of the ESA 2000.

Difference in Assignment Employee Status

Section 42.2 addresses a difference in the rate of pay between an assignment employee and an employee of a client.

ESA Part I, s. 1 defines assignment employee, temporary help agency, and client as follows:

“assignment employee” means an employee employed by a temporary help agency for the purpose of being assigned to perform work on a temporary basis for clients of the agency

“temporary help agency” means an employer that employs persons for the purpose of assigning them to perform work on a temporary basis for clients of the employer

“client”, in relation to a temporary help agency, means a person or entity that enters into an arrangement with the agency under which the agency agrees to assign or attempt to assign one or more of its assignment employees to perform work for the person or entity on a temporary basis

See ESA Part I, s. 1 for a discussion of these definitions.

For this provision to apply, the comparison of work performed must be between an assignment employee and an employee of a client. An assignment employee cannot be paid a lower rate of pay than a client employee, where the two perform “equal work”. The work being compared is work that is being performed by the two employees contemporaneously.

(Note that subject to certain exceptions, s. 42(1) and 42.1(1) prohibit employers from paying employees different rates of pay for “equal work” due to a difference in sex or in employment status. The comparisons under sections 42 and 42.1 are not between an assignment employee and a client employee; in those contexts, an assignment employee would compare himself or herself to another assignment employee employed by the same temporary help agency.)

Rate of Pay

For this provision to apply, there must be a difference in the rate of pay between the assignment employee and the employee of the client who perform “equal work”.

“Rate of pay” is not defined in the legislation.

It is Program policy that, for the purposes of Part XII, rate of pay generally includes:

- Hourly rates
- Salaries
- Piece work rates
- Commission rates
- Overtime pay rates

It is Program policy that, for the purposes of Part XII, rate of pay generally does not include:

- Vacation pay rates

- Tips or other gratuities, including tip pool percentages
- Expenses and travel allowances
- Benefit plans (or payments in lieu of benefits)

There may be other forms of remuneration that could be captured under “rate of pay”, that are not addressed in the list above. For example, there may be situations where certain bonus structures would properly fall under “rate of pay”, whereas other bonus structures would not. In assessing whether particular remuneration contributes to an employee’s “rate of pay”, an employment standards officer will consider all relevant factors, including the specifics of the compensation system, its purpose, and the legislative intent behind Part XII.

When determining whether there is a difference in the rate of pay between employees earning commissions, or employees who are subject to piece work rates, an employment standards officer will compare the rates applicable to both employees. For example, if an assignment employee and an employee of the client both earn minimum wage plus 15% commission on all sales, the two individuals will be considered to be paid the same rate of pay even if one takes home a greater dollar amount because that employee made more sales. A similar approach will be taken with respect to overtime. As long as the assignment employee and the client employee are subject to the same overtime rate and overtime threshold, there would not be a difference in the rate of overtime pay between the two. One person may earn more overtime pay than another because they work more hours, but this would not mean that there is a difference in the overtime rate between them.

One question that might arise is how to conduct a comparison in “rate of pay” between an assignment employee and a client employee who do “equal work” but who are paid pursuant to different compensation schemes. Comparing a set hourly rate or yearly salary to earnings that may fluctuate based on employee performance, such as commission or piece work, is not a viable assessment. It is Program policy that, generally, comparisons can only be made between two employees with the same remuneration scheme – in other words, only by comparing “apples to apples”. For example, if an assignment employee earns $24 an hour, an employment standards officer will not compare her rate of pay with that of a client employee who earns $18 an hour plus a commission rate. One exception, however, is the comparison between employees earning an hourly, weekly, or monthly rate, or a yearly salary; the comparison becomes “apples to apples” once it is established what each employee earns as an hourly rate and thus a direct comparison is possible. Similarly, an “apples to apples” comparison is possible where two employees, for example, both earn $25 per hour but one of the two also earns a 10% commission on sales. In this case, though there are different remuneration schemes, a direct comparison is possible because the employees earn exactly the same rate in one element of the remuneration scheme. In this example, the obvious outcome is that the rates of pay are not the same.

“Equal Work”

For this provision to apply, the assignment employee and employee of the client who are being compared must perform “equal work”. The elements that make up “equal work” are established in clauses 42.2(a) through (c). In order for work to be considered equal, all of the following must be present:

1. The assignment employee and client employee perform substantially the same kind of work;
2. The work is performed in the same establishment;
3. The work being performed requires substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility; and
4. The work is performed under similar working conditions.

Each of these elements is examined individually in the analysis below.

1. Substantially the Same Kind of Work

The assignment employee and client employee being compared must perform substantially the same kind of work. The Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017 introduced a definition to Part XII of the ESA 2000 that took effect on April 1, 2018. Section 41.2 defines “substantially the same” to mean substantially the same but not necessarily identical.

In other words, jobs do not have to be identical for this standard to apply. "Substantially the same kind of work" refers to the main characteristics or the core duties of the work. Jobs do not have to be identical for this standard to apply. Minor differences in job content do not, in and of themselves, make the section inapplicable.

When considering whether the kind of work is “substantially the same”, the work to be compared is work that is being performing contemporaneously. The comparison is to be made on the basis of the actual work the employees perform, not the terms of hiring, or the job descriptions.

An officer must look at the jobs as a whole and consider all information that is relevant in the particular circumstances. There are a number of different possible scenarios where a finding of substantially the same kind of work may be made.

For example, where two employees perform identical tasks 90% of the time and different tasks only 10% of the time, an officer may conclude that they perform substantially the same kind of work – i.e. the time spent on different tasks is not so extensive as to support a finding that the overall kind of work being performed is not substantially the same.

Similarly, a finding that substantially the same kind of work is being performed may be made where 90% of the employees' time is spent performing tasks that, although not identical, are so alike as to warrant that finding even though 10% of their time is spent on tasks that are different. Note that in the context of these provisions, it is the work itself that is being compared, not the value of the work (as is the case in the pay equity context).

The examples above are provided as illustrations of possible scenarios where a finding of substantially the same kind of work may be made. They are not intended to be an exhaustive list of such scenarios or to suggest that, as a threshold, 90% of the employees’ time must be spent on work that is identical or so alike before a finding that substantially the same kind of work is being performed can be made. Rather, the examples are provided as a point of reference only and are meant to assist in achieving general consistency in the interpretation of this provision. The examples do not establish a “rule” or a “test” and they should not be applied in a formulaic way without consideration of all relevant information. There may be situations where a higher or lower percentage of time may be spent on tasks that are identical or so alike, such that a finding that substantially the same kind of work is being performed is appropriate.

2. In the Same Establishment

The term "establishment" is defined in s. 1 of the ESA 2000 as follows:

"establishment", with respect to an employer, means a location at which the employer carries on business but, if the employer carries on business at more than one location, separate locations constitute one establishment if,

(a) the separate locations are located within the same municipality, or

(b) one or more employees at a location have seniority rights that extend to the other location under a written employment contract whereby the employee or employees may displace another employee of the same employer.

"Establishment" means a location where the employer carries on business. However, two or more locations of the employer will be considered a single establishment if:

1. They are in the same municipality; or
2. There are common bumping rights for at least one employee across municipal boundaries.

See ESA Part I, s. 1 of the Manual for further information regarding the definition of establishment.

3. Performance Requires Substantially the Same Skill, Effort and Responsibility

Per s. 42.2(1)(b), the performance of the work must require substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility. These are three separate requirements, each of which must be met in order for s. 42.2 to apply.

The Fair Workplaces Better Jobs Act, 2017 introduced a definition in Part XII of the ESA 2000 that took effect on April 1, 2018. Section 41.2 defines “substantially the same” to mean substantially the same but not necessarily identical.

This clarifies that the skill, effort and responsibilities do not need to be exactly the same or identical in every respect to be considered substantially the same. Minor or inconsequential differences do not render the standard inapplicable.

The requirement for skill, effort and responsibility are applied to the actual work that the employees perform, and not their terms of hiring, job description or job title. The work that is to be compared is work that the employees are performing contemporaneously. The jobs must be evaluated as a whole.

The fact that there are some differences in tasks between two jobs would not be a sufficient reason, in and of itself, to establish that the jobs do not require the same skill, effort or responsibility.

(i) Performance Requires Substantially the Same Skill

Skill refers to the degree or amount of knowledge or physical or motor capability needed to perform the job. It includes factors such as education, manual dexterity, experience and training, and is measured in terms of performance requirements.

(ii) Performance Requires Substantially the Same Effort

Effort is the physical or mental exertion needed to perform a job. An example of physical effort is the amount of strength a labourer needs to lift packed boxes. An example of mental effort is the amount of thinking and concentration required by a bookkeeper to balance the books.

When determining whether the performance of the work requires substantially the same effort, the evaluation is based on the effort required for the work itself, and not on the effort expended by a particular individual. For example, where two employees lift 50 pound boxes, it is irrelevant that one employee finds the task to be very physically demanding while the other employee finds the same task to be quite effortless. However, it would take substantially more effort for an employee to lift 80 pound boxes as compared to an employee who lifts boxes that weigh only 10 pounds. As a result, where two jobs have different weight lifting requirements (e.g. 80 pounds versus 10 pounds), they may not satisfy the requirement that the work require substantially the same amount of effort.

The sporadic performance of an activity that may require extra physical or mental effort does not suffice to establish that the jobs require substantially different levels of effort.

(iii) Performance Requires Substantially the Same Responsibility

Responsibility is measured by the number and nature of an employee's job obligations, the degree of accountability and the degree of authority exercised by an employee in the performance of the job. Some factors to consider include:

- Responsibility for the safety of others;
- Supervision of others;
- Handling of cash;
- Safeguarding of confidential or restricted information; and
- Supervision received by the employee.

For example, an employee who always performs assigned tasks and duties in accordance with specific, detailed instructions would not have substantially the same degree of responsibility as an employee who works only from general policy objectives and refers to superiors on an infrequent basis only, when interpretations of organizational policy are in question.

As another example, where one employee is responsible for collecting and providing the money from individual cash registers to the accounting department, that employee would likely have more responsibility than an employee who does not handle any cash, or who handles cash only rarely in the performance of their job.

4. Similar Working Conditions

The working conditions between the two jobs being compared must be “similar”. (Note this is a lower threshold than “substantially the same” as defined in s. 41.2 and applied in in the “substantially the same kind of work” and “substantially the same skill, effort and responsibility” parts of the test).

"Working conditions" generally refer to factors such as:

- the working environment, such as an office or warehouse
- exposure to the elements, such as work that must be performed in severe weather conditions
- health and safety hazards, such as working at heights or exposure to chemicals

For example, appliance repairers who spend all their time on the employer’s premises do not have similar working conditions to appliance repairers who do their work attending at customers’ homes.

The performance of work in different departments generally does not, in and of itself, make the working conditions dissimilar.

Whether working at different times of the day makes the working conditions dissimilar depends on the particular circumstances. For example, it could be that an employee who works at night is regularly exposed to safety risks than an employee who works during the day is not, such that the working conditions may be dissimilar.

Note that where two employees work at different times of the day, but the working conditions remain similar, the difference in the timing of the shifts might still provide a basis for a differential in pay pursuant to the exception in s. 42.2(2). This might arise, for example, if an employer pays a premium to an employee for working a particular shift (e.g. the night shift). See s. 42.2(2) for more discussion on this point.

Exception – s. 42.2(2) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.2(2) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.2(2) Subsection (1) does not apply when the difference in the rate of pay is made on the basis of any other factor other than sex, employment status or assignment employee status.

The prohibition against paying different rates of pay to an assignment employee and an employee of the client who perform "equal work", per s. 42.2(1) does not apply if the difference in the rate of pay is made on the basis of any other factor other than sex, employment status or assignment employee status.

The broad scope of this exception acknowledges the myriad of factors other than sex, employment status or assignment employee status that come into play when pay rates are determined. In practice, this exception allows for a differentiation in rate of pay based on a wide variety of factors, including those that are subjective. Note, however, that the factor (or factors) that the employer provides as the reason(s) for the pay differential must be the actual reason(s). Employment standards officers will review and assess the credibility of any available evidence (which may in some cases be limited to the employer's assertions) in order to satisfy themself that the reason(s) provided are in fact the actual reason(s) for the pay differential. Note that it is possible for a "factor" used to support a difference in the rate of pay to fit within the s. 42.2(2) exception, but to be prohibited by legislation that is not administered by the Ministry of Labour, such as the Ontario Human Rights Code.

The key determination to be made in applying this provision is whether the "factor" used to support the difference in rate of pay is sex, employment status, or assignment employee status. If it is, this exception does not apply. If the factor is anything other than sex or employment status, this exception generally does apply.

When determining whether the difference in rate of pay is based on "sex", the question to be answered is whether the employee is earning a particular rate of pay because he is male or she is female.

When determining whether the difference in rate of pay is based on "employment status", the question to be answered is whether the employee is earning a particular rate of pay because of the number of hours they regularly work or because of the term of their employment (such as permanent, temporary, seasonal, or casual).

When determining whether the difference in rate of pay is based on "assignment employment status", the question to be answered is whether the employee is earning a particular rate of pay because she or he is an assignment employee.

If the answer to any of these questions is yes, then the exception does not apply and equal pay is required per subsection 42.2(1).

Some examples of factors that the Program generally considers to fall under "any other factor other than sex, employment status or assignment employee status" include:

Coverage under a Collective Agreement

Where one of the two employees being compared is covered by a collective agreement: the Program considers a difference in rate of pay that arises out of the collective bargaining process to be a "factor other than sex or employment status" such that the requirement for equal pay would not apply. For practical purposes, this means that a non-unionized assignment employee and a unionized employee of the client can receive different rates of pay for performing "equal work".

This policy does not apply where the assignment employee and client employee being compared are covered by the same collective agreement. Note, however, that in this situation, differences in rate of pay might be substantiated under other exceptions.

An Established Seniority System at the Client Business

(Note that where a seniority system at a client business is established through a collective agreement, the discussion under the heading "Coverage Under a Collective Agreement" is applicable.)

In many workplaces that use assignment employees, those assignment employees are not subject to, or covered by, the client employers' systems that establish client employees' eligibility for wage increases.

A difference in rate of pay between an employee of a client and an assignment employee resulting from a seniority system established by the client (outside of a collective agreement) in which its employees' compensation is based solely on a "mechanical" fact-based measurement (for example, length of service or accumulated number of hours of work), and in which increases in rate or pay happen automatically or "mechanically" without any normative assessment/evaluation by the employer, will generally be considered to fall within the exception. As such, a difference in rate of pay would be substantiated where, pursuant to such a system, the client employee has a greater length of service or more accumulated hours than the assignment employee.

For example:

A client employer's employees progress through a wage grid based solely on their length of employment. Employees start at $18 per hour and automatically receive an $1 per hour increase after six months of employment.

Client Employee A started January 1, 2018 at $18 per hour and received a $1 per hour increase after six months of employment, on July 1, 2018.

Assignment Employees B and C perform "equal work" to Client Employee A. Assignment employees B and C are both paid $18 per hour. B has been on assignment in the workplace for seven months. C has been on assignment in the workplace for two months.

The difference in the rate of pay between Client Employee A and Assignment Employee B is not considered to fall within the exception. In this situation, the assignment employee is being paid a lower rate because the seniority system does not apply to them by virtue of the agency, and not the client, being their employer. Subsection 42.2(2) provides that an exception to the equal pay requirement cannot be based on the fact that the assignment employee is an assignment employee.

The difference in the rate of pay between Client Employee A and Assignment Employee C is considered to fall within the exception of "any other factor other than sex, employment status or assignment employee status"; here the difference in rate of pay is consistent with the established wage grid that determines employees' compensation pursuant to their length of employment and that awards a $1 per hour increase after six months of employment, which Assignment Employee B has not yet completed. Accordingly, there would be no contravention.

For practical purposes, this means that where the client employer applies a purely mechanical, fact-based system to determine eligibility for wage increases, assignment employees who are doing "equal work" to client employees must be notionally treated as if that system applies to them for the purpose of determining if the exception applies.

Where the client's system for determining pay rate increases for its employees is not based purely on a mechanical, fact-based measurement and instead includes a subjective performance appraisal or a normative assessment of some sort, the Program will generally consider the system to fall within the exception. In practice, this means that assignment employees who are doing "equal work" to client employees do not have to be notionally treated as if such systems apply to them for the purpose of determining their rate of pay. This is due to the nature of the relationship between assignment employees and client businesses: generally, it is not reasonable to require client businesses to conduct subjective performance appraisals/normative assessments on assignment employees. For a more detailed discussion on systems involving such evaluations, please see the heading "An Established Merit System at the Client Business".

Length of Service at the Workplace with the Employer

Where a client does not have an established seniority system, a "seniority-like" factor may be a "factor other than sex, employment status or assignment employee status", such that the requirement for equal pay would not apply. For example, a longer-term employee of the client may earn a greater rate of pay than that given to a newly placed assignment employee.

An Established Merit System at the Client Business

(Note that where a merit system at a client business is established through a collective agreement, the discussion under the heading "Coverage Under a Collective Agreement" is applicable.)

In many workplaces that use assignment employees, those assignment employees are not subject to, or covered by, the client employers' systems that establish employees' eligibility for wage increases.

A difference in pay rate may result from a merit system established by the client employer in which its employees' compensation is at least partially based on their achievements and/or how well they perform their jobs.

If a client employer has a merit system in place that is established outside of a collective agreement, whereby the client formally evaluates employees' performance and that normative evaluation determines, at least in part, their pay rate, then this would generally be considered "any other factor other than sex, employment status or assignment employee status" such that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Since an assignment employee is not an employee of the client business, it generally cannot be expected that the assignment employee would be subject to a formal performance review by the client. It would also be completely impractical for the temporary help agency to attempt to review the assignment employee's performance pursuant to the client's evaluation criteria since the agency does not have a presence in the client's workplace, meaning it would not have the necessary information or opportunity to observe performance on which to base an evaluation. So, due to the nature of the working relationship and the impracticalities of the agency applying the client's evaluation criteria, it is the Program's position that such a performance review cannot be required and the client's merit system therefore cannot be applied to an assignment employee.

For practical purposes, this means that assignment employees who are doing "equal work" to the client employees do not have to be treated as if that system "notionally" applies to them for the purpose of the determination of their rate of pay.

System that Measures Earnings by Quantity or Quality of Production at the Client Business

(Note that where a system that measures earnings by quanity or quality of production is established through a collective agreement, the discussion under the heading "Coverage Under a Collective Agreement" is applicable.)

In many workplaces that use assignment employees, those assignment employees are not subject to, or covered by, the client employers' systems that establish employees' eligibility for wage increases.

A difference in rate of pay between an employee of a client and an assignment employee resulting from a system established by the client (outside of a collective agreement), that measures earnings by quanity or quality of production, in which its employees' compensation is based solely on a mechanical fact-based measurement (for example, the number of widgets completed or the quality of completed widgets), and in which increases in rate or pay happen automatically or "mechanically" without any normative assessment/evaluation by the employer, will generally be considered to fall within the exception. For example, a difference in rate of pay would be substantiated where, pursuant to such a system, the client employee has produced a greater number or more quality widgets than the assignment employee.

An example of a system that measures earnings by quantity of production

A client employer operates a widget factory and employs manufacturing employees. All employees receive $1 per completed widget, and receive a pay increase of 15 cents per widget after they complete 1,000 widgets. If the same compensation system is applied to the assignment employee who enters the workplace, the fact that the client employee earns $1.15 per widget (based on the fact that she has already completed 1000 widgets) while the assignment employee earns only $1.00 per widget (because she has not yet completed 1,000 widgets) would be an exception to per s. 42.2(2). However, note that in order for this exception to apply, the assignment employee must also be paid $1.15 per widget once they have completed 1,000 widgets.

An example of a system that measures earnings by quality of production

A client employer operates a widget factory and employs manufacturing employees. All employees receive $1 per completed widget, and receive a pay increase of 15 cents per widget after the first 1,000 of their completed widgets meet a "mechanical"/objective quality test. If the same compensation system is applied to the assignment employee who enters the workplace, the fact that the client employee earns $1.15 per widget (based on the fact that she has already achieved the threshold of 1,000 quality widgets) while the assignment employee earns only $1.00 per widget (because she has not yet achieved the quality threshold) would be an exception to per s. 42.2(2). However, note that in order for the exception to apply, the assignment employee must also earn $1.15 per widget once they complete 1,000 widgets that meet the quality test.

But, where the client's system for determining pay rate increases for its employee is not based purely on a mechanical, fact-based measurement and instead includes a subjective performance appraisal or a normative assessment of some sort, that system will generally be considered to fall within the exception.

In practice, this means that where the client employer's system involves a normative assessment of some sort, the assignment employees who are doing "equal work" to the client employees do not have to be notionally treated as though that system applies to them for the purpose of determining their rate of pay. This is due to the nature of the relationship between assignment employees and client businesses: it is generally not reasonable to require client businesses to conduct normative assessments on assignment employees. For a more detailed discussion on systems involving involving such evaluations, please see the heading "An Established Merit System at the Client Business".

Differences in experience or educational achievement

Even where the work is "equal", a difference in relevant experience or educational achievement may be a "factor other than sex or employment status", such that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Red Circling of a Client Employee

Some employers engage in the practice of "red circling". This means they maintain an employee's rate of pay, even after transferring the employee to a job that normally pays a lower rate. An example of this is an employee transferred to a lower paying job due to a company reorganization. Under a pure "red-circling" system, the higher-paid employee would remain at the present rate of pay until the lower paid employees catch up.

If a client employee has been "red circled", and thus earns a higher rate than what someone normally performing that work would earn, this would generally be considered to be a "factor other than sex, employment status or assignment employee status", meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Job Market Conditions

The nature of the job market at a particular point in time may require an employer to offer a higher rate of pay to attract an employee to fill a particular role in its organization if the supply of qualified candidates is low. If a client employee was hired at a higher rate of pay for this reason, this is generally considered to be a "factor other than sex, employment status or assignement employee status", meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Wage Premiums

In some cases, a difference in the shifts that are being worked by an assignment employee and an employee of the client may mean that "equal work" is not being performed (e.g. a security guard on the day shift and a security guard on the night shift who have very different duties, level of responsibility and working conditions).

In certain situations, despite work between two employees on different shifts being "equal" per s. 42.2(1), the employer may pay a wage premium. This may be, for example, to compensate employees who work the evening shift for the inconvenience of working at that time. This rationale for providing a wage premium is considered to be a "factor other than sex or employment status", meaning that the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Other

An employer may pay an employee a higher rate of pay based on a factor such as the employee being well liked by key clients, being particularly friendly or because that employee is seen as always "going the extra mile". Examples such as these, even though they may be based on the subjective opinion of the employer, constitute a "factor other than sex or employment status" meaning the requirement for equal pay would not apply.

Reduction Prohibited – s. 42.2(3) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.2(3) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.2(3) No client of a temporary help agency shall reduce the rate of pay of an employee in order to assist a temporary help agency in complying with subsection (1).

Section 42.2(3) prohibits a client of a temporary help agency from reducing an employee's rate of pay in order to help a temporary help agency comply with s. 42.2(1). This means that where there is a difference in the rate of pay in contravention of section 42.2, the client cannot lower its higher-paid employee's rate of pay to assist the temporary help agency in complying with its obligation under 42.2(1).

For example, an assignment employee and a client employee both work as administrative assistants performing equal work and none of the exceptions in s. 42.2(2) apply The assignment employee earns $15.00 per hour. The client employee earns $18.00 per hour. The client is prohibited from reducing its employee's pay to $15.00 in order to assist the temporary help agency in meetings its obligations under s. 42.2(1).

Organizations – s. 42.2(4) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.2(4) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.2(4) No trade union or other organization shall cause or attempt to cause a temporary help agency to contravene subsection (1).

This section reinforces s. 5(1) of the ESA 2000, which states:

5(1) Subject to subsection (2), no employer or agent of an employer and no employee or agent of an employee shall contract out of or waive an employment standard and any such contracting out or waiver is void.

A trade union or other organization is prohibited from causing or attempting to cause a temporary help agency to pay an assignment employee a lower rate of pay than that paid to an employee of the client, where they perform "equal work".

Deemed Wages – s. 42.2(5) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.2(5) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.2(5) If an employment standards officer finds that a temporary help agency has contravened subsection (1), the officer may determine the amount owing to an assignment employee as a result of the contravention and that amount shall be deemed to be unpaid wages for that assignment employee.

This section permits an employment standards officer to determine the amount owed to an assignment employee as a result of the contravention of s. 42.2(1), and deems that amount owing to be unpaid wages. An employment standards officer may consequently issue an order to pay wages under ESA Part XXII, s. 103 against a temporary help agency. This order may include the amount necessary to correct the inequality in the rate of pay and may also include amounts owing under other standards that were calculated in the relevant period using the rate of pay that was found to violate s. 42.2. This may include, for example, vacation pay, public holiday pay, overtime pay, termination pay, etc.

Note that a director order to pay cannot be issued in relation to these deemed wages per s. 81(3).

Section 74.18 imposes joint and several liability on temporary help agencies and the clients of temporary help agencies for certain unpaid wages owed in respect of a pay period where the assignment employee was assigned to perform work for the client. Per s. 74.18(3), the wages to which joint and several liability apply are limited to regular wages, overtime pay, public holiday pay and premium pay that was earned during the relevant pay period.

Section 74.18 applies in the context of wages deemed to be owing as a result of a contravention of s. 42.2(1). Please see the discussion at section 74.18 for more information.

Written Response – s. 42.2(6) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.2(6) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.2(6) An assignment employee who believes that their rate of pay does not comply with subsection (1) may request a review of their rate of pay from the temporary help agency, and the temporary help agency shall,

(a) adjust the employee's pay accordingly; or

(b) if the employer disagrees with the employee's belief, provide a written response to the employee setting out the reasons for the disagreement.

This subsection provides that assignment employees who believe that the temporary help agency is not complying with s. 42.2(1) may ask the agency to review their rate of pay. In response, the temporary help agency must review the assignment employee's rate of pay and either adjust upwards it to address the contravention, or provide a written response that sets out the reasons why it disagrees with the assignment employee's belief that there is a contravention.

The requirement that the employer's response be in writing is satisfied if the response is provided to the employee on paper (for example, in a printed letter) or electronically.

Section 42.12(6)(b) does not specify a timeline within which the temporary help agency must provide the written response. It is Program policy that the response must be provided within a reasonable timeframe; what is reasonable will depend on the particular circumstances.

Note that this section does not require an assignment employee to request a review of their rate of pay as a prerequisite to filing a claim under ESA Part XXII, s. 96(1). In other words, an employee who believes their rate of pay does not comply with s. 42.2(1) may file a claim without ever requesting a review of their rate of pay from the agency.

The requirement in this subsection to adjust the assignment employee's pay rate applies prospectively only; it does not require the temporary help agency to retroactively pay the employee what they would have earned had they received equal pay prior to the adjustment. However, an assignment employee may file a claim in order to recover any amounts owing prior to the adjustment (subject to the limitations on recovery set out in section 111).

Transition, Collective Agreement – s. 42.2(7) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.2(7) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.2(7) If a collective agreement that is in effect on April 1, 2018 contains a provision that permits differences in pay between employees of a client and an assignment employee and there is a conflict between the provision of the collective agreement and subsection (1), the provision of the collective agreement prevails.

Same, Limit – s. 42.2(8) (REPEALED)

Subsection 42.2(8) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. This provision is no longer in force. The discussion of this provision is being maintained for use in situations that arose when it was in force.

42.2(8) Subsection (7) ceases to apply on the earlier of the date the collective agreement expires and January 1, 2020.

These provisions, read together, provide that if a collective agreement that that is in effect on April 1, 2018 contains a provision that permits differences in the rate of pay between employees of a client and an assignment employee, the provision of the collective agreement will prevail even if it conflicts with the ESA 2000. However, the conflicting provisions will cease to prevail on the the earlier of the date the collective agreement expires or January 1, 2020.

ESA Part XIII - Benefit Plans

Part XIII of the Employment Standards Act, 2000 is intended to prohibit age, sex and marital status discrimination in respect of: employees, beneficiaries of employees, survivors of employees and dependents of employees in employee benefit plans, except in certain specific instances as set out in O Reg 286/01.

ESA Part XIII Section 43 - Definition

43 In this Part,

"employer" means an employer as defined in subsection 1(1), and includes a group or number of unaffiliated employers or an association of employers acting for an employer in relation to a pension plan, a life insurance plan, a disability insurance plan, a disability benefit plan, a health insurance plan or a health benefit plan.

This definition is substantially the same as the definition in s. 1 of O Reg 321 under the former Employment Standards Act.

The definition of employer in s. 43 is supplementary to the definition of "employer" in s. 1 of the Employment Standards Act, 2000. For the purposes of Part XIII, the definition in s. 43 also includes a group or association of unaffiliated employers that have combined for the purpose of providing a pension plan, a life insurance plan, a disability insurance plan, a disability benefit plan, a health insurance plan or a health benefit plan to the employers' employees. This practice is common, for example, in the construction industry.

ESA Part XIII Section 44 - Differentiation Prohibited

Differentiation Prohibited - s. 44(1)

44(1) Except as prescribed, no employer or person acting directly on behalf of an employer shall provide, offer or arrange for a benefit plan that treats any of the following persons differently because of the age, sex or marital status of employees:

1. Employees.

2. Beneficiaries.

3. Survivors.

4. Dependants.

Section 44(1) prohibits the employer from providing a benefit plan that differentiates between the employees (or their beneficiaries, survivors or dependants) on the basis of the age, sex or marital status of employees except as allowed in O Reg 286/01. The prohibition in this section applies to any employer or person acting directly on behalf of an employer. A "person acting directly on behalf of an employer" includes persons empowered to act on behalf of the employer such as agents.

It is important to note that differentiations in benefit plans based upon bona fide job classifications or length of service requirements may be violations of s. 44(1) if such differentiations affect persons because of the age, sex or marital status of an employee and if it would not be an undue hardship to the employer to remove the discriminatory provision. In other words, intent to discriminate is not necessary for a violation of s. 44(1) to occur. In this regard, see the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Ontario Human Rights Commission v Simpsons-Sears, [1985] 2 SCR 536, 1985 CanLII 18 (SCC) where an employer was found to have committed a breach of human rights legislation on the basis that a rule that it had imposed, while not intentionally discriminatory, had a discriminatory effect and its elimination would not cause "undue hardship" to the employer. In the employment standards context, for example, if all of an employer’s part-time employees are female, and part-time employees are excluded from a benefit plan, the reasoning in Ontario Human Rights Commission v Simpsons-Sears may require that the exclusion of part-time employees be eliminated.

1. Prohibited Grounds of Discrimination

Section 44(1) prohibits discrimination with respect to certain benefit plans on the basis of age, sex and marital status. The terms "age," "sex" and "marital status" are all defined in section 1 of O Reg 286/01 (although only for purposes of Part XIII and O Reg 286/01). For further discussion of these terms, please refer O Reg 286/01.

i. Age

"Age" is defined in s. 1 of O Reg 286/01 as follows:

"age" means any age of 18 years or more and less than 65 years.

Therefore, if a plan discriminates against employees who are under 18, or 65 or over, it will not constitute discrimination on the basis of age within the meaning of Part XIII.

On December 12, 2006 amendments to the Human Rights Code, RSO 1990, c H.19 (the "Code") to eliminate, for most employees, mandatory retirement at age 65 or older, came into force. The definition of "age" in the Code which formerly excluded ages 65 and older, was amended to eliminate the upper limit, with the result that in general, discrimination against employees aged 65 or older is no longer permitted. However, the Code still provides (now in subsections 25(2.1) to 25(2.3)) that the right to equal treatment without discrimination on the basis of age is not infringed by benefit, pension, superannuation or group insurance plans or funds that comply with the ESA 2000 and its regulations. Subsection 25(2.3) specifically states that this is so even if the ESA 2000 or its regulations define "age" differently than the definition in the Code. As a result, discrimination on the basis of employee ages of 65 or over is permitted in benefit plans under the ESA 2000 because O Reg 286/01 defines age as any age 18 years or more and less than 65 years. In Chatham-Kent (Municipality) v Ontario Nurses Association (O'Brian) (Re) (2010), 202 LAC (4th) 1 (Etherington), the arbitrator was asked to determine whether these provisions violated s. 15(1) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the "Charter") because they discriminate on the basis of age. Although the arbitrator concluded that they did indeed violate s. 15(1) of the Charter, he went on to find that they were saved by s. 1 of the Charter which states that rights otherwise protected under s. 15 are subject to "reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society".

ii. Sex

"Sex" is defined in s. 1 of O Reg 286/01 as follows:

"sex" includes,

(a) a distinction between employees that excludes an employee from a benefit under a benefit plan or gives an employee a preference to a benefit under a benefit plan because the employee is or is not a head of household, principal or primary wage earner or other similar condition, and

(b) a distinction between employees in a benefit plan because of the pregnancy of a female employee.

"Sex" is defined to include distinctions between employees because the employee "is or is not a head of household, principal or primary wage earner or other similar condition," and "a distinction between employees . . . because of the pregnancy of a female employee."

At one time, a distinction based on pregnancy was not generally considered sex discrimination. For example, in Bliss v Attorney General of Canada, [1979] 1 SCR 183, 1978 CanLII 25 (SCC), the Supreme Court of Canada held that unemployment insurance legislation providing special conditions for pregnant women did not constitute discrimination on the grounds of sex. As a result, the definition of "sex" in the predecessor to O Reg 286/01 was amended so as specifically to include a distinction based on pregnancy. The Bliss v Attorney General of Canada view was later overturned on the question of whether discriminatory treatment based on pregnancy constitutes discrimination on the basis of sex by the Supreme Court in Brooks v Canada Safeway Ltd., [1989] 1 SCR 1219, 1989 CanLII 96 (SCC).

iii. Marital Status

"Marital status" is defined in s. 1 of O Reg 286/01 as follows:

"marital status" includes,

(a) the condition of being an unmarried person who is supporting, in whole or in part, a dependent child or children, and

(b) the common law status as defined in the relevant benefit plan.

Under this inclusive definition, married employees (including employees married to a person of the same sex), unmarried employees supporting a dependent child or children, as defined in the plan, and employees with "common law" spouses will all be considered to have marital status. After the decision in Halpern v Canada (Attorney General), 2003 CanLII 26403 (ON CA), in which the Court of Appeal ruled that the exclusion of same sex couples from marriage was inconsistent with the equality guarantees in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, was not saved under section 1 of the Charter ("reasonable limits") and was, therefore, unconstitutional, the Program took the view that "common law status as defined in the relevant benefit plan" must include same-sex as well as opposite-sex common law couples. (See also the discussion of the definition "spouse" in O Reg 286/01, s.1 in the Manual.) On June 13, 2005, clause (b) of the definition of "marital status" was amended so as to eliminate the words "of husband and wife", thereby reflecting Halpern v Canada (Attorney General) and the Program position. Any exemption from s. 44(1) in O Reg 286/01 for differentiations on the basis of marital status must be applied equally to all employees with marital status. Likewise, if there is no exemption in the regulation, then all persons with marital status (including employees married to or in a common-law relationship with a person of the same sex and including single employees with supporting a dependent child or children) must be treated equally.

2. Types of Benefit Plans Covered

Part XIII and the prohibition against discrimination in s. 44 can apply to any type of benefit plan offered by an employer as defined in subsection 1(1) of the Act; benefit plans include those listed in s. 43 as well benefit plans such as supplementary unemployment benefits ("SUBS"), whether payable during periods of lay-off or as "top ups" for maternity and parental benefits, as well as deferred profit sharing plans. A deferred profit sharing plan need not be registered under the Income Tax Act, RSC 1985, c 1 (5th Supp) in order to be considered a benefit plan within the meaning of s. 44(1).

Note, however, that the definition of "employer" in s. 43, in addition to including employers as defined in subsection 1(1) of the Act, also includes a group of employers or an association acting for an employer in relation to certain types of benefit plans listed within s. 43. Thus, while the prohibition against discrimination in s. 44 applies in respect of any type of benefit plan provided, ordered or arranged for by an employer or person acting on behalf of an employer, the prohibition would apply in respect of a benefit plan offered by a group or association of employers only if it is a pension plan, life insurance plan or health benefit plan.

The use of the words "provide, offer or arrange" indicate that a plan will be covered by Part XIII whether or not employees are required to participate in it or make contributions to it. Thus, Part XIII will cover, among other plans, voluntary, "employee-pay-all" plans provided by an employer.

Section 44(1) applies to benefit plans without any distinction as to how the benefits are payable. For example, s. 44(1) may apply whether the benefits are payable periodically or as a lump sum. In addition a benefit plan described in s. 43 may be subject to the prohibition against discrimination in s. 44(1) even if there is no specific fund set up to provide the benefits. For example, "self-insured" company benefit plans, where the company pays for the benefits itself, rather than paying premiums to an insurance company, will be covered by Part XIII, even though the company has not set up a special segregated fund from which to pay these benefits. Part XIII would not cover an informal, "self-insured" pattern of responses such as where occasional days off with pay are provided on an ad hoc basis. However, once such a plan becomes formalized, i.e., using fixed criteria respecting who is eligible for benefits, it would come under Part XIII.

3. Persons Protected from Discrimination

Section 44(1) protects employees and their beneficiaries, survivors and dependants from discrimination under a benefit plan on the grounds of age, sex or marital status of the employees.

"Dependant" is the only one of these classes of persons defined in s. 1 of O Reg 286/01. It is defined as follows:

"dependant" means a dependant as defined in the relevant benefit plan, and "dependent child" and "dependent spouse" and have corresponding meanings.

For further discussion of the term "dependant", please refer to O Reg 286/01, s. 1.

Causing Contravention Prohibited - s. 44(2)

44(2) No organization of employers or employees and no person acting directly on behalf of such an organization shall, directly or indirectly, cause or attempt to cause an employer to contravene subsection (1).

This provision is substantially the same as s. 33(3) in the former Employment Standards Act. Section 44(2) prohibits an organization of employers or employees or a person acting on their behalf from causing or attempting to cause, in any way, an employer to contravene section 44(1), i.e., to discriminate in benefit plans on the basis of age, sex or marital status. For example, a union may be in violation of s. 44(1) if, during collective agreement negotiations, it seeks a benefit plan package that contains a provision contrary to s. 44(1).

ESA Part XIV – Leaves of Absence

The purpose of the leaves of absence provisions in Part XIV is to provide qualified employees with the right to take job protected leaves. The intent of each leave is discussed below.

Note: During the declared emergencies for COVID-19, orders were issued under the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act (EMCPA) that may have limited some employees' rights to take declared emergency leave, infectious disease emergency leave or any other statutory leave. Some of those emergency orders continued as time-limited orders under the Reopening Ontario (A Flexible Response to COVID-19) Act, 2020. These orders, including the period of time to which they relate, were published as regulations and can be found by visiting the Ontario government's e-Laws website.

Pregnancy and Parental Leave

The Employment Standards Amendment Act (Pregnancy & Parental Leave), 1990, SO 1990, c 26 amended the former Employment Standards Act with the intention of improving the rights and protections already afforded to pregnant employees, and to establish a leave for working parents. The provision of a parental leave generally allows parents to spend time with a newborn or newly adopted child and was also intended to enable employees to take advantage of the new parental benefit under the former federal Unemployment Insurance Act, RSC 1985, c U-1, effective November 18, 1990 and repealed on July 1, 1996. Similarly, the longer parental leave provided by the ESA 2000 in December 2000 was intended to enable employees to take advantage of the extended parental benefits made available in December 2000 under the federal Employment Insurance Act, SC 1996, c 23. A further amendment to the ESA 2000 to support an extension in the time period over which parental EI benefits could be accessed was made effective December 3, 2017 with the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017.

The 1990 amendments were drafted with the intention that qualified employees who availed themselves of the right to take pregnancy leave and parental leave would not be disadvantaged for doing so. As a result, employees on pregnancy or parental leave now have a right to be reinstated to the same position they held prior to going on leave. It is only if that position no longer exists that the employer can reinstate the employee to a comparable position. Under previous pregnancy leave provisions employers could, at their option, reinstate employees who took a leave to the employee's own position or to a comparable one. Employees are also to be reinstated at the greater of the wage rate they were earning prior to going on leave or the rate they would have been earning had they not taken the leave.

Employees are also entitled to continue to participate in certain benefit plans while on leave. The employer is required to continue paying the employer contributions and the employee continues to pay the employee portion of the premiums due unless the employee gives the employer written notice that they do not intend to pay the employee's contributions. In addition, seniority, length of service and length of employment continue to accrue while the employee is on leave.

Sick Leave

The sick leave provisions provide employees who have been employed for at least two consecutive weeks with the right to take up to three days of unpaid leave from work each calendar year because of a personal illness, injury or medical emergency. The sick leave provisions came into force on January 1, 2019 as a result of an amendment to the ESA 2000 by the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018.

Family Responsibility Leave

The family responsibility leave provisions provide employees who have been employed for at least two consecutive weeks with the right to take up to three days of unpaid leave from work each calendar year because of the illness, injury, medical emergency or urgent matter of certain relatives. The family responsibility leave provisions came into force on January 1, 2019 as a result of an amendment to the ESA 2000 by the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018.

Bereavement Leave

The bereavement leave provisions provide employees who have been employed for at least two consecutive weeks with the right to take up to two days of unpaid leave from work each calendar year because of the death of certain relatives. The bereavement leave provisions came into force on January 1, 2019 as a result of an amendment to the ESA 2000 by the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018.

Emergency Leave: Declared Emergencies and Infectious Disease Emergencies

The declared emergency leave provisions provide employees with the right to an unpaid leave of absence if the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because of an emergency declared by the Lieutenant Governor in Council or the Premier and if one of certain other eligibility criteria is met.

The infectious disease emergency leave provisions provide employees with the right to a leave of absence if the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because of certain specified reasons related to a designated infectious disease. The diseases that have been designated as infectious diseases are set out in O. Reg. 228/20. From April 19, 2021 to December 31, 2021, eligible employees are entitled to up to three paid days of infectious disease emergency leave in certain circumstances. Otherwise, the leave is unpaid.

Reservist Leave

The reservist leave provisions are intended to provide employees with the right to unpaid leave from work where the reservist employee, who has worked for their employer for at least six consecutive months, will not be performing the duties of their position because of a deployment to a Canadian Forces operations.

Family Medical Leave

The family medical leave provisions are intended to provide employees with the right to take up to 28 weeks of unpaid leave from work to provide care or support to certain family members who have a serious medical condition and are at significant risk of dying within a period of 26 weeks without penalty. The provision of a family medical leave was also intended to enable employees to take advantage of compassionate care benefits made available under the federal Employment Insurance Act, effective January 4, 2004 and expanded from 6 to 26 weeks of benefits on January 3, 2016 (although the provisions giving qualified employees the right to family medical leave under the ESA 2000 did not come into force until June 29, 2004). O Reg 476/06, filed on October 6, 2006 expanded the list of persons in respect of whom the leave could be taken.

Family Caregiver Leave

The family caregiver leave provisions are intended to provide employees with the right to take unpaid time off work to provide care or support to specified family members who have a serious medical condition, even if the family member is not at significant risk of death within a period of 26 weeks, which is a qualifying criterion for family medical leave. Employees are entitled to up to eight weeks of unpaid leave each year with respect to each specified family member.

Critical Illness Leave

The critical illness leave provisions are intended to provide employees who have been employed by their employer for at least six months with the right to take unpaid time off work to provide care or support to a critically ill minor child or adult who is a family member of the employee. Employees are generally entitled to up to 37 weeks of unpaid leave in relation to a minor child, and 17 weeks in relation to an adult, to be taken in a 52-week period (and may requalify for subsequent 37 or 17 weeks of leave in subsequent 52-week periods). The provision of this leave was also intended to enable employees to avail themselves of federal Employment Insurance benefits for providing care or support to a critically ill minor child or adult who is a family member of the employee.

Child Death Leave

The child death leave provisions are intended to provide employees who have been employed by their employer for at least six months with the right to take unpaid time off work if a child of the employee dies. The leave entitlement is up to 104 weeks of leave. It is required that the leave be taken in a single period. If an employee is charged with a crime in relation to the death of the child or if the child was a party to a crime in relation to their death, there is no entitlement.

Crime-Related Child Disappearance Leave

The crime-related child disappearance leave provisions are intended to provide employees who have been employed by their employer for at least six months with the right to take unpaid time off work if a child of the employee disappears as a probable result of a crime. The leave entitlement is up to 104 weeks of leave. The leave must be taken in a single period. The provision of a crime-related child disappearance leave was also intended to enable employees to apply for a federal income support grant for parents of missing children that became available on January 1, 2013 and that requires that the parent be on leave or have been on leave from work.

Organ Donor Leave

The organ donor leave provisions are intended to provide employees who have been employed by their employer for at least 13 weeks and who undergo surgery for the purpose of donating all or part of certain organs to other persons, with the right to take up to 13 weeks of job-protected, unpaid leave from work. The leave may be extended for medical reasons for a further period of up to 13 weeks.

Domestic or Sexual Violence Leave

The domestic or sexual violence leave provisions are intended to provide employees who have been employed for at least 13 weeks with two separate allotments of 10 days and 15 weeks of leave within each calendar year if the employee or the employee’s child has experienced or been threatened with domestic or sexual violence. The leave must be taken for specific purposes: to seek medical attention, to access professional counselling, to relocate temporarily or permanently, to seek law enforcement and legal assistance, and to access victim services. The first five days of leave are to be paid; the balance of the leave taken within a calendar year is unpaid.

ESA Part XIV Section 45 – Definitions

45 In this Part,

"parent" includes a person with whom a child is placed for adoption and a person who is in a relationship of some permanence with a parent of a child and who intends to treat the child as his or her own, and child has a corresponding meaning;

"spouse" means

(a) a spouse as defined in section 1 of the Family Law Act, or

(b) either of two persons who live together in a conjugal relationship outside marriage.

This section contains definitions of some of the terms used in Part XIV: parent, child and spouse.

History of the Defined Terms

The ESA 2000 introduced new definitions of the terms "same-sex partner" and "spouse" in September 2001, at the same time the personal emergency leave provisions, which referenced those terms, were introduced. At the time, same-sex partner was defined to mean unmarried same-sex couples, and spouse was defined to mean unmarried or married opposite-sex couples. After the Ontario Court of Appeal decision in Halpern v Canada (Attorney General), 2003 CanLII 26403 (ON CA), in which the Court ruled that the exclusion of same-sex marriages from the common-law definition of marriage was unconstitutional, the Program read the definition of spouse as if it included married same-sex couples. On June 29, 2004, the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Family Medical Leave), 2004, SO 2004, c 15 amended the ESA 2000 to reflect the Halpern v Canada decision. It repealed the same-sex partner definition, removed references in the personal emergency leave context to same-sex partner, and amended the definition of the term spouse to mean married and unmarried couples of the same or opposite sex. The Spousal Relationships Statute Law Amendment Act, 2005, SO 2005, c 5, which came into force on March 9, 2005, made a subsequent amendment to the definition of spouse in the ESA 2000. This amendment incorporated the amended definition of spouse in s. 1 of the Family Law Act, RSO 1990 c F.3 which (also as a result of the Spousal Relationships Statute Law Amendment Act, 2005) now refers to either of two persons who are married to each other rather than to "either of a man and woman" who are married to each other.

Parent

The definition of parent is an inclusive one, which means that the term parent could include individuals not specifically mentioned in the definition.

The Program's view of who is and is not a parent for the purposes of Part XIV is set out below - this is not necessarily an exhaustive list:

Birth Parents

It is the Program's position that all birth parents are parents.

This means, for example, that all birth parents who meet the other eligibility criteria are entitled to parental leave, including birth fathers who are not currently in a relationship with the mother of their child, and birth parents who put a child up for adoption. Such individuals could also be eligible for any other Part XIV leave that is available to employees with respect to the employee's child. For example, an employee may be eligible to take family medical leave to provide care or support to his child even if he is no longer in a relationship with the mother of the child, and even if the parent gave the child up for adoption.

It also means that a surrogate mother is a parent even if she may not be genetically related to the child, which may be the case, depending on the circumstances. Accordingly, a surrogate mother may be eligible for parental leave, and any other Part XIV leave that is available to employees with respect to the employee's child.

Correspondingly, children in circumstances described above will, as an employee, be eligible to take any Part XIV leave that is available to employees vis-a-vis their parent. For example, a child may be eligible to take family medical leave to provide care or support to the child's surrogate mother, or to the child's birth father who gave the child up for adoption.

Adoptive Parents

The definition of parent specifically includes a person with whom a child is placed for adoption.

This means that adoptive parents will be considered to be a parent for parental leave purposes and any other Part XIV leave that is available to employees with respect to the employee's child. Correspondingly, the adopted child will, as an employee, be eligible to take any leave respecting their adoptive parent that is available to employees vis-a-vis a parent. For example, the child could be eligible to take family medical leave to provide care or support to the adoptive father.

The Program's position is that it is sufficient that the adoption proceedings have been commenced in order to demonstrate that the placement is for the purposes of adoption. It is not necessary that adoption proceedings have been finalized.

Foster Parents

The definition of parent will not cover most foster parents, as their relationship to the child is usually based upon a short-term or interim arrangement. Accordingly, most foster parents are not eligible for parental leave, which is available only to parents. They may, however, be eligible for other leaves under Part XIV that are specifically made available to foster parents, for example, family responsibility leave, bereavement leave, critical illness leave, family medical leave, family caregiver leave, domestic or sexual violence leave, child death leave and crime-related child disappearance leave.

Note, however, that if a foster parent commences adoption proceedings, thereby demonstrating an intent to adopt rather than foster the child, they will be considered an adoptive parent and therefore fall within the definition of parent.

In addition, even though they have not commenced adoption proceedings, foster parents may be considered parents if they are participating in certain programs referred to as foster to adopt programs. In such cases, a child is placed with the foster parents for the purposes of adoption by the foster parent. Such programs allow a child to be placed for adoption even though the child is not legally adoptable and adoption proceedings cannot therefore be commenced. For example, the child may be placed prior to the natural parents having consented to the adoption or relinquishing their rights to the child. In those cases, the Program will consider them to be a parent from the date of the placement.

Note it will also be possible for a foster parent to enter a foster to adopt program sometime after the child was originally placed with them as a foster child. In that case, the foster parent would be considered a parent at the time they entered the program rather than the date of placement. In some cases, foster parents will commit to adopting the foster child in their care if the child cannot be returned to their birth parents or be placed with a family member. Generally, such a foster parent would become a parent only if they commenced adoption proceedings. However, as with foster to adopt programs, such a foster parent may be considered a parent although they are unable to commence adoption proceedings because the child is not yet legally adoptable. In those circumstances, the foster parent will be considered a parent from the date the foster parent intends to adopt the child and considers the placement to be a permanent one.

Legal Guardians

A person who is not a parent can become a legal guardian to a child by a court order or under a will. There are certain leaves under Part XIV that are specifically made available to legal guardians, for example, critical illness leave, family medical leave, child death leave, crime-related child disappearance leave, and domestic or sexual violence leave. Whether a legal guardian who is not a parent is eligible for leaves which apply only to parents such as parental leave would have to be determined on a case by case basis. Note that a legal guardian may be considered a parent through steps taken in adoption proceedings – see the discussion above for more information.

Person in a Relationship of Some Permanence with a Parent and Intends to Treat Child as Their Own

The definition of parent also specifically includes a person who is in a relationship of some permanence with a parent of a child and who intends to treat the child as their own. Such individuals will be considered to be a parent for parental leave purposes, and any other Part XIV leave that is available to employees with respect to the employee's child. Correspondingly, the child of such an individual will, if the child is an employee, be eligible to take any Part XIV leave that is available to employees vis-a-vis a parent.

In the Program's view, this part of the parent definition was intended to cover a person who is in a spousal-like relationship with someone who is the parent of a child, and who, although not being the birth parent or an adoptive parent of that child, intends to assume a parental role with respect to the child. The words "some permanence" connote a relationship that is not temporary or occasional.

Consider the following hypothetical example: Juan who was unattached when he was hired by his employer, meets Demetra who has a child (John) from a previous marriage and they begin dating. Six months later they pool their resources and move in together and shortly after that Juan requests a parental leave from his employer, saying that he needs time off work in order to bond with John.

The employer, who knows only that Juan's personnel file shows him as single with no dependents, is reluctant to grant the leave and contacts the Program to find out what his responsibilities are.

In this situation, there are two critical questions. The first is whether Juan and Demetra are in a relationship of some permanence. The second question is whether Juan intends to treat John as if John was his own child. Both of these questions are questions of fact, and it may well be that the only significant evidence available consists of statements from Juan himself. While the employer may point to the fact that Juan identified himself as single to the employer's human resources department when he was hired, that is easily explained by the fact that Juan and Demetra have only just moved in together.

Relationship of Some Permanence

Cases dealing with the meaning of this phrase under family law legislation need to be approached with a degree of caution, since the cases are usually concerned with support issues and for that reason may look to whether the relationship has been of sufficient duration to create a degree of economic dependence or inter-dependence between the parties. Nevertheless, the family law case law can be helpful. Significantly, in Abell v Casselman (1979), 1 FLRAC 449 (Ont Prov Ct) the Court held that the words "some permanence" connote a relationship that is not temporary or occasional. In Labbe v McCullough, 1979 CanLII 1204 (ON CJ) the parties had cohabited for only two periods of, respectively, four weeks and two weeks, and yet were found to be in a relationship of some permanence.

In the above example, although Juan and Demetra had been living together a relatively short time, it seems clear that the parties are committed and not just engaged in something temporary or occasional; thus, this part of the test would seem to have been met.

Intends To Treat the Child as Their Own

This aspect of the test looks to the intentions of the person vis-a-vis the child of their partner (i.e., a person with whom they are in a relationship of some permanence). Essentially it looks to whether the person's plans are to assume a parental role with respect to the child. Are they intending to assume a significant degree of responsibility for raising the child, including participation in the support, guidance education and discipline of the child, or will theirs be a "hands-off" approach in which such responsibility is left to the birth or adoptive parent? Here, Juan's perceived need to bond with John is suggestive of an individual who intends to assume a significant degree of responsibility, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, might be taken to indicate that this aspect of the test is also met.

Step-Parents

A "step-parent" is considered by the Program to be an individual who is the spouse (within the meaning of the s. 45 definition of spouse) of a child's parent.

Some step-parents will fall within the s. 45 definition of parent and some will not. A step-parent will only be considered to be a parent if the step-parent adopts the child, or if the step-parent intends to treat the child as their own. If neither of those conditions are met, the step-parent will not be considered to be a parent.

Note that while only a parent is eligible to take parental leave, a step-parent is eligible to take other leaves under Part XIV, for example, an employee may take family responsibility leave, bereavement leave, family caregiver leave, child death leave, crime-related child disappearance leave, critical illness leave, domestic or sexual violence leave, or family medical leave to provide care or support to a step-child, even if they would not fall within the definition of parent in s. 45.

Other parents

Because the definition is inclusive, the Part XIV definition of parent could include an individual who is neither a birth parent, nor an adoptive parent nor a person in a relationship of some permanence with a birth or adoptive parent who intends to treat the child of that parent as their own. However, the definition cannot be considered wide open, either. To fall within the definition if none of the categories of parent set out above apply, the position of the Program is that the person must have permanently assumed a parental-like role with respect to a child, even if they would not, strictly speaking, generally be considered to be a parent.

Consider the hypothetical example in which a young birth mother moves in with her own mother (the grandmother of the child), who plays a significant role with respect to caring for the child. One year later, the mother moved out of town, leaving the child with the grandmother, who now assumed complete responsibility for the child's care. After another six months, following a conversation in which the mother indicated she had no interest in having anything to do with the child, the grandmother applied to the courts for a permanent, legal custody order, which she obtained after a further five months.

While such a custody order cannot be equated with an adoption order, there seems to be little doubt on these facts that at the point of applying for a custody order, the grandmother has assumed a parental-like role with respect to her daughter's child, and would therefore be eligible for leaves that are available with respect to the employee's child.

The more difficult issue which is relevant for the purpose of determining the timing of a parental leave entitlement may be to determine at what point the child came into the grandmother's custody, care and control for the first time - the parental leave can begin no later than 52 weeks after the day the child comes into the grandmother's custody, care and control for the first time. During the first six months after the mother moved away, although the grandmother may have assumed a parental-like role, there is no evidence to suggest that she intended this to be permanent; in some ways, her situation is similar to that of a foster parent, providing care on a temporary basis. This obviously changed after a further six months, however, as the grandmother moved to secure the right to legal custody of the child and to divest her daughter of that right. This would seem to be the point at which the grandmother decided that she would permanently treat the child as her own, even though she did not actually get the custody order for another five months. Since this is the first point at which she has custody, care and control of the child, this is the relevant point for purposes of determining when the period for starting parental leave begins. See ESA Part XIV, s. 48(2) for a discussion regarding the window for commencing parental leave.

Child

Although no definition of child appears in s. 45, there are other definitions of child in Part XIV that apply to particular leaves, specifically, critical illness leave, crime-related child disappearance leave, child death leave, and domestic or sexual violence leave that do contain upper age limits and will therefore apply instead of the definition in s. 45. Having regard to the different definitions of child, and the different purposes of the leaves, it is Program policy that:

- With respect to parental leave only: Generally a person is no longer a child when they have reached the age of majority (18 years), as that person is typically no longer subject to care, custody and control exercised by parents. However, there may be situations where the Program would consider someone 18 or older to be a child under the parental leave provisions, such as a person who is developmentally delayed and functioning at the level of someone younger than 18 years old.
- With respect to critical illness leave, crime-related child disappearance leave, child death leave and domestic or sexual violence leave: in accordance with the definitions of child in ss. 49.4(1), 49.5(1), 49.6(1), 49.7(1) the child (or specifically the minor child in the case of critical illness leave) must be under 18 years of age in order for an employee to be eligible for these leaves.
- With respect to family responsibility leave, bereavement leave, family medical leave, family caregiver leave and critical illness leave: an employee may be eligible to take any of these leaves with respect to their child no matter what age the child is. For example, an employee may be eligible to take a critical illness leave or family medical leave to provide care or support to a critically or terminally ill 30-year old child. However, for critical illness leave, the length of the leave will vary depending on whether the child is a minor child (under 18 years) or an adult child (18 years or older).

Spouse

A person is a spouse as defined in s. 45 if they are a spouse as defined in s. 1 of the Family Law Act, RSO 1990, c F.3 (generally this means a person who is legally married to someone of the same or the opposite sex) or if they are living with someone of the same or opposite sex in a conjugal relationship outside marriage.

Section 1 of the Family Law Act defines spouse as:

. . . either of two persons who,

a) are married to each other, or

b) have together entered into a marriage that is voidable or void, in good faith on the part of a person relying on this clause to assert any right.

ESA Part XIV Section 46 – Pregnancy Leave

Pregnancy Leave – s. 46(1)

46(1) A pregnant employee is entitled to a leave of absence without pay unless her due date falls fewer than 13 weeks after she commenced employment.

This provision means that an employee is entitled to pregnancy leave if she would have been employed for a period of at least 13 weeks immediately preceding her due date had she worked until that date.

It is not necessary that the employee be actively working for all or any part of the 13-week qualifying period. For example, if the employee was hired just 13 weeks before her due date but became ill and was unable to work from the day after she started (or went on vacation or was laid-off during that 13 weeks), she will be entitled to the leave. This interpretation of s. 46(1) is reinforced by the fact that the right to commence the leave up to 17 weeks before the expected date of birth pursuant to s. 46(2) would be a nullity if the employee were required to actively be at work in the 13 weeks immediately preceding the expected date of birth. Another example is where, theoretically, an employee who is hired 13 weeks before her due date could begin her pregnancy leave immediately after being hired.

Section 8(2) of O Reg 288/01, which ties together periods of employment that are not more than 13 weeks apart, applies only to the Termination and Severance of Employment context. Therefore, where there has been a clear interruption in the employer-employee relationship during the 13-week qualifying period, the requirement in s. 46(1) will not be met. A clear quit or termination will break the length of employment.

For example, an employee's baby is due on February 19. On August 1 of the previous year, she was hired for a six-month contract that ends on February 1. On February 3 she is rehired as a permanent employee. Does she qualify for a pregnancy leave? In this example, she would not be entitled because there was a severing of the employment relationship on February 1 (when the contract ended) and a gap between that period of employment and the next period of employment, when the employee was hired on permanently on February 3. She could not be said to have been hired 13 weeks prior to the expected date of birth and is thus not entitled to take a pregnancy leave (although she will be entitled to a parental leave 13 weeks after February 3).

On the other hand, if the employee's contract had ended February 1 and she was hired permanently on February 2, she would be entitled to pregnancy leave, as she is considered to have commenced her employment on August 1, which is at least 13 weeks prior to her February 19 due date.

An employee may move from contract to permanent, or from part-time to full-time status, or vice versa, within the 13-week qualifying period without affecting the entitlement to leave. If the applicant has been the employer's employee for the entire 13-week period, whether active or inactive, contract or permanent, part-time or full-time, she is entitled to the leave. The qualifying condition makes no distinction between contract, permanent, active, inactive, part-time or full-time employees.

When Leave May Begin – s. 46(2); Exception – s. 46(3)

46(2) An employee may begin her pregnancy leave no earlier than the earlier of,

(a) the day that is 17 weeks before her due date; and

(b) the day on which she gives birth.

46(3) Clause (2)(b) does not apply with respect to a pregnancy that ends with a still-birth or miscarriage.

These provisions place restrictions on the earliest a qualified employee can begin her pregnancy leave.

Section 46(2) states that the earliest a pregnancy leave can begin is the earlier of two points in time, namely, 17 weeks before the due date (clause (2)(a)) or the date of birth (clause (2)(b)). Section 46(3) provides that in cases of still-birth or miscarriage, clause (2)(b) will not apply.

Together, ss. 46(2) and 46(3) mean that the earliest day a pregnancy leave can begin is 17 weeks before the due date. However, if there is a live birth (as opposed to a still-birth or miscarriage) more than 17 weeks before the due date, the pregnancy leave can begin as early as the birth date. (This latter result was introduced by the ESA 2000. Previously, women who had live births more than 17 weeks before the due date were not entitled to take a pregnancy leave.) In cases of still-birth or miscarriage, the earliest a pregnancy leave can begin is 17 weeks before the due date. Because an employee cannot begin a pregnancy leave any later than the date of birth (see s. 46(3.1)), a woman whose pregnancy ends in a miscarriage or still-birth more than 17 weeks before the due date is not entitled to take a pregnancy leave (although she may be eligible for sick leave under s. 50 or qualify for some additional leave under her contract of employment, such as short-term disability).

Under predecessor pregnancy leave provisions in the former Employment Standards Act, RSO 1980, c 137 (s. 35), an employer could require an employee to stop work at any time during the pregnancy, "at such time as the duties of her position cannot reasonably be performed by a pregnant woman or the performance of her work is materially affected by the pregnancy." This meant that the employee could be "put" on a pregnancy leave. That provision was repealed in 1990 and is not part of the ESA 2000. It is the employee's right to decide when she will commence leave (within the times set out in s.46) or if she will take a leave at all.

Under the Ontario Human Rights Code, RSO 1990, c H.19 (the "Code"), employers are required to accommodate the needs of pregnant employees, unless that would cause undue hardship to the business. Therefore, where an employee is unable, because of her pregnancy, to perform some aspect of her job, the Code provisions could require the employer to relieve her of the responsibilities of that aspect of her position but allow her to continue working. It would be inconsistent with this obligation to allow employers to force pregnant employees onto a pregnancy leave where their performance was adversely affected by the pregnancy.

In addition, because employers no longer have the right to "put" an employee on her leave before she had otherwise intended to go, an employee who is sick – even though it is related to or caused by the pregnancy – will be entitled to be treated like any other sick employee until the date she commences her leave. In James v Craiglee Nursing Home, 2004 CanLII 30948 (ON LRB) the employee was unable to perform the duties of her job for health reasons related to her pregnancy and went off sick on November 23, 2001. Her baby was born on February 27, 2002. She did not provide the employer with any written notice with respect to the pregnancy leave. On February 12, 2003 when she contacted the employer to ask to be put on the shift schedule she was informed that she had "overstayed" her leave. The employer argued that her pregnancy leave had commenced November 23, 2001 and they no longer had any obligation to reinstate her in February 2003. The Ontario Labour Relations Board found on the evidence that the employee had left on a sick leave with the full knowledge of the employer on November 23, 2001. The Board further held that although the employee gave the employer no written notice with respect to the commencement of the pregnancy leave that it had in fact commenced on the date of the baby's birth (February 27, 2002) in accordance with s. 46(2)(b). The employer therefore had an obligation to reinstate her at the end of February 2003. The Board ordered reinstatement.

Impact of Lay-off on Right to Commence Leave

What if the employee is on lay-off at the point when she would otherwise have commenced the leave? Depending on the timing of the lay-off in relation to her due date, she may have the option to convert from lay-off to pregnancy leave. This is because once the employee commences her leave, the "lay-off clock" for the purposes of Part XV (Termination and Severance of Employment) of the Act stops running. A week of lay-off is defined to exclude weeks in which the employee is unavailable for work, and an employee is unavailable for work if she is on a leave.

(Note: in all of the following examples, it is assumed that the employee gave birth on her due date.)

Example 1 – Employee Can Convert a Lay-off to a Leave

Thirty weeks before the employee's due date, she is laid off. Benefits are not continued. The employee had intended to commence pregnancy leave on her due date. Seventeen weeks before the due date (13 weeks after the lay-off began), her employment would be deemed terminated pursuant to Part XV of the Act, effective the first day of the lay-off. However, she could convert to pregnancy leave on the day her employment was to be terminated (being within 17 weeks of due date).

If the employee did not take any active steps to convert or notify her employer at the time, the principles enunciated in Re Scott and Roos Family Shoes (Brampton) Ltd. et al., 1985 CanLII 2124 (ON SC), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act, would apply such that she would not lose her entitlement to take pregnancy leave despite her lack of notice. However, special attention should be paid to the evidence supporting the employee's claim that she had intended to convert from lay-off to pregnancy leave prior to the deemed termination.

Example 2 – Employee Cannot Convert a Lay-off to a Leave

Thirty-six weeks before the employee's due date, she is laid off. Benefits are not continued. Twenty-three weeks before the due date (i.e., 13 weeks after the lay-off began), the employee is deemed terminated for the purposes of Part XV of the Act, effective the first date of lay-off. There is no right to the leave, as the employment relationship has come to an end before the earliest date she could begin a leave. It is important to note that, for the purposes of this example, the termination had nothing to do with the employee's intention to take a leave.

Latest Day for Beginning Pregnancy Leave – s. 46 (3.1)

46(3.1) An employee may begin her pregnancy leave no later than the earlier of,

(a) her due date; and

(b) the day on which she gives birth.

This provision was introduced by the ESA 2000. It codifies Program policy under the former Employment Standards Act.

Section 46(3.1) places restrictions on the latest a qualified employee may begin her pregnancy leave. The leave must begin no later than the due date or the birth date, whichever occurs first.

Notice – s. 46(4)

46(4) An employee wishing to take pregnancy leave shall give the employer,

(a) written notice at least two weeks before the day the leave is to begin; and

(b) if the employer requests it, a certificate from a legally qualified medical practitioner stating the due date.

These provisions are similar to the corresponding provision (s. 35(3)) of the former Employment Standards Act. One change, however, is that an employee is now only required to produce a medical certificate indicating her due date if asked to do so by her employer.

Section 46(4)(a) requires a pregnant employee to give two weeks' written notice of her intention to take a pregnancy leave. Under s. 46 (4)(b), the employee must submit a medical certificate that shows the due date, if asked to do so by the employer.

An employee's failure to conform to the statutory requirements for notice will not disentitle her to the pregnancy leave. It is the Program's view that the requirement to give notice of the leave is not a condition precedent to the entitlement to the pregnancy leave. An employee's entitlement to leave arises by virtue of having commenced her employment at least 13 weeks prior to the due date and it is the Program's position that the failure to give notice does not negate or diminish that entitlement. The Program's policy is consistent with the Ontario Divisional Court decision in Re Scott and Roos Family Shoes (Brampton) Ltd. et al. in which the Court held that the written notice requirement in the former Employment Standards Act was a formality only.

Notice to Change Date – s. 46(5)

46(5) An employee who has given notice to begin pregnancy leave may begin the leave,

(a) on an earlier day than was set out in the notice, if the employee gives the employer a new written notice at least two weeks before that earlier day; or

(b) on a later day than was set out in the notice, if the employee gives the employer a new written notice at least two weeks before the day set out in the original notice.

Under s. 46(5), an employee who has given notice to begin a pregnancy leave is entitled to change the date on which the leave will begin.

The employee may begin her leave on an earlier date than set out in her original notice, provided she gives the employer at least two weeks' written notice before the earlier day on which she now wishes to begin her leave.

The employee may begin her leave on a later day than set out in her original notice, provided she gives the employer at least two weeks' written notice before the day that was set out in her original notice.

Note that the options given to an employee by s. 46(5) to change the starting date of her leave remain subject to the limitations on the earliest and latest dates a leave may begin set out in ss. 46(2) and (3.1).

Notice to Change Date: Complications, etc. – s. 46(6)

46(6) If the employee stops working because of a complication caused by her pregnancy or because of a birth, still-birth or miscarriage that occurs earlier than the due date, subsection (4) does not apply and the employee shall, within two weeks after stopping work, give the employer,

(a) written notice of the day the pregnancy leave began or is to begin; and

(b) if the employer requests it, a certificate from a legally qualified medical practitioner stating,

i. in the case of an employee who stops working because of a complication caused by her pregnancy, that she is unable to perform the duties of her position because of the complication and stating her due date,

ii. in any other case, the due date and the actual date of the birth, still-birth or miscarriage.

This provision is similar to the corresponding provision (s. 36(1)) of the former Employment Standards Act. The only change is that an employee is now only required to provide a medical certificate if asked to do so by her employer.

If an employee stops work due to complications arising from the pregnancy, or because of a premature birth, still-birth or miscarriage, the alternate notice provisions set out in s. 46(6) will apply instead of those set out in s. 46(4).

Retroactive Notice of the Date the Leave Began

The notice must state the day the pregnancy leave began if the employee stops working because:

- She has given birth, had a still-birth, or suffered a miscarriage before the due date (note that the birth, still-birth or miscarriage will trigger the commencement of the leave); or

- She has stopped work because of pregnancy-related complications and has decided to commence her leave immediately.

Notice that the Employee Will Begin Leave at a Future Date

The notice must state the date the pregnancy leave will begin where the employee has suddenly had to stop work because of complications related to the pregnancy but has not yet given birth and does not wish to commence the leave at this point. (For example, she may intend to commence the leave on the due date and use her sick benefits in the meantime.)

For an employee who stops working due to complications caused by the pregnancy (whether or not she is beginning her pregnancy leave immediately upon stopping work), the medical certificate, if requested by the employer, must confirm that she is unable to perform the duties of her position, and state the employee's due date. In any other case, the medical certificate must state the due date and the actual date of the birth, still-birth or miscarriage.

ESA Part XIV Section 46.1 – Definition

Definition – s. 46.1

46.1 "legally qualified medical practitioner" means,

(a) a person who is qualified to practice as a physician,

(b) a person who is qualified to practice as a midwife,

(c) a registered nurse who holds an extended certificate of registration under the Nursing Act, 1991, or

(d) in the prescribed circumstances, a member of a prescribed class of medical practitioners.

This section defines legally qualified medical practitioner for the purposes of ESA Part XIV, s. 46. Subsections 46(4)(b) and 46(6)(b) specify that if the employer requests it, the employee must provide the employer with a certificate from a legally qualified medical practitioner stating the employee's due date, that she is unable to perform the duties of her position due to pregnancy complications, or the actual date of the birth, still-birth or miscarriage to support the commencement of her pregnancy leave.

Person who is qualified to practise as a physician

"A person who is qualified to practise as a physician" generally means a medical doctor who is a member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario. A physician of any specialty will meet the definition, however, practically speaking an obstetrician-gynecologist or a family medicine or general practitioner will likely be the person who issues the certificate.

Where care or treatment is provided in a jurisdiction other than Ontario, the question of whether the person is "qualified to practice as a physician" is determined with reference to the laws of that other jurisdiction.

Person who is qualified to practise as a midwife

“A person who is qualified to practise as a midwife” generally means a member of the College of Midwives of Ontario and a holder of a general certificate per the Midwifery Act, 1991.

Where care or treatment is provided in a jurisdiction other than Ontario, the question of whether the person is “qualified to practice as a midwife” is determined with reference to the laws of that other jurisdiction.

Registered nurse who holds an extended certificate of registration

"A registered nurse who holds an extended certificate of registration" means a member of the College of Nurses of Ontario who is a registered nurse and holds an extended certificate of registration in accordance with O Reg 275/94 made under the Nursing Act, 1991, SO 1991, c 32. These individuals are generally known as nurse practitioners in Ontario. This definition does not include a registered nurse who is a holder of a general certificate, or a registered practical nurse.

In the prescribed circumstances, a member of a prescribed class of medical practitioners

At the time of writing, no circumstances and no class of medical practitioners have been prescribed.

ESA Part XIV Section 47 - End of Pregnancy Leave

End of Pregnancy Leave – s. 47(1)

47(1) An employee's pregnancy leave ends,

(a) if she is entitled to parental leave, 17 weeks after the pregnancy leave began;

(b) if she is not entitled to parental leave, on the day that is the later of,

i. 17 weeks after the pregnancy leave began, and

ii. 12 weeks after the birth, still-birth or miscarriage.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22, amended s. 47(1)(b)(ii) of the Employment Standards Act, 2000 on January 1, 2018. Please see s. 47(1.1) below for more information on the application of this provision with respect to a leave commenced prior to January 1, 2018.

Under s. 47(1)(a), the pregnancy leave of an employee who is entitled to a parental leave (e.g., where there has been a live birth) will end 17 weeks after it began.

Section 47(1)(b) only applies where an employee is not entitled to a parental leave. In other words, it only applies where there is no child (i.e., it has not been born yet) or where it is still-born or died before the pregnancy leave ended. The effect of this provision is two-fold. First, it enables an employee who has used all 17 weeks of pregnancy leave before the child is born to remain on pregnancy leave up until the birth. Secondly, it ensures that employees who have a miscarriage, still-birth or whose child dies during the pregnancy leave will have at least 12 weeks after the date of delivery before the employee’s pregnancy leave ends. Similarly, an employee who has had a miscarriage during her pregnancy leave will have at least 12 weeks after the miscarriage before she can be required to return to work.

Example 1

An employee commenced her pregnancy leave 15 weeks before the baby's due date. Two weeks after the due date (which is 17 weeks after the pregnancy leave began) the baby is still not born. The baby is born two weeks later, or 19 weeks after the pregnancy leave first began. Because the employee was not entitled to parental leave after 17 weeks of pregnancy leave (because the baby was not yet born), s. 47(1)(a) would not apply to end the leave at that point. Instead, s. 47(1)(b) would apply to extend the pregnancy leave on the basis that the leave cannot end until the later of the day that is 17 weeks from the date the leave began or 12 weeks after the date of birth. In this example, a live birth would trigger the end of the pregnancy leave because the employee no longer falls under the description in s. 47(1)(b) – that is, she is no longer not entitled to a parental leave. In turn, the end of the pregnancy leave will necessitate the commencement of the parental leave (assuming that the employee wishes to take parental leave) because s. 48(3) states that the parental leave of an employee who takes a pregnancy leave must commence when the pregnancy leave ends. It is Program policy that the pregnancy leave is not extended for 12 weeks after the date of the birth. This employee ends up with 19 weeks of pregnancy leave followed immediately by her parental leave. It is important to note that an extension of the pregnancy leave does not act to reduce an employee's entitlement to parental leave.

In the event the child in the example above had been still-born, s. 47(1)(b) would have applied to give the employee an additional 12 weeks of pregnancy leave after the delivery. In that case, she would have had a total of 31 weeks of pregnancy leave, although she would not get any parental leave.

Example 2

The employee delivered the baby on the due date, which happened to be 15 weeks after the pregnancy leave began, and the child died one week later (i.e., before the pregnancy leave ended). In this case, s. 47(1)(b) would apply. As an employee not entitled to take a parental leave, her pregnancy leave would end on the later of the date that is 17 weeks after the leave began or 12 weeks after the birth of the child. This employee would end up with 27 weeks of pregnancy leave (15 weeks before the birth plus 12 weeks after the birth), but again, would not be entitled to any parental leave.

Transition – s. 47(1.1)

47(1.1) Despite clause (1) (b), if an employee who is not entitled to parental leave began her pregnancy leave before January 1, 2018, her pregnancy leave ends on the day that is the later of,

(a) 17 weeks after the pregnancy leave began, and

(b) six weeks after the birth, still-birth or miscarriage.

The Fair Workplaces, better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2018, c 22 amended the ESA 2000 on January 1, 2018 and extended the entitlement in s. 47(1)(b)(ii) from six weeks after the birth, still-birth or miscarriage to 12 weeks after the birth, still-birth or miscarriage.

As such, if an employee commences a pregnancy leave on or after January 1, 2018 and is ultimately not entitled to a parental leave because of a still-birth, death of a child or miscarriage, she will be able to remain on pregnancy leave until the later of 17 weeks after the leave began or 12 weeks after the birth, still-birth or miscarriage.

For employees whose pregnancy leave commenced prior to January 1, 2018, the reference to 12 weeks in s. 47(1)(b)(ii) must be read as 6 weeks. In other words, if an employee who started her pregnancy leave before January 1, 2018 is not entitled to take a parental leave due to a still-birth, death of a child or miscarriage, she will be entitled to remain on pregnancy leave until the later of 17 weeks after the leave began or six weeks after the date of the birth, still-birth or miscarriage.

Ending Leave Early - s. 47(2)

47(2) An employee may end her leave earlier than the day set out in subsection (1) by giving her employer written notice at least four weeks before the day she wishes to end her leave.

If the employee intends to return to work either before the end of the 17 weeks set out in s. 47(1)(a), or the potentially longer period of leave as set out in s. 47(1)(b), the employee must give the employer notice in writing at least four weeks in advance of the date she plans on returning.

It should be noted that if the employee has chosen to shorten her pregnancy leave and return to work, she gives up the balance of pregnancy leave she would otherwise have had. Pregnancy leave (like parental leave) cannot be started and stopped and resumed at a later date. An employee has the right to take a pregnancy leave that is at least 17 weeks long, but she may also choose to take any shorter period, which will be considered to represent her full entitlement to the leave. In addition, unless the child is still in hospital on the day the leave ends, she will forfeit her right to parental leave because it must be commenced when the pregnancy leave ends; see ESA Part XIV, s. 48(3).

The employer has no right to require the employee to provide any documentation to prove that she is fit to return to work.

In contrast to the Program's position respecting the notice requirements to commence the leave, it is the Program's position that the employer can refuse to allow the employee to return to work at an earlier date than that provided for in ss. 47(1)(a) and (b) if the employee has not given the employer four weeks' notice in writing.

Changing End Date - s. 47(3)

47(3) An employee who has given notice under subsection (2) to end her pregnancy leave may end the leave,

(a) on an earlier day than was set out in the notice, if the employee gives the employer a new written notice at least four weeks before the earlier day; or

(b) on a later day than was set out in the notice, if the employee gives the employer a new written notice at least four weeks before the day indicated in the original notice.

Under s. 47(3), an employee who has given notice under s. 47(2) to end her leave early is entitled to change her mind and end the leave on an even earlier or later date. If she wishes to end the leave on an earlier date than that set out in her original notice, the employee must give her employer a new written notice at least four weeks before the earlier day on which she now proposes to end the leave.

If the employee wishes to end the leave on a later date than that specified in the original notice, she must give the employer a new written notice at least four weeks before the return date indicated in the original notice.

In contrast to the Program's position respecting the notice requirements to commence a leave, it is the Program's position that the employer can refuse to allow the employee to return to work at an earlier or later date than the date provided in her notice under s. 47(2) if the employee has not given the employer four weeks' notice in writing.

Employee Not Returning - s. 47(4)

47(4) An employee who takes pregnancy leave shall not terminate her employment before the leave expires or when it expires without giving the employer at least four weeks' written notice of the termination.

Section 47(4) provides that an employee who takes pregnancy leave shall not terminate her employment before the leave expires or when it expires, without giving the employer at least four weeks' written notice of the termination. This section should be read in conjunction with s. 47(5), which creates an exception for employees who are constructively dismissed - see the discussion of s. 47(5) below.

While an employer can file a complaint with the Program if the employee fails to give proper notice, there is no remedy available to it under the ESA 2000 that would allow it to recover any damages that arose from the failure to provide notice. In order to recover such damages, the employer would have to pursue a civil remedy. The employer cannot make a deduction from any outstanding wages due to the employee (for example, commissions that became due to the employee during the leave) in an attempt to recover the damages.

Exception - s. 47(5)

47(5) Subsection (4) does not apply if the employer constructively dismisses the employee.

Section 47(5) creates an exception to the requirement in s. 47(4) that an employee on a pregnancy leave provide four weeks' written notice of their intention to resign before or upon the expiry of the leave. The notice requirement will not apply in situations where the employer has constructively dismissed the employee. See ESA Part XV, s. 56(1) for a discussion of constructive dismissal. The same principles apply here.

ESA Part XIV Section 48 - Parental Leave

Parental Leave – s. 48(1)

48(1) An employee who has been employed by his or her employer for at least 13 weeks and who is the parent of a child is entitled to a leave of absence without pay following the birth of the child or the coming of the child into the employee's custody, care and control for the first time.

The entitlement to a parental leave arises following the birth of a child (as in the case of a birth mother, including a surrogate mother, or a birth father) or the coming of a child into the custody, care and control of an employee for the first time (generally all parents other than birth parents, including adoptive parents). Parental leave may not be commenced before the actual day of birth or the day that the child came into an employee's custody, care and control; in other words, not before the employee is a parent. See ESA Part XIV, s. 45 for a discussion of the definition of parent.

To be eligible for parental leave, the employee has to have been employed for at least 13 weeks prior to the commencement of the leave. Note that the reference date for parental leave eligibility is the date the leave is to begin, whereas the reference date for pregnancy leave eligibility is the due date. As with the pregnancy leave qualifying period, it is not necessary that the employee be actively working for all or any part of the 13 weeks prior to commencing the leave. For example, the employee could be off sick, on vacation or on lay-off during the qualifying period.

It should be noted that there is no requirement that the employee work 13 weeks after the child is born or comes into custody, care and control of the parent.

A birth father may want to start his parental leave on the actual date of birth. In that case, he should give his employer at least two weeks' notice before the expected date of birth, as required by s. 48(4). If the baby is born prior to that date, he can start his leave on the birth date, but he must then comply with the retroactive notice provisions set out in s. 48(6). If the baby has not yet been born by the due date, he must continue working until the actual birth date; he cannot begin parental leave prior to the birth of the child because he will not yet meet the eligibility criteria of being a parent. In this latter case, after the due date has passed, the employer will essentially be on day-to-day notice that the employee will go on leave, and will not really have received the required two weeks' notice. However, the employer would have known approximately when the employee would leave, and, as with pregnancy leave, an employee's failure to conform to the statutory requirement to provide notice of a leave will not disentitle them to the parental leave. See ESA Part XIV, s. 46(4).

An employee's entitlement to parental leave arises by virtue of being a new parent and having commenced their employment at least 13 weeks prior to taking the leave, and it is the Program's position that the failure to give notice does not negate or diminish that entitlement. The Program's policy is consistent with Re Scott and Roos Family Shoes (Brampton) Ltd. et al., 1985 CanLII 2124 (ON SC) in which the Ontario Divisional Court held that the written notice requirement in the former Employment Standards Act was a formality only.

An employee on lay-off may still be entitled to take a parental leave. Refer to the extensive discussion on how lay-off impacts on pregnancy leave in ESA Part XIV, s. 46(2). The same principles apply to parental leave.

When Leave May Begin – s. 48(2)

48(2) An employee may begin parental leave no later than 78 weeks after the day the child is born or comes into the employee's custody, care and control for the first time.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 amended s. 48(2) on December 3, 2017. The timeframe within which a parental leave may begin for an employee, other than a birth mother who has taken pregnancy leave, was extended from 52 to 78 weeks. See s. 48(2.1) below for more information on the application of this provision prior to December 3, 2017.

This section provides that an employee who is the parent of a child must commence parental leave within 78 weeks of either the date the child was born, or the date the child came into the parent's custody, care and control for the first time.

This section does not require the leave to be completed within the 78-week period. It requires the leave to be commenced within that period.

Other than the requirement to commence the leave within the 78-week period, the parent is not restricted in any other way with respect to the commencement of the leave. Whether the employee's partner or spouse takes a pregnancy or parental leave, or the fact that the employee's partner or spouse may be on either of those leaves will not affect the employee's right to commence a parental leave.

Note that s. 48(3) sets out special rules regarding commencement of parental leave for a birth mother who has taken pregnancy leave. A birth mother who has taken a pregnancy leave will not have the 78-week period as set out in s. 48(2) within which to commence the leave except in special circumstances. See the discussion in s. 48(3) below.

Birth Parents

A birth father, and a birth mother who does not take pregnancy leave, will normally be required to commence the leave within 78 weeks of the date the child is born because typically, the birth date is also the date the child first comes into the custody, care and control of the parents. In the case of a birth without significant complications, the fact that the mother and the baby remain in hospital for a few days does not mean that the hospital, rather than the parents, had custody, care and control of the child.

However, if the child has significant medical problems that necessitate a lengthy hospital stay following birth, the date that the child was actually released from hospital into their parents' care should be regarded as the date that the child came into their custody, care and control for the first time. With one exception, either or both parents could choose to commence the leave within 78 weeks of the date of the birth, or they could defer commencing the leave to some point within the 78-week period following the date the child was released from hospital.

The exception to this is that a birth mother who had taken pregnancy leave and who was still on that leave when the child was released from hospital would be required to commence her parental leave when the pregnancy leave ended. See the discussion in s. 48(3) below regarding commencement of parental leave for birth mothers who have taken pregnancy leave.

Parents other than Birth Parents

Parents other than birth parents must begin parental leave within 78 weeks of the date the child first comes into custody, care and control of the parent, after the employee becomes a parent.

Adoptive Parents

The definition of parent includes a person with whom a child is placed for adoption. It is Program Policy that "placed for adoption" means that adoption proceedings must have been commenced but do not necessarily have to have been completed.

Once the employee is an adoptive parent and therefore entitled to take a leave, the 78-week clock will run from the date the child first comes into the parent's custody, care and control i.e. the date the child was placed for adoption.

Parents other than Birth Parents or Adoptive Parents

Section 48(2) also applies to employees who become parents by virtue of entering into a relationship of some permanence with a person who is already a parent of a child, together with their intent to treat to treat that child as their own.

Once the employee is a parent, the 78-week clock will run from the date the child first comes into that parent's custody, care and control. See ESA Part XIV, s. 45 for a discussion.

Transition – s. 48(2.1)

48(2.1) Despite subsection (2), an employee may begin parental leave no later than 52 weeks after the day the child is born or comes into the employee's custody, care and control for the first time if that day was before the day subsection 23.2(2) of Schedule 1 to the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, came into force.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017 c 22 amended the ESA 2000 to extend the timeframe within which an employee may begin a parental leave to correspond with changes in the way employment insurance benefits could be taken.

Employees who did not take a pregnancy leave and whose child was born or came into their custody, care, or control on or after December 3, 2017, are required to begin their leave within 78 weeks of the date of birth or of the child coming into the employee's custody, care or control.

An employee who did not take pregnancy leave and whose child was born or came into their custody, care or control prior to December 3, 2017 is limited to the previous timeframe of 52 weeks for beginning the leave.

Restriction if Pregnancy Leave Taken – s. 48(3)

48(3) An employee who has taken pregnancy leave must begin her parental leave when her pregnancy leave ends unless the child has not yet come into her custody, care and control for the first time.

Section 48(3) applies only to a birth mother who has taken a pregnancy leave. It requires that she commence her parental leave immediately after the pregnancy leave ends except in special circumstances. As a consequence, she cannot return to work when the pregnancy leave ends and retain a right to parental leave under the ESA 2000.

It is important to note that under federal Employment Insurance legislation, a birth mother may be entitled to return to work for a while after her maternity benefits run out and before starting to receive her parental benefits. Many employees are under the misconception that the requirements for commencement of the leave itself are the same as those regarding entitlements to employment insurance benefits, or they may believe that the right to the employment insurance benefits is the same thing as the right to leave. It should be emphasized that an employee who wishes to avail herself of the right to leave and protect her rights to benefits during the leave and reinstatement afterward must (with one exception) commence the parental leave when the pregnancy leave ends. However, see Royce v Huan and Danczkay Properties Inc. (July 12, 1995), ESC 95-136 (Novick), a decision under the former Employment Standards Act in which the adjudicator found that although the employee returned to work at the employer's request for a couple of days after her pregnancy leave, she was not disentitled to parental leave. This aspect of the decision is contrary to Program policy.

The exception to this requirement occurs when the child has not come into the custody, care and control of the employee for the first time, by the time the employee has ended her pregnancy leave. In such cases, s. 48(2) will apply and the birth mother must commence the parental leave within 78 weeks of the date of the birth or the date the child first comes into her custody, care and control for the first time. For example, if the child was hospitalized from birth and was still in the hospital's care when her leave ended, the employee could return to work and delay the commencement of her parental leave until the child came home.

Note that the exception will not apply in situations where the child was released from hospital, then subsequently became ill and re-entered the hospital and was still there when the birth mother's pregnancy leave ended. In this situation, the employee would already have had the child in her custody, care and control for the first time prior to the date the pregnancy leave ended.

The application of s. 48(3) is limited to those situations where the birth mother has taken a pregnancy leave. A birth mother who did not take pregnancy leave (e.g., she was ineligible because she had not been hired at least 13 weeks before the expected date of birth, or she was eligible for pregnancy leave but simply chose not to take it) is governed by s. 48(2), and is allowed to commence the parental leave at any time within 78 weeks of the date of birth or date the child first came into her custody, care and control.

Notice – s. 48(4)

48(4) Subject to subsection (6), an employee wishing to take parental leave shall give the employer written notice at least two weeks before the day the leave is to begin.

An employee who wishes to take parental leave is required to give at least two weeks' notice in writing of their intention to take parental leave. For the employee who is on pregnancy leave, this means that she must notify her employer of her intention to take parental leave at least two weeks before the pregnancy leave ends, unless the child has not yet come into her custody, care and control for the first time and she is delaying the start of her parental leave. She cannot be forced to give notice of her intention to take parental leave at the same time she gives notice of her intention to take pregnancy leave.

The Program takes the position that the principle enunciated in the Re Scott and Roos Family Shoes (Brampton) Ltd. et al. decision in the pregnancy leave context applies equally to the parental leave context - see the discussion of this case in Part XIV, s. 46(4). In other words, failure to comply with the requirement to provide two weeks' written notice of a parental leave will not diminish the employee's right to the leave.

Notice to Change Date – s. 48(5)

48(5) An employee who has given notice to begin parental leave may begin the leave,

(a) on an earlier day than was set out in the notice, if the employee gives the employer a new written notice at least two weeks before that earlier day; or

(b) on a later day than was set out in the notice, if the employee gives the employer a new written notice at least two weeks before the day set out in the original notice.

Section 48(5) permits an employee who has given notice to begin parental leave to change the date upon which the leave begins if certain conditions are met. Where the employee wishes the leave to begin on an earlier date, s. 48(5)(a) requires a new written notice by the employee at least two weeks before the earlier date. Where the employee wishes the leave to begin on a later date, s. 48(5)(b) requires a new written notice at least two weeks before the date that was set out in the original notice.

An employee wishing to change the date the parental leave will start must, of course, still comply with the restrictions on the earliest and latest the leave can begin as set out in ss. 48(1), (2) and (3).

If Child Earlier than Expected – s. 48(6)

48(6) If an employee stops working because a child comes into the employee's custody, care and control for the first time earlier than expected,

(a) the employee's parental leave begins on the day he or she stops working; and

(b) the employee must give the employer written notice that he or she is taking parental leave within two weeks after stopping work.

This section provides an alternate notice requirement where an employee stops work before giving notice of an intention to take a parental leave, or before the parental leave was scheduled to begin, because the child came into the custody, care and control of the employee earlier than expected. In that case, the leave begins on the day the employee actually stops working, and the employee must provide written notice within two weeks after stopping work.

Note, however, that the Program takes the position that the principle enunciated in the Re Scott and Roos Family Shoes (Brampton) Ltd. et al. decision under the former Employment Standards Act, 2000 in the pregnancy leave context applies equally in the parental leave context. In other words, failure to comply with the requirement to provide written notice of the parental leave will not diminish the employee's right to the leave.

An example of where this provision will apply is where a birth father gave his employer two weeks' notice prior to the estimated date of birth, and the baby was born earlier than expected. The father can commence his leave as early as the birth date, and must comply with the retroactive notice provisions in s. 48(6)(b). Note, however, that this provision won't apply, for example, where the baby is born prematurely and then goes into neo-natal intensive care for weeks or months. In that case, the baby has not yet come into the custody, care and control of the parent.

ESA Part XIV Section 49 - End of Parental Leave

End of Parental Leave – s. 49(1)

49(1) An employee's parental leave ends 61 weeks after it began, if the employee also took pregnancy leave, and 63 weeks after it began, otherwise.

A parental leave will end 61 weeks after it began if the employee also took a pregnancy leave, or 63 weeks after it began if the employee did not take a pregnancy leave, unless the employee provides notice of an earlier return date pursuant to s. 49(2). In other words, the employer must assume that an employee who has taken a parental leave will be gone for the full 61 or 63 weeks unless the employee gives written notice to the contrary. There is no obligation for an employee to take the full amount of the leave. If, for example, an employee opts to receive federal Employment Insurance (“EI”) benefits at a higher rate over a 52 week period instead of a lower rate over an 18 month period, they may wish to take a leave that is shorter than the full entitlement. See remarks on changes to the federal EI program, below.

The length of parental leave was increased on December 3, 2017 in order to enable employees to take advantage of the extended period of time over which EI parental benefits may be taken. It is important to note, however, that there remain significant differences regarding entitlements between the Employment Standards Act, 2000 and the federal Employment Insurance Act, SC 1996, c 23. For example, parents can take some paid work with their employer without losing any EI parental benefits. They can also interrupt the period in which they receive EI benefits and return to work, then begin receiving benefits again at a later date.

However, the ESA 2000 does not contemplate "splitting" parental leave (or pregnancy leave). For example, an employee cannot take 10 weeks of parental leave under the ESA 2000, return to work for some period and then take the balance of 51 or 53 weeks of parental leave. Because the ESA 2000 does not contemplate stopping and restarting the leaves, an employee who returns to work early is considered to have ended their leave under the ESA 2000.

In this regard see a decision of the Ontario Grievance Settlement Board in Association of Management, Administrative and Professional Crown Employees of Ontario v Ontario (Management Board Secretariat), 2005 CanLII 55230 (ON GSB), in which the arbitrator concluded that the "legislature intended to provide employees with the opportunity to take one continuous parental leave of absence following a birth or adoption". In this regard, the arbitrator noted that there was no explicit language in the ESA 2000 to support a right to take the leave in instalments and furthermore, that it was clear that an effort had been made to balance the employee benefit (the leave entitlement) with an employer's interest in avoiding the disruption that could result if employees were permitted to split up parental leave. The arbitrator also rejected the union's argument that the ESA 2000's provisions should be interpreted in a manner consistent with the Employment Insurance Act on the basis that there is nothing the ESA 2000 to suggest that entitlement to a leave is dependent only upon an employee receiving EI benefits.

Note that Program policy is that employees will not be considered to have ended their ESA 2000 leave if they take work with an employer from whom they did not take the leave. For example, an employee may take a parental leave from their full-time job with employer A and work part-time with employer B during their leave without losing their entitlement to the ESA 2000 parental leave from their full-time job.

Once employees begin a parental leave, they have the right to take the full 61 or 63 weeks. For example, a birth father whose child dies five weeks into his parental leave has the right to take the remaining 58 weeks of leave if he wishes.

Transition – s. 49(1.1)

49(1.1) Despite subsection (1), if the child in respect of whom the employee takes parental leave was born or came into the employee's custody, care and control for the first time before the day section 23.3 of Schedule 1 of the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, came into force, the employee's parental leave ends,

(a) 35 weeks after it began, if the employee also took pregnancy leave, and

(b) 37 weeks after it began, otherwise.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 amended the ESA 2000 and extended the amount of parental leave available to employees on December 3, 2017 to correspond with changes in the way EI benefits could be taken. Previously, employees who had taken pregnancy leave were entitled to 35 weeks of parental leave, and employees who had not taken pregnancy leave were entitled to 37 weeks.

This section provides that if the child was born or first came into the employee's custody, care and control for the first time before December 3, 2017, the employee's parental leave ends 35 weeks after it began, if the employee took preganancy leave, or 37 weeks after it began otherwise. If the child was born or first came into the employee's custody, care and control on or after December 3, 2017, the employee is entitled to take the longer leave of up to 61 or 63 weeks.

Ending Leave Early – s. 49(2)

49(2) An employee may end his or her parental leave earlier than the day set out in subsection (1) by giving the employer written notice at least four weeks before the day he or she wishes to end the leave.

Section 49(2) provides that a parental leave may end earlier than 61 or 63 weeks after it began, as provided in s. 49(1), if the employee gives the employer at least four weeks' written notice before the earlier date.

Unlike the Program's position with respect to the notice requirements to commence the leave, it is the Program's position that the employer can refuse to allow the employee to return to work earlier than the 61 or 63 week mark if the employee has not given the employer four weeks' notice in writing.

Changing End Date – s. 49(3)

49(3) An employee who has given notice to end his or her parental leave may end the leave,

(a) on an earlier day then was set out in the notice, if the employee gives the employer a new written notice at least four weeks before the earlier day; or

(b) on a later day than was set out in the notice, if the employee gives the employer a new written notice at least four weeks before the day indicated in the original notice. An employee may have given notice under s. 49(2), or even this section, that they intended to end the parental leave on a date earlier than the maximum or on a different date than the date they set out in a previous notice. However, the employee may then change their mind, and wish to end the leave on a different date. The employee may change the date the leave will end to an earlier date so long as they give at least four weeks' written notice before the new earlier date or to a later date so long as they give at least four weeks' written notice before the original date.

In contrast to the Program's position with respect to the notice requirements to commence the leave, it is the Program's position that the employer can refuse to allow the employee to return to work at a different date than that indicated in their previous notice if the employee has not given the employer four weeks' notice in writing.

However, where an employee does not provide enough notice, an employer that does not accept the new return date must communicate its refusal at the time of the request or shortly thereafter. An employer cannot keep its objection to itself and then rely on the employee's failure to provide proper notice to defeat the employee's right to reinstatement. For example, an employee wants to change her return date to a date that is three weeks later than her original return date, but she gives only two weeks' written notice of this change. The employer does not provide the employee with approval, but neither does it communicate its objection to the employee. The employer cannot claim in these circumstances that the employee has lost her right to reinstatement because of her failure to comply with s. 49(3). In this regard, see Royce v Huan and Danczkay Properties Inc. (July 12, 1995), ESC 95-136 (Novick).

Employee Not Returning – s. 49(4)

49(4) An employee who takes parental leave shall not terminate his or her employment before the leave expires or when it expires without giving the employer at least four weeks' written notice of the termination.

Section 49(4) provides that an employee who takes parental leave shall not terminate their employment before the leave expires, or when it expires, without giving the employer at least four weeks' written notice of the termination. This section should be read in conjunction with s. 49(5), which creates an exception to the notice requirement for employees who are constructively dismissed - see the discussion of s. 49(5) below.

While an employer can file a complaint with the Program if the employee fails to give proper notice, there is no remedy available to it under the ESA 2000 that would allow it to recover any damages that arose from the failure to provide notice. In order to recover such damages, the employer would have to pursue a civil remedy. The employer cannot make a deduction from any outstanding wages due to the employee (for example, commissions that became due to the employee during the leave) in an attempt to recover the damages.

Exception – s. 49(5)

49(5) Subsection (4) does not apply if the employer constructively dismisses the employee.

Section 49(5) provides an exception to the requirement in s. 49(4) that an employee on parental leave provide four weeks' written notice of their intention to resign before or upon the expiry of the leave. The requirement does not apply where the employer has constructively dismissed the employee. See ESA Part XV, s. 56 for a discussion of constructive dismissal. The same principles apply here.

ESA Part XIV Section 49.1 – Family Medical Leave

Family Medical Leave – s. 49.1(1)

Qualified Health Practitioner

49.1(1) In this section,

"qualified health practitioner" means,

(a) a person who is qualified to practise as a physician under the laws of the jurisdiction in which care or treatment is provided to the individual described in subsection (3),

(b) a registered nurse who holds an extended certificate of registration under the Nursing Act, 1991 or an individual who has an equivalent qualification under the laws of the jurisdiction in which care or treatment is provided to the individual described in subsection (3), or

(c) in the prescribed circumstances, a member of a prescribed class of health practitioners.

This section contains definitions of two of the terms used in the family medical leave provisions.

"Qualified health practitioner" is referred to in s. 49.1(2). In order for an employee to be entitled to a family medical leave, a qualified health practitioner must issue a certificate stating that an individual has a serious medical condition with a significant risk of death occurring within a period of 26 weeks, and that individual must be a family member specified in s. 49.1(3).

Qualified health practitioner is defined for the purpose of the family medical leave provisions as:

- A person who is qualified to practise as a physician under the laws of the jurisdiction where the ill family member is being cared for or treated. In Ontario, doctors who are members of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario will meet the s. 49.1(1)(a) definition of qualified health practitioner.
- A registered nurse who holds an extended certificate of registration, or an equivalent qualification under the laws of the jurisdiction where the ill family member is being cared for or treated. In Ontario, this specifies a member of the College of Nurses of Ontario who is a registered nurse and holds an extended certificate of registration in accordance with O Reg 275/94 made under the Nursing Act, 1991, SO 1991, c 32. These individuals are generally known as nurse practitioners.
- In the prescribed circumstances, a member of a prescribed class of health practitioners. At the time of writing, there are no prescribed circumstances or prescribed classes of health practitioners.

Week

49.1(1) In this section,

"week" means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

“Week” means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday. For the purposes of family medical leave, week will always be Sunday to Saturday, even if the employer's work week is different. A Sunday to Saturday week was chosen in order to mirror the Compassionate Care Benefits Program in the Employment Insurance Act, SC 1996, c 23 which uses a Sunday to Saturday week for purposes of determining entitlement to, and the paying of, employment insurance benefits.

Entitlement to Leave – s. 49.1(2)

49.1(2) An employee is entitled to a leave of absence without pay of up to 28 weeks to provide care or support to an individual described in subsection (3) if a qualified health practitioner issues a certificate stating that the individual has a serious medical condition with a significant risk of death occurring within a period of 26 weeks or such shorter period as may be prescribed.

Subsection 49.1(2) provides for an entitlement to family medical leave if the eligibility requirements set out in the subsection are met.

Please note that the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 made amendments to s. 49.1(2) of the Employment Standards Act, 2000 on January 1, 2018. These changes, among other things, affected the length of leave and the leave period. See s. 49.1(13) below for more information on how this provision applies to leaves taken with respect to certificates issued prior to January 1, 2018.

The Entitlement

Of Up to 28 Weeks

Employees are entitled to take up to 28 weeks of unpaid family medical leave with respect to a particular individual. Week is defined in s. 49.1(1) as being a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

Must the weeks of family medical leave be consecutive?

Nothing in the ESA 2000 requires that the weeks of family medical leave be taken consecutively. An employee could, for example, take four weeks of leave, return to work for a while, and then take a further six weeks of leave.

Where an employee provides care or support for only part of a week

Subsection 49.1(7) states that family medical leave must be taken in periods of entire weeks. However, the subsection must be read in conjunction with ESA Part XIV, s. 52.1, which applies to any Part XIV leave that must be taken in periods of entire weeks and which addresses the situation where an employee stops providing care or support part-way through a week. Further, the Program has a policy that addresses the situation where an employee only begins providing care or support part-way through a week. Subsection 49.1(7) below contains a detailed discussion of how s. 49.1(7), s. 52.1 and the Program policy apply where an employee who takes family medical leave provides care or support for only part of a week. Briefly, the combined effect of the two statutory provisions and the Program policy is as follows:

- The first day of any particular week, which is defined to be Sunday to Saturday, that an employee is entitled to start a family medical leave is the first day of that week that they are providing care or support;
- The employer cannot require the employee to take leave on days of the week prior to the day the employee first started providing care or support;
- The employee is considered to have used up a week of their 28-week entitlement even if they are not on leave for the entire week.

Sharing the leave

Section 49.1(6) provides that where more than one employee takes a leave under s. 49.1 in respect of the same family member, the maximum 28 weeks' leave has to be shared by the employees.

Further leaves

Section 49.1(11) provides that employees may take multiple family medical leaves with respect to the same family member if the eligibility criteria are met. However, only one leave of up to 28 weeks may be taken in each 52-week period with respect to the same family member.

An employee is entitled to up to 28 weeks (or more, if the further leave provision of s. 49.1(11) applies) of family medical leave with respect to each individual listed in s. 49.1(3). There is no limit on the number of specified family members for whom an employee may take family medical leave. If, for example, an employee has two specified family members who have a serious medical condition and significant risk of death within a 26-week period, the employee will be entitled to two separate family medical leaves. The timing and duration of each leave, the notice requirements, and the rules regarding eligibility for further leaves with respect to each leave, etc., are governed by s. 49.1 independently of one other.

To Provide Care or Support

The family medical leave entitlement is for providing care or support to the ill family member. This will include, for example, providing psychological or emotional support to the family member, assisting the family member to get their affairs in order, assisting the family member with regular household chores

(e.g., housekeeping, laundry, shopping) as well as arranging for care by a third party provider, and directly providing or participating in the personal care of the family member.

To an Individual Described in Subsection (3)

Employees are entitled to family medical leave with respect to the family members listed in s. 49.1(3).

Eligibility Criteria

Qualified Health Practitioner Issues a Certificate

An employee is eligible for family medical leave if a qualified health practitioner issues a certificate stating that the individual has a serious medical condition with a significant risk of death occurring within a period of 26 weeks or such shorter period as may be prescribed.

Qualified Health Practitioner

See the discussion of the meaning of this term in the family medical leave context in s. 49.1(1) above.

Issues a Certificate

Because s. 49.1(2) uses the present tense - "issues" as opposed to "has issued" - an employee may begin a family medical leave before a certificate is issued.

For example, an employee might obtain the certificate soon after beginning the leave, or after the leave is over, or - if the employer engages in a reprisal against the employee - soon after the reprisal or when asked to by an employment standards officer during the course of a reprisal investigation. Or, an employee may have had a certificate completed by someone who fits within the definition of a qualified health practitioner for family caregiver leave purposes (but not within the narrower definition of that term that applies for family medical leave purposes) and having recognized their mistake during the officer's investigation, subsequently obtained a certificate from the appropriate individual. In all of these cases, because a certificate was ultimately issued - by someone who is eligible to issue it - the employee will be considered to have fulfilled this eligibility criterion. However, if the employee never does obtain a certificate, they will obviously not have an entitlement to family medical leave.

The employee may wish to use the Ministry's "Medical Certificate to Support Entitlement to Family Caregiver Leave, Family Medical Leave, and/or Critical Illness Leave" form when obtaining the medical certificate. It is available on the Ministry of Labour's website.

If an employee is applying for Employment Insurance (“EI”) compassionate care benefits, a copy of the medical certificate submitted to Employment and Social Development Canada may also be used for the purposes of family medical leave.

26 weeks or such shorter period as may be prescribed

Pursuant to the definition of week in s. 49.1(1), the 26-week period relating to the significant risk of death will always begin on a Sunday.

If the certificate states that the significant risk of death began on a day other than a Sunday, the 26-week period will begin on the previous Sunday.

For example, if a doctor issues a certificate on Wednesday, June 30, stating that the employee's mother has a serious medical condition and is at significant risk of death within 26 weeks from that date, the 26 week period actually begins on Sunday, June 27, and ends 26 weeks later. The definition of week has implications for when the leave can begin, and the latest date the employee can remain on leave. See ss. 49.1(4) and (5), discussed below.

Note in particular that because the 26-week period begins on the previous Sunday when a certificate states the significant risk of death began on a day other than a Sunday, an employee is eligible for family medical leave immediately upon the significant risk of death arising; they do not have to wait until the next Sunday before beginning family medical leave.

Another example is where the doctor issues the certificate on Saturday, July 10, indicating the employee's father has a serious medical condition and was at significant risk of death from Wednesday, June 30. In this case, the 26-week period begins on Sunday, June 27.

There may be cases in which the certificate indicates that the individual has a serious medical condition with a significant risk of death occurring within a period that is less than 26 weeks. For example, a doctor issues a certificate on Sunday, June 27 stating that the employee's spouse has a serious medical condition and is at significant risk of death within six weeks of that date. It is Program policy to apply the certificate as if it said that the spouse was at significant risk of death within 26 weeks. The employee will not be required to obtain a second certificate if the six week period elapses and the spouse is still alive.

This is because the Program takes the view that the reference to 26 weeks in s. 49.1(2) is intended simply to provide a maximum period in which a risk of death will entitle an employee to family medical leave and not to limit the period in which leave can be taken where the health practitioner anticipates that the individual will die sooner than 26 weeks from the date of the diagnosis/prognosis. The point, in other words, is that the entitlement to family medical leave is based on a reasonably imminent risk of death and not on any particular date specified by the practitioner, so long as the date is within 26 weeks.

Also note the effect of s. 49.1(5) which sets out the latest day an employee can remain on leave. This is either the last day of the week in which the employee’s family member dies, or the last day of a 52 week period starting on the first day of the week in which the 26-week period referred to in s. 49.1(2) begins. Continuing with the example from above, assume that the spouse did not die within six weeks of the date indicated on the certificate; he died 40 weeks after the date indicated on the certificate. The latest date the employee can remain on leave (assuming the employee has not yet used up the full 28 week entitlement), is, pursuant to s. 49.1(5), the last day of the 40th week in the 52-week period, which, in this example, began on Sunday, June 27. If the spouse did not die, the latest date the employee could be on leave pursuant to the same certificate would be Saturday, June 25 of the following year. Note that in both cases, the employee would not be required to get a new certificate within the 52-week period running from the first day of the week in which the original certificate was issued, even if the spouse lived past the original period of 26 weeks established by the certificate - see s. 49.1(5.1).

This policy also has implications for determining when the further leave provision of s. 49.1(11) can be engaged. Assume, in this same example, that the spouse did not die within six weeks of the date indicated on the certificate, and was still alive after 52 weeks. The employee would be required to wait until the end of that first 52-week period before a second certificate could be issued that would make the employee eligible for a second 28 weeks of leave. See s. 49.1(11) below.

At the time of writing, no shorter period than 26 weeks has been prescribed.

Application of Subsection (2) – s. 49.1(3)

49.1(3) Subsection (2) applies in respect of the following individuals:

1. The employee's spouse.

2. A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee's spouse.

3. A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.

4. A child who is under legal guardianship of the employee or the employee's spouse.

5. A brother, step-brother, sister or step-sister of the employee.

6. A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or the employee's spouse.

7. A brother-in-law, step-brother-in-law, sister-in-law or step-sister-in-law of the employee.

8. A son-in-law or daughter-in-law of the employee or the employee's spouse.

9. An uncle or aunt of the employee or the employee's spouse.

10. A nephew or niece of the employee or the employee's spouse.

11. The spouse of the employee's grandchild, uncle, aunt, nephew or niece.

12. A person who considers the employee to be like a family member, provided the prescribed conditions, if any, are met.

13. Any individual prescribed as a family member for the purpose of this section.

This section lists the individuals, referred to in s. 49.1(2), for whom an employee is entitled to take a family medical leave.

The list is exhaustive. If the person is not listed in s. 49.1(3), the employee has no entitlement to family medical leave.

At the time of writing, no additional family members have been prescribed.

Note O Reg 535/17, s. 1, which states:

1. For the purposes of paragraph 12 of subsection 49.1 (3) of the ESA 2000 and paragraph 12 of the definition of "family member" in subsection 49.4 (1) of the ESA 2000, the prescribed condition is that the employee must, on the employer's request, provide the employer with a copy of the document provided to an agency or department of the Government of Canada for the purpose of claiming benefits under the Employment Insurance Act (Canada) in which it is stated that the employee is considered to be like a family member.

Employees who wish to access family medical leave employment insurance benefits for a person that is "like a family member" may be required to submit a document to the federal government from the ill individual attesting that the person consider the employee to be like a family member. Pursuant to O Reg 535/17, s. 1, employees wishing to take family medical leave for a person who considers the employee to be like a family member must provide their employer at the employer's request with a copy of this document. At the time of writing, the document required by the federal government was the Compassionate Care Benefits Attestation form, which is available from Employment and Social Development Canada (“ESDC”). However, whether or not the employee is applying for EI benefits or required to submit the form for EI purposes does not affect the requirement to provide it for family medical leave purposes under the ESA 2000.

Employees wishing to take a family medical leave to provide care or support to any other family member specified in s. 49.1(3) are not required to provide their employer with a completed attestation form.

Note that spouse includes married same-sex couples, married opposite-sex couples, and couples of the same or opposite sex who live together in a conjugal relationship outside marriage - see the definition of spouse and the discussion at ESA Part XIV, s. 45.

Also note that the family members specified for the purposes of s. 49.1(2) in s. 49.1(3) do not have to live in Ontario in order for the employee to be eligible for family medical leave.

Earliest Date Leave Can Begin – s. 49.1(4)

49.1(4) The employee may begin a leave under this section no earlier than the first day of the week in which the period referred to in subsection (2) begins.

This provision establishes the earliest date a family medical leave can begin.

The earliest date family medical leave can begin is the first day of the week in which the 26-week period referred to in s. 49.1(2) begins; that is, the first day of the 26-week period within which the family member has a significant risk of dying. Pursuant to the definition of week in s. 49.1(1), the first day of the 26-week period referred to in s. 49.1(2) will always be Sunday.

For example, a doctor issues a certificate on Wednesday, June 30, stating that an individual (who is the employee's mother) has a serious medical condition and is at significant risk of death within 26 weeks from that date. The 26-week period referred to in s. 49.1(2) actually begins on Sunday, June 27, and ends 26 weeks later. Accordingly, the earliest date the employee's leave can begin is Sunday, June 27.

Another example is where the doctor issues the certificate on Saturday, July 10, indicating that an individual (who is the employee's father) has a serious medical condition and was at significant risk of death from Wednesday, June 30. In this case, the 26-week period referred to in s. 49.1(2) also begins on Sunday, June 27. Accordingly, the earliest date the employee's leave can begin is also Sunday, June 27.

Latest Date Employee Can Remain on Leave – s. 49.1(5)

49.1(5) The employee may not remain on a leave under this section after the earlier of the following dates:

1. The last day of the week in which the individual described in subsection (3) dies.

2. The last day of the 52-week period starting on the first day of the week in which the period referred to in subsection (2) begins.

This provision establishes the latest date an employee can remain on family medical leave. It must be read in conjunction with s. 49.1(2) and (6), which determine the maximum length of the leave. It may also be read in conjunction with s. 49.1(5.1) which provides clarifying information about the certificate requirement.

The latest date an employee can remain on family medical leave is the earlier of:

- The last day of the week in which the family member dies; and
- The last day of the 52-week period that starts on the first day of the week in which the 26-week period specified by s. 49.1(2) begins.

The last day in either case will always be a Saturday, pursuant to the definition of week in s. 49.1(1).

The following examples illustrate the application of s. 49.1(5).

Example 1

A doctor issues a certificate on Wednesday, June 23, stating that the employee's mother has a serious medical condition and is at significant risk of death within 26 weeks from that date.

The 52-week period begins on Sunday, June 20, and ends 52 weeks later, which is Saturday, June 18.

The mother dies on Tuesday, November 16.

The latest date the employee can remain on leave is Saturday, November 20. Further, pursuant to s. 52.1, if the employee was on leave during the week that started Sunday, November 14, the employee is allowed to return to work before Saturday, November 20 only if the employer agrees (whether or not in writing). See ESA Part XIV, s. 52.1 for a discussion.

Example 2

A doctor issues a certificate on Wednesday, June 23, stating that the employee's mother has a serious medical condition and is at significant risk of death within 26 weeks from that date.

The 52-week period begins on Sunday, June 20 and ends 52 weeks later, on Saturday June 18.

The mother is still alive on January 1 (28 weeks after the issuance of the first certificate).

The latest date the employee can remain on leave is Saturday, June 18. The employee does not need to arrange for a new certificate to be issued at the end of the original 26-week period specified in the certificate and remains eligible to be on leave for the duration of the 52-week period, until such point as the entire 28 week entitlement of leave is used – see s. 49.1(5.1)

Example 3

A doctor issues a certificate on Saturday, July 10, indicating that the employee's father has a serious medical condition and was at significant risk of death from Wednesday, June 23

The 52-week period begins on Sunday, June 20, and ends 52 weeks later, on Saturday, June 18.

The father is still alive on Saturday, June 18.

The latest date the employee can remain on leave is Saturday, June 18.

Note, however, that after June 18, the employee may be entitled to a further leave - see s. 49.1(11), discussed below.

Same – s. 49.1(5.1)

49.1(5.1) For greater certainty, but subject to subsection (5), if the amount of leave that has been taken is less than 28 weeks, it is not necessary for a qualified health practitioner to issue an additional certificate under subsection (2) in order for leave to be taken under this section after the end of the period referred to in subsection (2).

This subsection clarifies that it is not necessary for an employee to arrange for a qualified health practitioner to issue a second certificate within the same 52-week period running from the issuance of the first certificate, if all the requirements for the leave continue to be met, e.g., the ill family member is still alive, still has a serious medical condition and a significant risk of death, and the employee has not yet used the maximum entitlement of 28 weeks of leave.

Two or More Employees – s. 49.1(6)

49.1(6) If two or more employees take leaves under this section in respect of a particular individual, the total of the leaves taken by all the employees shall not exceed 28 weeks during the 52-week period referred to in paragraph 2 of subsection (5) that applies to the first certificate issued for the purpose of this section.

This section provides that where more than one employee takes family medical leave under s. 49.1 with respect to the same family member, the 28 week leave entitlement must be shared by the employees.

There is no requirement that the employees who are sharing the leave entitlement be on leave at the same time, or at different times; the ESA 2000 does not impose any restrictions in this regard.

Note that the entire weeks provisions of s. 49.1(7) and s. 52.1(2) also apply in the context of s. 49.1(6). If one of the employees sharing the leave entitlement takes only three days off in one week, that employee is deemed to have taken an entire week of leave, thereby reducing the total number of weeks of leave remaining for all employees who are taking leave for the same family member by one week.

Note also that the sharing requirement applies only where two or more employees take leave under this section, i.e., s. 49.1. An employee who takes a leave similar to family medical leave pursuant to a contractual provision that provides a greater right than s. 49.1, and which thus prevails over s. 49.1 under ESA Part III, s. 5(2), is not taking leave under this section; therefore the amount of leave that that employee takes does not reduce the amount of leave that other employees can take in respect of the same family member under s. 49.1. Likewise, an employee who takes a leave similar to ESA 2000 family medical leave pursuant to the employment standards legislation of another jurisdiction is not taking leave under this section. Thus, if a father facing a significant risk of death within 26 weeks has one child in Ontario and another child in Manitoba, any leave taken by the latter under Manitoba's legislation to provide care or support to the father would not affect the amount of leave available to the child in Ontario.

Subsection 49.1(6) also provides that where more than one certificate is issued by a qualified health practitioner(s) with respect to the same individual and the certificates set out different 26-week periods, the 26-week that defines the start of the 52-week period within which leave may be taken will be the one specified in the first certificate that was issued.

Full-week Periods – s. 49.1(7)

49.1(7) An employee may take a leave under this section only in periods of entire weeks.

This provision must be read in conjunction with s. 49.1(1), which defines week as seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday, and with s. 52.1, which was introduced into the ESA 2000 effective October 29, 2014 and which states:

(1) If a provision in this Part requires that an employee who takes a leave to provide care or support to a person take the leave in periods of entire weeks and, during a week of leave, an employee ceases to provide care or support,

a. the employee's entitlement to leave continues until the end of the week; and

b. the employee may return to work during the week only if the employer agrees, whether in writing or not.

(2) If an employee returns to work under clause (1)(b), the week counts as an entire week for the purposes of any provision in this Part that limits the employee's entitlement to leave to a certain number of weeks.

While there is no requirement that the 28 weeks of family medical leave that an employee is entitled to be taken consecutively, s. 49.1(7) does specify that the leave must be taken in periods of entire weeks.

Despite this entire weeks requirement, the Program's view prior to the coming-into-force of ESA Part XIV, s. 52.1 on October 29, 2014 was that the right to be on leave was contingent on the employee actually providing care or support to the ill family member; this meant that if an employee was not providing care or support for some part of a week, the employee had no right to be on leave during that part and they were both required to be and entitled to be at work during that part. Thus, if an employee was only going to begin providing care or support on, say, a Wednesday, they had no right to begin their leave before Wednesday and the employer could not require them to start the leave before that day. Likewise, if an employee who was on leave stopped providing care or support after, say, Tuesday, they had no right to stay on leave after Tuesday; they had no right to continue on leave after that day and the employer could insist that they return to work for the rest of the week. Notwithstanding this, the Program took the position that because of the s. 49.1(7) entire weeks requirement, the employee in these situations would be deemed to have used up one full week of their total family medical leave entitlement. However, with the coming-into-force of ESA Part XIV, s. 52.1, the Program has had to modify its position insofar as the situation where the employee who is on leave stops providing care or support part-way through a week is concerned.

Section 52.1(1) deals only with the situation where an employee who is on leave stops providing care or support at some point during a week. It does not address the situation in which an employee only begins providing care or support part-way through a week. With respect to the question as to how the s. 49.1(7) requirement that the leave be taken in periods of entire weeks applies in those circumstances, the Program's view is that subject to s. 52.1, the right to be on leave is dependent on the employee actually providing care or support, and since s. 52.1 does not deal with the situation in which the employee only starts providing care or support part-way through the week, the employee is not entitled and cannot be required to take the leave from the start of the week. It should be noted, however, that in this situation the employee will be considered to have used up one week of their 28-week family medical leave entitlement. This is not because s. 52.1(2) applies—it does not—but because of the entire weeks requirement in s. 49.1(7).

Accordingly it is now Program policy that:

- The first day of any particular week (which is defined to be Sunday to Saturday) that an employee is entitled to start a family medical leave is the first day of that week that they are providing care or support. Further, the employer cannot require the employee to take leave on days of the week prior to the day the employee first started providing care or support. There is no change from previous policy.
- If the employee stops providing care or support before the end of a week in which they took a family medical leave, the employee is - pursuant to s. 52.1(1) - entitled to be on leave until the end of the week. Furthermore, they can return to work before the end of the week only if the employer agrees. The agreement does not have to be in writing.

The employee is considered to have used up a week of their 28-week entitlement even if they are not on leave for the entire week. Note that there is no change from previous policy, based on ss. 49.1(7).

Although an employee is considered to have used up a week of their 28-week entitlement even if not actually off work for the entire week, they are entitled to be paid for the time that was actually worked, and the hours that were worked will be counted for the purposes of, among other things, determining whether or not the relevant overtime threshold has been reached or limits on hours of work per week have been exceeded.

Where an employee takes more than one single day of leave during the same week as defined in s. 49.1(1), only one week of leave will be deemed to have been used up. For example, if an employee takes a single day of leave on Tuesday, May 29, wants to and is permitted by the employer to return to work on May 30 and 31, and takes another single day of leave on Friday, June 1, only one week will be deemed to have been used up, because those two days fell within the same week.

Greater Right or Benefit

An issue arises as to whether an employer has the option of not deeming an entire week of leave to be used up when an employee is away from work for only part of a week. The employment standard provides that a full week of leave will be charged against the employee's 28-week entitlement. However, pursuant to the greater right or benefit provision of ESA Part III, s. 5(2), if what the employer provides amounts to a greater right or benefit than the employment standard, then what the employer provides will supplant the employment standard and will apply instead of the employment standard. Accordingly, the employer is not prevented from charging only part weeks' leave against the employee's 28-week entitlement if the entire family medical leave package provided by the employer amounts to a better deal for the employee than s. 49.1.

Advising Employer – ss. 49.1(8), (9)

49.1(8) An employee who wishes to take leave under this section shall advise their employer in writing that he or she will be doing so.

(9) If the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it.

Subsection 49.1(8) requires employees to tell their employers ahead of time that they will be taking family medical leave. In circumstances where that cannot be done, s. 49.1(9) requires the employee to tell the employer as soon as possible after beginning the leave. In either case, this must be done in writing. Note that the ESA 2000 does not require the employee to specify a return date.

The requirement to advise the employer in writing applies with respect to each part of their 28-week leave.

Example 1

An employee takes the available 28-week leave in four separate blocks: six weeks, ten weeks, and two further blocks of six weeks each. The employee is required to advise the employer in writing that they will be taking leave before (or as soon as possible after, if the notice cannot be given before the leave begins) each individual block of leave begins. The notice can be given at four separate times - once before each individual block (or, if notice cannot be given ahead of time, as soon as possible after the beginning of each block). Or, if the employee knows the start dates of all of the individual blocks of leave ahead of time, a single written notice setting out the dates would meet this requirement.

Example 2

An employee takes eight one-day leaves. The employee must advise the employer in writing before (or as soon as possible after) each single day of leave is taken. This is so even if some of the single days are taken in the same we. The notice can be given at separate times, or, if the employee knows the start dates of more than one single day of leave ahead of time, a single notice setting out the multiple dates is sufficient notice for each of those dates.

Failure to Advise Employer

An employee does not lose their right to family medical leave if they fail to comply with ss. 49.1(8) or (9). An employee's entitlement to family medical leave arises by virtue of meeting the eligibility criteria in s. 49.1(2), and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins does not negate that entitlement. This approach is consistent with the Program's long-standing policy for all leaves contained in Part XIV where the structure of the entitlement and notice provisions are similar to these. See for example ESA Part XIV, ss. 46(4), 48(4) and 50(3) and (4).

The question may arise as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy), where the time off is a family medical leave under the ESA 2000. Section 49.1(9) provides that if the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it. It is thus clear that the ESA 2000 contemplates that circumstances may arise where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of starting family medical leave and that the employee nevertheless has the right to take the leave in such circumstances (although the employee does have an obligation to advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after starting it). On the other hand, the failure to give notice in advance of taking leave when the employee could have done so can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating s. 74. However the following points should be borne in mind:

- The employee's failure to give advance notice does not nullify the right to take the family medical leave if the qualifying conditions in s. 49.1(2) have been met. In other words, the failure to give advance notice does not have the result that the time taken off by the employee is not family medical leave.

- An employer may impose discipline where the employee failed to provide advance notice even though the employee could have done so; however, the reason for the discipline must be because of the failure to give advance notice and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.
- Likewise, an employer may impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the leave (before or after the start of the leave); however, the reason for the discipline would have to be because of the failure to provide notice and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.

Copy of Certificate – s. 49.1(10)

49.1(10) If requested by the employer, the employee shall provide the employer with a copy of the certificate referred to in subsection (2) as soon as possible.

This section provides that if the employer asks the employee for a copy of the certificate referred to in s. 49.1(2), the employee is required to provide it to the employer as soon as possible.

The certificate referred to in s. 49.1(2) is the certificate issued by a qualified health practitioner that states that an individual has a serious medical condition with a significant risk of death occurring within a period of 26 weeks – see s. 49.1(2) above.

An employee's failure to conform to the statutory requirement to provide a copy of the certificate does not disentitle them to the family medical leave. It is the Program's view that the requirement to provide a copy of the certificate is not a condition precedent to the entitlement to family medical leave; the conditions for entitlement are set out in s. 49.1(2). However, as provided in s. 49.1(2), in order to be entitled to the leave, the employee must obtain a certificate. The leave may begin before the certificate is obtained, but the employee must eventually obtain a certificate in order to be entitled to the leave. If they do not eventually obtain a certificate, they are not entitled to the leave.

Further Leave – s. 49.1(11)

49.1(11) If an employee takes a leave under this section and the individual referred to in subsection (3) does not die within the 52-week period referred to in paragraph 2 of subsection (5) the employee may, in accordance with this section, take another leave and, for that purpose, the reference in subsection (6) to "the first certificate" shall be deemed to be a reference to the first certificate issued after the end of that period.

This section provides for the right of an employee to take a further family medical leave of up to 28 weeks if the family member does not die within the 52-week period referred to in s. 49.1(2).

For example, a doctor issues a certificate on Wednesday, June 30, stating that an individual (who is the employee's mother) has a serious medical condition and is at significant risk of death within 26 weeks from that date. Pursuant to s. 49.1(2), the 52-week period begins on Sunday, June 27, and ends 52 weeks later, which is Saturday, June 25. The employee takes a 28-week family medical leave from July to February. The mother is still alive on Sunday, June 26. As of June 26, the employee may be entitled to take a second family medical leave of up to 28 weeks, if the eligibility criteria of s. 49.1(2) are again satisfied by the employee. In particular, the employee will again be required to obtain a certificate from a qualified health practitioner stating that the mother has a serious medical condition with a significant risk of death occurring within a period of 26 weeks.

An employee could be entitled to a third, fourth, etc. family medical leave of up to 28 weeks after the expiry of each 52-week period, so long as the employee satisfies the eligibility criteria of s. 49.1(2) a third, fourth, etc. time.

This section also stipulates what happens where there is a further leave where:

- The 28 weeks of family medical leave are shared between more than one employee pursuant to s. 49.1(6);
- There is more than one certificate issued with respect to the further 52-week period; and
- The certificates contain different dates respecting the 26-week period in which the family member has a significant risk of dying.

In this case, the 52-week period (which establishes the period during which the leave may be taken) for the purposes of the further leave will be determined using the first certificate that was issued after the end of the first 52-week period.

s. 49.1(12) – REPEALED

Transition – s. 49.1(13)

49(13) If a certificate described in subsection (2) was issued before January 1, 2018, then this section, as it read immediately before January 1, 2018, applies.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 amended s. 49.1 on January 1, 2018. Among other changes, the amendments extended the maximum period of family medical leave from eight weeks to 28 weeks. The timeframe within which the weeks of leave may be taken was also extended from 26 to 52 weeks.

Subsection 49.1(13) sets out transitional rules that apply with respect to the January 1, 2018 amendments. If an employee is relying on a certificate issued prior to January 1, 2018 to support their entitlement to a leave, then s. 49.1 as it read on December 31, 2017 will apply to that employee. If an employee is relying on a certificate issued on or after January 1, 2018, the current provisions apply.

ESA Part XIV Section 49.2 – Organ Donor Leave

Definitions – s. 49.2(1)

49.2(1) In this section,

"legally qualified medical practitioner" means,

(a) in the case of surgery for the purpose of organ donation that takes place in Ontario, a member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, and

(b) in the case of surgery for the purpose of organ donation that takes place outside Ontario, a person who is qualified to practise medicine under the laws of that jurisdiction;

"organ" means kidney, liver, lung, pancreas, small bowel or any other organ that is prescribed for the purpose of this section;

"organ donation" means the donation of all or part of an organ to a person;

"prescribed" means prescribed by a regulation made under this section.

This section contains definitions of four terms that are used in the organ donor leave provisions.

"Legally qualified medical practitioner" is referred to in ss. 49.2(4), 49.2(6) and 49.2(8). Where the surgery for the purpose of organ donation is taking place in Ontario, doctors who are members of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario are the only individuals who fall within the definition of legally qualified medical practitioner. Where the surgery takes place outside of Ontario, persons who are qualified to practise medicine under the laws of that jurisdiction are the only individuals who fall within the definition of legally qualified medical practitioner.

"Organ" for the purposes of organ donor leave is defined as the kidney, liver, lung, pancreas, small bowel or any other organ that is prescribed for the purpose of this section. At the time of writing, there are no other organs prescribed.

"Organ donation" for the purposes of organ donor leave includes the donation of all or part of an organ to a person.

"Prescribed" means prescribed by a regulation made under s. 49.2 regarding organ donor leave.

Application to Prescribed Tissue – s. 49.2(2)

49.2(2) References to organs in this section also apply to tissue that is prescribed for the purpose of this section.

This section provides that references to "organ" in the organ donor leave provisions would also apply to tissue that is prescribed by regulation for the purposes of these provisions. At the time of writing, there are no prescribed tissues.

Entitlement to Leave – s. 49.2(3)

49.2(3) An employee who has been employed by his or her employer for at least 13 weeks and undergoes surgery for the purpose of organ donation is entitled to a leave of absence without pay.

To be eligible for organ donor leave, the employee has to have been employed for at least 13 weeks prior to the commencement of the leave and undergo surgery for the purpose of organ donation. It is not necessary that the employee be actively working for all or any part of the 13 weeks prior to commencing the leave. For example, the employee could be off receiving short-term disability benefits, on a Part XIV leave, on vacation or on lay-off during the qualifying period.

In addition, to be eligible for the leave, the employee must be undergoing surgery for the purpose of organ donation which includes the donation of all or part of an organ to a person. For the purposes of organ donor leave, "organ" has been defined as the kidney, liver, lung, pancreas, small bowel or any other organ that is prescribed for the purpose of this section. As of the time of writing, no other organs have been prescribed.

Certificate – s. 49.2(4)

49.2(4) The employer may require an employee who takes leave under this section to provide a certificate issued by a legally qualified medical practitioner confirming that the employee has undergone or will undergo surgery for the purpose of organ donation.

If requested by the employer, an employee who takes an organ donor leave would have to provide a certificate issued by a legally qualified medical practitioner confirming that the employee will be undergoing or has undergone surgery for the purpose of organ donation.

See discussion of the term "legally qualified medical practitioner" in subsection (1) above.

Length of Leave – s. 49.2(5)

49.2(5) The employee is entitled to take leave for the prescribed period or, if no period is prescribed, for up to 13 weeks.

Eligible employees are entitled to take a period of up to 13 weeks of unpaid organ donor leave. As with parental leave, Program policy is that employees must take organ donor leave in one continuous period. There is a regulation making authority to vary the maximum leave period and to prescribe different leave periods with respect to the donation of different organs and prescribed tissue. At the time of writing, there are no other leave periods prescribed.

Extended Leave – s. 49.2(6)

49.2(6) When the leave described in subsection (5) ends, if a legally qualified medical practitioner issues a certificate stating that the employee is not yet able to perform the duties of his or her position because of the organ donation and will not be able to do so for a specified time, the employee is entitled to extend the leave for the specified time, subject to subsection (7).

This subsection provides for the right of an employee to extend the organ donor leave, subject to s. 49.2(7), if the employee is not yet able to perform the duties of his or her position because of the organ donation. In order to extend the leave, the employee is required to obtain a certificate from a legally qualified medical practitioner stating that they are not yet able to perform the duties of his or her position because of the organ donation and will not be able to do so for a specified period of time. The length of the extension to organ donor leave is subject to s. 49.2(7).

Same – s. 49.2(7)

49.2(7) The leave may be extended more than once, but the total extension period shall not exceed 13 weeks.

Subsection 49.2(7) permits the original organ donor leave period to be extended more than once for medical reasons, however the total extension period cannot exceed 13 weeks. For example, an employee is near the end of the original 13 weeks of organ donor leave and has not fully recovered from the organ donation to perform the duties of her position. The employee will be able to extend her leave, if her doctor, who is a member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, issues a certificate stating that she is not yet able to perform the duties of her position because of the organ donation and will not be able to do so for a period of time. If at the end of the additional period of time of organ donor leave, the employee is still unable to perform the duties of her position, the leave may again be extended if her doctor issues another certificate. However, the total period of time for these extensions cannot exceed 13 weeks. Therefore, where the leave is extended, the maximum amount of time allowed for organ donor leave is 26 weeks in total.

When Leave Begins – s. 49.2(8)

49.2(8) The employee may begin a leave described in subsection (5) on the day that he or she undergoes surgery for the purpose of organ donation, or on the earlier day specified in a certificate issued by a legally qualified medical practitioner.

Generally, organ donor leave will begin on the date of the surgery but it may begin on an earlier date as specified in a certificate issued by a legally qualified medical practitioner.

When Leave Ends – s. 49.2(9)

49.2(9) Subject to subsections (10) and (11), a leave under this section ends when the prescribed period has expired or, if no period is prescribed, 13 weeks after the leave began.

Subject to s. 49.2(10) (where an employee extends the leave in accordance with ss. 49.2(6)) and 49.2(11) which set out where an employee may end the leave early), organ donor leave will end when the prescribed period has expired or 13 weeks after it began. At the time of writing, there are no other leave periods prescribed. Therefore, organ donor leave will end 13 weeks after it began, subject to ss. 49.2(10) and 49.2(11).

Same – s. 49.2(10)

49.2(10) If the employee extends the leave in accordance with subsection (6), the leave ends on the earlier of,

(a) the day specified in the most recent certificate under subsection (6); or

(b) the day that is,

- i. if no period is prescribed for the purposes of subsection (5), 26 weeks after the leave began, or
- ii. if a period is prescribed for the purposes of subsection (5), 13 weeks after the end of the prescribed period.

If an employee has extended an organ donor leave in accordance with s. 49.2(6), the leave would end the earlier of:

- The end of the specified time in the most recent certificate that confirmed that the employee was not yet able to perform the duties of his or her position because of the organ donation;
- If no period for the leave has been prescribed, 26 weeks after the leave began; or
- If a period for the leave has been prescribed, 13 weeks after the end of the prescribed period.

At the time of writing, there have been no leave periods that have been prescribed. Therefore, where there has been an extension to organ donor leave, the leave would end on the earlier of the day specified in the most recent medical certificate or 26 weeks after the leave began.

Ending Leave Early – s. 49.2(11)

49.2(11) The employee may end the leave earlier than provided in subsection (9) or (10) by giving the employer written notice at least two weeks before the day the employee wishes to end the leave.

Section 49.2(11) provides that organ donor leave may end earlier than provided in ss. 49.2(9) or 49.2(10) if the employee gives the employer at least two weeks' written notice before the day the employee wishes to end the leave.

In contrast to the Program's position with respect to the notice requirements to commence the leave, the Program's position is that the employer can refuse to allow the employee to return to work earlier than the date provided for in s. 49.2(9) or 49.2(10) if the employee has not given the employer two weeks' notice in writing.

Advising Employer – ss. 49.2(12), (13)

49.2(12) An employee who wishes to take leave under this section or to extend a leave under this section shall give the employer written notice, at least two weeks before beginning or extending the leave, if possible.

(13) If the employee must begin or extend the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the matter in writing as soon as possible after beginning or extending the leave.

An employee who wishes to take organ donor leave or wishes to extend an organ donor leave is required to give at least two weeks' notice in writing to the employer of his or her intention to take or extend an organ donor leave. In circumstances where that cannot be done, the employee is required, pursuant to s. 49.2(13), to advise the employer as soon as possible after beginning or extending the leave.

The employee is required to advise the employer in writing.

The ESA 2000 requires that the employee advise the employer that they will be beginning or extending a leave; it does not require the employee to specify a return date.

An employee does not lose his or her right to organ donor leave if they fail to comply with ss. 49.2(12) or (13). An employee's entitlement to organ donor leave arises by virtue of meeting the eligibility criteria in s. 49.2(3), and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins or is extended does not negate that entitlement. This approach is consistent with the Program's long-standing policy for all leaves contained in Part XIV where the structure of the entitlement and notice provisions is similar to those relating to organ donor leave. See for example, ESA Part XIV, s. 46(4) and s. 48(4).

Duty to Provide Certificate – s. 49.2(14)

49.2(14) When the employer requires a certificate under subsection (4), (6) or (8), the employee shall provide it as soon as possible.

This section provides that if the employer requires a certificate referred to in ss. 49.2(4), (6) or (8), the employee is required to provide it to the employer as soon as possible.

The certificate referred to in ss. 49.2(4), (6) or (8), is the certificate issued by a legally qualified medical practitioner as defined in s. 49.2(1) stating either:

- That the employee has undergone or will undergo surgery for the purpose of organ donation;
- That the employee is not yet able to perform the duties of their position because of the organ donation and will not be able to do so for a specified period of time; or
- That the employee is to start an organ donor leave on an earlier date specified by a legally qualified medical practitioner before the surgery.

An employee's failure to conform to the statutory requirement to provide a copy of the certificate does not disentitle them to the organ donor leave. It is the Program's view that the requirement to provide a certificate is not a condition precedent to the entitlement to organ donor leave; the conditions for entitlement are set out in s. 49.2(3).

s. 49.2(15) – REPEALED

ESA Part XIV Section 49.3 – Family Caregiver Leave

Definitions – s. 49.3(1)

Qualified Health Practitioner

49.3(1) In this section,

"qualified health practitioner" means,

(a) a person who is qualified to practise as a physician, a registered nurse or a psychologist under the laws of the jurisdiction in which care or treatment is provided to the individual described in subsection (5), or

(b) in the prescribed circumstances, a member of a prescribed class of health practitioners;

Where care or treatment is provided in Ontario:

- "A person who is qualified to practise as a physician" means a member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario (this includes psychiatrists);
- "A person who is qualified to practise as a registered nurse" means a member of the College of Nurses of Ontario who holds a general or extended certificate of registration as a registered nurse in accordance with O Reg 275/94 made under the Nursing Act, 1991, SO 1991, c 32, (nurse practitioners hold extended certificates); and
- "A person who is qualified to practise as a psychologist" means an individual who is a member of the College of Psychologists of Ontario.

Where care or treatment is provided in a jurisdiction other than Ontario, the question of whether the person providing it is a qualified health practitioner is determined with reference to the laws of that other jurisdiction.

At the time of writing, there are no prescribed circumstances or prescribed classes of health practitioners.

Week

49.3(1) In this section,

"week" means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

"Week" means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday. For the purposes of family caregiver leave, week will always be Sunday to Saturday, even if the employer's work week is different.

Entitlement to Leave – s. 49.3(2); Serious Medical Condition – s. 49.3(3); Same – s. 49.3(4)

49.3(2) An employee is entitled to a leave of absence without pay to provide care or support to an individual described in subsection (5) if a qualified health practitioner issues a certificate stating that the individual has a serious medical condition.

49.3(3) For greater certainty, a serious medical condition referred to in subsection (2) may include a condition that is chronic or episodic.

49.3(4) An employee is entitled to take up to eight weeks leave under this section for each individual described in subsection (5) in each calendar year.

These subsections provide for an entitlement to family caregiver leave if the eligibility requirements set out in the subsections are met.

The Entitlement

Up to Eight Weeks . . . in Each Calendar Year with Respect to Each Specified Family Member

Employees are entitled to take up to eight weeks of family caregiver leave in each calendar year with respect to each specified family member. Week is defined in s. 49.3(1) as being a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

Nothing in the Employment Standards Act, 2000 requires that the weeks of family caregiver leave be taken consecutively. Further, unlike the case with family medical leave, the ESA 2000 does not require that family caregiver leave be taken in periods of entire weeks. However, where an employee takes any part of a week as leave, s. 49.3(7.1) permits the employer to deem the employee to have taken one full week of leave. In other words, there are eight weeks in which the employee may take leave and thus where an employee takes any time off during a week as family caregiver leave - even as little as one day – they may be considered to have used up one week of their eight weeks of entitlement.

Additionally, because the ESA 2000 does not require that family caregiver leave be taken in periods of entire weeks, ESA Part XIV, s. 52.1 - which applies only to leaves that must be taken in entire weeks - does not apply.

Section 52.1, which applies to family medical leave (since that leave must be taken in periods of entire weeks) provides that an employee who ceases to provide care or support before the end of a week is entitled to stay on family medical leave for the rest of the week, and can return to work before the end of the week only if the employer agrees. In contrast, in the case of family caregiver leave, because s. 52.1

does not apply, an employee who ceases to provide care or support before the end of a week is required to return to work and the employer has no right to prevent the employee from returning to work.

Accordingly, it is Program policy that the entitlement to family caregiver leave is as follows:

- There are eight weeks in each calendar year in which an employee is entitled to be on leave with respect to each individual listed in s. 49.3(5);
- The eight weeks in which leave is taken can be consecutive, or they can be separated;
- The employee may take leave for periods less than a full week (e.g., single days, at the beginning, middle, or end of a week), but if they do, the employer may consider the employee to have used up one week of their eight-week entitlement. If the employee is on leave for two or more periods within the same week (e.g., on leave on Monday and on Thursday of the same week), only one week of the eight-week entitlement may be deemed to be used up;
- The employee is entitled to be on leave only when the employee is providing care or support to an individual listed in s. 49.3(5); and
- The employer cannot require the employee to take an entire week of leave, cannot prevent the employee from working prior to taking a single day(s) of leave during a week, and cannot prevent the employee from returning to work after a single day(s) of leave during the week.

There is no limit on the number of family members for whom family caregiver leave can be taken per calendar year. If, for example, an employee has two specified family members who have a serious medical condition, the employee will be entitled to two family caregiver leaves of up to eight weeks each. The timing and duration of each leave, the notice requirements, etc., are governed by s. 49.3 independently of one other.

Note that the ESA 2000 does not require that family caregiver leave entitlements be pro-rated for part-time employees or employees who started their employment partway through a calendar year.

When a new calendar year starts on a day other than a Sunday

Because week is defined as running from Sunday to Saturday, the question arises as to how to attribute family caregiver leave absences when a week crosses over into the next calendar year. Specifically, what happens if an employee is on a family caregiver leave during such a week, on at least one day before the end of the calendar year and on at least one day into the new calendar year? For example, an employee takes family caregiver leave from Sunday, December 28 to Saturday, January 3. Because the family caregiver leave entitlement is on a calendar year basis, it is Program policy that in this situation, the employee is considered to have used up one of their eight weeks of leave entitlement for the calendar year that is ending AND one of their eight weeks of leave entitlement for the calendar year that is beginning.

To Provide Care or Support

The family caregiver leave entitlement is for providing care or support to the family member with the serious medical condition. This includes, for example, providing psychological or emotional support to the family member, assisting the family member with regular household chores (e.g., housekeeping, laundry, shopping) as well as arranging for care by a third party provider, and directly providing or participating in the personal care of the family member. Care or support also includes assisting the family member to get their affairs in order, where, for example, the family member is at risk of death.

To an Individual Described in Subsection (5)

Employees are entitled to family caregiver leave with respect to the family members listed in s. 49.3(5). See s. 49.3(5) below.

Eligibility Criteria

Qualified Health Practitioner Issues a Certificate

An employee is eligible for family caregiver leave if a qualified health practitioner issues a certificate stating that the individual has a serious medical condition.

Qualified Health Practitioner

See the discussion of this term in s. 49.3(1) above.

Issues a Certificate

Because s. 49.3(2) uses the present tense "issues" (as opposed to "has issued"), an employee may begin a family caregiver leave before a certificate is issued.

For example, an employee might obtain the certificate soon after beginning the leave, or after the leave is over, or – if the employer engages in a reprisal against the employee – soon after the reprisal or when asked to by an employment standards officer during the course of a reprisal investigation. In all of these cases, because a certificate was ultimately issued, the employee will be considered to have fulfilled this eligibility criterion. However, if the employee never does obtain a certificate, they will not have an entitlement to family caregiver leave.

The employee may wish to use the Ministry's "Medical Certificate to Support Entitlement to Family Caregiver Leave, Family Medical Leave, and/or Critical Illness Leave" form when obtaining the medical certificate. It is available on the Ministry of Labour's website.

Period over which a certificate will support absences as family caregiver leave

A medical certificate will authorize absences as protected family caregiver leave absences (up to eight weeks per calendar year) from the date it is issued until the end of the calendar year in which it was issued. However, if the certificate sets out a period over which the individual has / will be expected to have a serious medical condition that is different from the period between the date it is issued to the end of the calendar year, the period set out in the certificate determines the period over which absences can be protected as family caregiver leave.

The period in the certificate could:

- Protect absences that took place before the certificate was issued, including those in the prior calendar year;
- Extend the period over which absences will be protected to beyond the end of the calendar year in which the certificate was issued; or
- Shorten the period over which absences will be protected to prior to the end of the calendar year in which the certificate was issued.

Examples:

1. A certificate was issued September 1, 2017. It was silent on the date the individual's serious medical condition arose, and on the date it is expected to end. That certificate will support absences as family caregiver leave - up to eight weeks per calendar year – during the period between September 1, 2017 to December 31, 2017.
2. A certificate was issued January 1, 2017. It stated that the individual's serious medical condition arose on October 1, 2016 and is expected to last until April 1, 2017. That certificate will support absences as family caregiver leave as follows:
    - Up to eight weeks during the period between October 1, 2016 and December 31, 2016; and
    - Up to eight weeks during the period between January 1, 2017 and April 1, 2017.
3. A certificate was issued September 1, 2017. It was silent on the date the individual's serious medical condition arose, and states that the serious medical condition is expected to last until April 1, 2018. That certificate will support absences as family caregiver leave as follows:
    - Up to eight weeks during the period between September 1, 2017 and December 31, 2017; and
    - Up to eight weeks during the period between January 1, 2018 and April 1, 2018.

Stating that the individual has a serious medical condition

The certificate must name the individual and state that they have a serious medical condition. Pursuant to s. 49.3(3), a serious medical condition includes a condition that is chronic or episodic. There is no requirement that the note specify what the medical condition is; it need only indicate that it is "serious".

It is for the health practitioner, and no one else, to make an assessment as to whether the individual's medical condition is serious; if they issue a certificate stating that the individual has a serious medical condition, the s. 49.3(2) requirement is fulfilled. In other words, it is not an employment standards officer's role to determine whether the individual does in fact have a serious medical condition.

It is Program policy that a certificate will not satisfy the eligibility criteria if it names or describes the medical condition without explicitly stating that it is serious. Note, however, that nothing in the ESA 2000 prevents the employee in question from returning to the health practitioner and obtaining another certificate that does state that the family member concerned has a medical condition that is serious. It is Program policy that this eligibility criterion will be met if the certificate does not contain the word “serious” but instead contains words that are synonymous with the notion that the individual could die or is expected to die. Although there is no requirement that the individual be expected to die in order for the employee to have an entitlement to family caregiver leave, this policy recognizes that any illness or injury that causes or could cause the individual to die is serious. So, for example, if the certificate contains the words "life-threatening" or "terminally ill", or something else that is synonymous with the expectation that the individual could die or is expected to die, this criterion will be met.

An employee's entitlement to family caregiver leave is in addition to any entitlement the employee may have with respect to the same relative to family medical leave, critical illness leave, personal emergency leave, child death leave, crime-related child disappearance leave, and domestic or sexual violence leave. A single certificate may satisfy the requirements for a certificate under more than one leave. For example, a single certificate that indicates that a named individual has a serious medical condition with a significant risk of death occurring within a period of 26 weeks will satisfy the requirements for both family medical leave (which is available only if the individual has a serious medical condition with a significant risk of dying within 26 weeks) and family caregiver leave; an employee is not required to obtain separate certificates for each leave if the wording used in a single certificate meets the requirements for both leaves.

Application of Subsection (2) – s. 49.3(5)

49.3(5) Subsection (2) applies in respect of the following individuals:

1. The employee's spouse.

2. A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee's spouse.

3. A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.

4. A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or the employee's spouse.

5. The spouse of a child of the employee.

6. The employee's brother or sister.

7. A relative of the employee who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance.

8. Any individual prescribed as a family member for the purpose of this section.

This subsection lists the individuals for whom a family caregiver leave can be taken; the list of individuals mirrors the list of individuals with respect to whom personal emergency leave may be taken.

The list is exhaustive. If the person who has the serious medical condition is not an individual referred to in s. 49.3(5), the employee will not be entitled to take family caregiver leave in respect of that person.

The terms "parent" (which indirectly expands the ordinary meaning of child) and "spouse" are defined in ESA Part XIV, s. 45.

With respect to paragraph 7, "a relative of the employee who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance" in paragraph 7, see the discussion of this phrase in ESA Part XIV, s. 50. Section 50 deals with the personal emergency leave provisions, which use the same phrase.

Paragraph 8 refers to "any individual prescribed as a family member for the purpose of this section". At the time of writing no individuals have been prescribed.

Advising Employer – s. 49.3(6); Same – s. 49.3(7)

49.3(6) An employee who wishes to take a leave under this section shall advise his or her employer in writing that he or she will be doing so.

49.3(7) If the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it.

Section 49.3(6) requires employees to tell their employers ahead of time that they will be taking family caregiver leave. In circumstances where that cannot be done s. 49.3(7) requires the employee to tell the employer as soon as possible after beginning the leave. In both cases, the employee is required to advise the employer in writing.

The ESA 2000 requires that the employee advise the employer that they will be beginning a leave; it does not require the employee to specify a return date.

The requirement to advise the employer in writing applies with respect to each part of their eight-week leave.

Example 1

An employee takes the available eight-week leave in two separate four-week blocks. The employee is required to advise the employer in writing that they will be taking leave before (or as soon as possible after, if the notice cannot be given before the leave begins) each four-week block of leave begins. The notice can be given at two separate times, once before each four-week block (or, if notice cannot be given ahead of time, as soon as possible after the beginning of each four-week block). Or, if the employee knows the start dates of both four-week blocks of leave ahead of time, a single written notice setting out the dates would meet this requirement.

Example 2

An employee takes eight one-day leaves. The employee must advise the employer in writing before (or as soon as possible after) each single day of leave is taken. This is so even if some of the single days are taken in the same week. The notice can be given at separate times, or, if the employee knows the start dates of more than one single day of leave ahead of time, a single notice setting out the multiple dates is sufficient notice for each of those dates.

Failure to Advise Employer

An employee does not lose their right to family caregiver leave if they fail to comply with ss. 49.3(6) or (7). An employee's entitlement to family caregiver leave arises by virtue of meeting the eligibility criteria in s. 49.3(2), and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins does not negate that entitlement. This approach is consistent with the Program's long-standing policy for all leaves contained in Part XIV where the structures of the entitlement and notice provisions are similar to these. See for example ss. 46(4) (pregnancy leave) and 48(4) (parental leave) in Part XIV.

The question may arise as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy) where the time off is a family caregiver leave under the ESA 2000. Section 49.3(7) provides that "if the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it." It is thus clear that the ESA 2000 contemplates that circumstances may arise where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of starting family caregiver leave and that the employee nevertheless has a right to take the leave in such circumstances (although the employee does have an obligation to advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it). On the other hand, the failure to give notice in advance of taking leave when the employee could have done so can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating section 74. However, the following points should be borne in mind:

- The employee's failure to give advance notice does not nullify the right to take family caregiver leave if the qualifying conditions in s. 49.3(2) have been met. In other words, the failure to give advance notice does not have the result that the time taken off by the employee is not family caregiver leave.
- An employer may impose discipline where the employee failed to provide advance notice even though the employee could have done so; however, the reason for the discipline must be because of the failure to give advance notice and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.
- Likewise, an employer may impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the leave (before or after the start of the leave). Again, however, the reason for the discipline would have to be because of the failure to provide notice and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.

Leave Deemed to be Taken in Entire Weeks – s. 49.3(7.1)

49.3(7.1) For the purposes of an employee's entitlement under subsection (4), if an employee takes any part of a week as leave, the employer may deem the employee to have taken one week of leave.

The Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 added this provision to s. 49.3 on January 1, 2018.

The provision must be read in conjunction with s. 49.3(1), which defines week as seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

Employees may not need an entire work week to provide the care or support that gave rise to the family caregiver leave, and will only take part of a week off as family caregiver leave. Section 49.3(7.1) allows an employer in this situation to count the part-week off work as an entire week's leave for the purpose of the eight-week leave entitlement. This is the only purpose for which the employer can deem the part work week as an entire week's leave. It cannot deem the employee not to have worked at all during the week. The employee is entitled to be paid for the time that was actually worked, and the hours that were worked will be counted for the purposes of, among other things, determining whether the relevant overtime threshold has been reached, whether the limits on, for example, the daily and weekly hours of work have been reached, and whether the daily, weekly/bi-weekly and in-between shifts rest requirements have been met.

Where an employee takes more than one single day of leave during the same week as defined in s. 49.3(1), the employer may deem only one week of leave to have been used up. For example, if an employee takes a single day of leave on Tuesday, May 29, returns to work on May 30 and 31, and takes another single day of leave on Friday, June 1, only one week will be deemed to have been used up, because those two days fell within the same week.

Note that while this provision allows the employer to deem the employee to have taken one week of leave if the employee takes part of a week as leave, it does not require the employer to do so.

The issue may arise as to whether an employer could exercise its discretion and deem a partial week absence as a full week for some employees, but not for others, or whether this might allow employers to selectively punish employees who have too many absences in violation of the reprisal provisions of the ESA 2000.

The answer will depend on the facts. In particular, why did the employer treat the employees differently? Where an employer deems a full week's absence for some employees, but not for others, it is a question of fact as to whether the employer would be in violation of the ESA 2000. For instance, if the employer counts a one-day family caregiver leave as a full week's leave for Employee A but not for Employee B, who also takes a one-day family caregiver leave because the employer considers Employee B to be a better worker than Employee A, this might be unfair as between employee A and B, but it would not be a violation of the ESA 2000, as it would not be reprisal for exercising a right under the ESA 2000. If, on the other hand, the motivation for the differential treatment was that Employee A frequently took family caregiver leave of only a few days, and the employer assigned a full week's absence to these short leaves as a way to ensure Employee A used up all of their statutory entitlement as soon as possible because the employer found it inconvenient for the employee to be away for many short periods of time, that would be an unlawful reprisal.

Copy of Certificate – s. 49.3(8)

49.3(8) If requested by the employer, the employee shall provide the employer with a copy of the certificate referred to in subsection (2) as soon as possible.

This section provides that if the employer asks the employee for a copy of the certificate referred to in s. 49.3(2), the employee is required to provide it to the employer as soon as possible.

The certificate referred to in s. 49.3(2) is the certificate issued by a qualified health practitioner that states that an individual has a serious medical condition.

An employee's failure to conform to the statutory requirement to provide a copy of the certificate does not disentitle them to the family caregiver leave. It is the Program's view that the requirement to provide a copy of the certificate is not a condition precedent to the entitlement to family caregiver leave; the conditions for entitlement are set out in s. 49.3(2). However, as provided in s. 49.3(2), in order to be entitled to the leave, the employee must obtain a certificate. The leave may begin before the certificate is obtained, but the employee must eventually obtain a certificate in order to be entitled to the leave. If they do not eventually obtain a certificate, they are not entitled to the leave.

s. 49.3(9) – REPEALED

ESA Part XIV Section 49.4 – Critical Illness Leave

Definitions – s. 49.4(1)

49.4(1) In this section,

“adult” means an individual who is 18 years or older;

"critically ill " ,with respect to a minor child or adult , means a minor child or adult whose baseline state of health has significantly changed and whose life is at risk as a result of an illness or injury;

“family member”, with respect to an employee, means the following;

1. The employee’s spouse.
2. A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee’s spouse.

3. A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.
4. A child who is under legal guardianship of the employee or the employee's spouse.
5. A brother, step-brother, sister or step-sister of the employee.
6. A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or the employee's spouse.
7. A brother-in-law, step-brother-in-law, sister-in-law or step-sister-in-law of the employee.
8. A son-in-law or daughter-in-law of the employee or the employee's spouse.
9. An uncle or aunt of the employee or the employee's spouse.
10. A nephew or niece of the employee or the employee's spouse.
11. The spouse of the employee's grandchild, uncle, aunt, nephew or niece.
12. A person who considers the employee to be like a family member, provided the prescribed conditions, if any, are met.
13. Any individual prescribed as a family member for the purpose of this definition.

"minor child" means an individual who is under 18 years of age;

"qualified health practitioner" means,

(a) a person who is qualified to practise as a physician, a registered nurse or a psychologist under the laws of the jurisdiction in which care or treatment is provided to the individual described in subsection (2) or (5), or

(b) in the prescribed circumstances, a member of a prescribed class of health practitioners;

"week" means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

This section defines six terms used in the critical illness leave provisions.

Adult

An "adult" is defined as an individual who is 18 years or older. An employee who meets the eligibility requirements in s. 49.4(5) will be entitled to a leave of up to 17 weeks per s. 49.4(6) to provide care or support to a critically ill adult.

Critically Ill

In order for an employee to be entitled to a critical illness leave, the employee must be providing care or support to a critically ill minor child or adult who is a family member of the employee. "Minor child", "adult" and "family member" are defined terms.

"Critically ill" is defined, with respect to a minor child or adult, to mean the minor child or adult's baseline state of health has significantly changed and whose life is at risk as a result of an illness or injury.

"Baseline state of health" (or of wellness) is a medical term and it is for a qualified health practitioner (also a defined term) to make the assessment as to whether a minor child or adult's "baseline state of health has significantly changed". This same phrase appears in the federal government's policy statement regarding eligibility for "special benefits" for parents of critically ill children under the Employment

Insurance Act, SC 1996, c 23, and consistent with the federal government's policy. The Program takes the position that the phrase is intended to exclude a minor child or adult with a chronic illness or condition that is their normal state of health, even if that normal state is considered to be life-threatening in the medium to long term.

However, when an employment standards officer is making a determination as to whether an employee was entitled to critical illness leave, the issue with respect to the critically ill criterion is simply whether a qualified health practitioner has issued a certificate that meets the requirements of s. 49.4(2) or (5); the officer does not inquire as to whether the person in question was one "whose baseline state of health has significantly changed and whose life is at risk as a result of an illness or injury". See the discussion under the heading "Stating that the minor child or adult family member is critically ill". In other words, if a qualified health practitioner has issued such a certificate, the officer does not "go behind it" and make inquiries as to whether the practitioner was actually justified in doing so.

Family Member

This definition lists the individuals for whom an employee is entitled to take a critical illness leave. The list is exhaustive. If the minor child or adult is not in a relationship with the employee as listed in the definition, the employee has no entitlement to critical illness leave. Note that there are two types of critical illness leave, one for a minor child “who is a family member” of the employee, and one for an adult “who is a family member” of the employee. With respect to a critical illness leave for a minor child, the minor child does not have to be the employee’s own child in order for the employee to be entitled to the leave; for example, an employee could take a leave to care for a niece, nephew or grandchild who meets the definition of minor child (see below).

Section 49.4(1) defines the following individuals as family members:

- The employee’s spouse;
- A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee’s spouse;
- A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee’s spouse;
- A child who is under legal guardianship of the employee or the employee’s spouse;
- A brother, step-brother, sister or step-sister of the employee;
- A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or employee's spouse;
- A brother-in-law, step-brother-in-law, sister-in-law or step-sister-in-law of the employee;
- A son-in-law or daughter-in-law of the employee or employee's spouse;
- An uncle or aunt of the employee or employee's spouse;
- A nephew or niece of the employee or the employee's spouse;
- The spouse of the employee's grandchild, uncle, aunt, nephew or niece;
- A person who considers the employee to be like a family member, provided the prescribed conditions, if any, are met;
- Any individual prescribed as a family member for the purpose of this definition.

Note that "spouse" includes married same-sex couples, married opposite-sex couples, and couples of the same or opposite sex who live together in a conjugal relationship outside marriage – see the definition of spouse and the discussion at ESA Part XIV, s. 45.

Also note that the family members as defined by s. 49.4(1) do not have to live in Ontario in order for the employee to be eligible for critical illness leave.

With respect to “a person who considers the employee to be like a family member”, the legislation provides that if any conditions are set out in regulation, those conditions must be met. O Reg 535/17 section 1 prescribes the following condition: “the employee must, on the employer’s request, provide the employer with a copy of the document provided to an agency or department of the Government of Canada for the purpose of claiming benefits under the Employment Insurance Act (Canada) in which it is stated that the employee is considered to be like a family member.”

The employee must provide a copy of this document whether or not the employee applies or intends to apply for EI benefits to support critical illness leave. See O Reg 535/17 section 1 for more details.

At this time, there are no additional family members that have been prescribed.

Minor Child

In order to be considered a minor child for the purpose of entitlements to critical illness leave, the individual must have been under 18 years of age on the first day of the period during which the child requires care or support as indicated in the certificate issued by the qualified health practitioner. The fact that the critically ill individual turns 18 years old after the first day of this period does not extinguish the employee's right to the 37 weeks of leave. Also see subsections (13) and (14) below in this section for guidance on the situation where an employee takes a leave in relation to a minor child who turns 18 during the leave.

Qualified Health Practitioner

In order for an employee to be entitled to critical illness leave, a "qualified health practitioner" must issue a certificate stating that the minor child or adult is critically ill and requires the care or support of one or more family members and setting out the period during which the minor child or adult requires the care or support. The term "qualified health practitioner" is defined for the purposes of critical illness leave as:

a) A person who is qualified to practise as a physician, a registered nurse or a psychologist under the laws of the jurisdiction in which care or treatment is provided to the individual described in subsection (2) or (5), or
b) In the prescribed circumstances, a member of a prescribed class of health practitioners.

Where care or treatment is provided in Ontario:

- "A person who is qualified to practise as a physician" means a member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario (this includes psychiatrists);
- "A person who is qualified to practise as a registered nurse" means in accordance with O Reg 275/94 of the Nursing Act, 1991, SO 1991, c 32, a member of the College of Nurses of Ontario who holds a general or extended certificate of registration as a registered nurse (nurse practitioners hold extended certificates); and
- "A person who is qualified to practise as a psychologist" means an individual who is a member of the College of Psychologists of Ontario.

Where care or treatment is provided in a jurisdiction other than Ontario the question of whether the person providing it is a qualified health practitioner is determined with reference to the laws of that other jurisdiction.

At the time of writing, there are no prescribed circumstances or prescribed classes of health practitioners.

Week

"Week" means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday. For the purposes of critical illness leave, week will always be Sunday to Saturday, even if the employer's work week is different.

Entitlement to Leave – Critically Ill Minor Child – s. 49.4(2)

49.4(2) An employee who has been employed by their employer for at least six consecutive months is entitled to a leave of absence without pay to provide care or support to a critically ill minor child who is a family member of the employee if a qualified health practitioner issues a certificate that,

(a) states that the minor child is a critically ill minor child who requires the care or support of one or more family members; and

(b) sets out the period during which the minor child requires the care or support.

This subsection provides for an entitlement to critical illness leave in respect of a minor child if the eligibility requirements set out in the subsection are met (note the entitlement provisions with respect to a critical illness leave for an adult are set out in subsection (5) below).

Employed by their Employer for at Least Six Consecutive Months

To be eligible for critical illness leave, the employee has to have been employed for at least six consecutive months prior to the first day of the leave. It is not necessary that the employee have been actively working for the six-month period, so long as they were an employee during this time. For example, the employee could have been off receiving short-term disability benefits, on vacation, or on layoff during this period. The employee could also be on another statutory leave, including, for example, a family caregiver leave to care for the critically ill minor child during the period.

To Provide Care or Support to a critically ill minor child who is a family member of the employee

Critical illness leave under subsection (2) is for providing "care or support" to the critically ill minor child who is a family member of the employee. Care or support could include, for example, providing psychological or emotional support to the child, or providing or participating in their personal care. The care or support must be provided to a critically ill minor child (i.e. an individual under 18) who is a family member of the employee. This could be the employee’s child but is not limited to this relationship. It could be taken for any of the relationships listed in the definition of family member in s. 49.4(1) such as the employee’s grandchild, niece, nephew etc.

Qualified Health Practitioner Issues a Certificate

An employee is eligible for critical illness leave if a qualified health practitioner issues a certificate stating that a minor child who is a family member of the employee is critically ill and requires the care or support of one or more family members, and setting out the period during which the child requires the care or support.

Qualified Health Practitioner

See the discussion of this term at subsection (1) above.

Issues a Certificate

Because s. 49.4(2) uses the present tense "issues" (as opposed to "has issued"), an employee may begin a critical illness leave before a certificate is issued.

For example, an employee might obtain the certificate soon after beginning the leave, or after the leave is over, or – if the employer engages in a reprisal against the employee – soon after the reprisal or when asked to by an employment standards officer during the course of a reprisal investigation. In all of these cases, because a certificate ultimately was issued, the employee will be considered to have fulfilled this eligibility criterion. However, if the employee never does obtain a certificate, they will not have an entitlement to critical illness leave.

The employee may wish to use the Ministry's "Medical Certificate to Support Entitlement to Family Caregiver Leave, Family Medical Leave, and/or Critical Illness Leave" form when obtaining the medical certificate. It is available on the Ministry of Labour's website.

If an employee is applying for Employment Insurance (EI) benefits in respect of the same critically ill minor child, a copy of the medical certificate submitted to Employment and Social Development Canada may also be used for the purposes of critical illness leave.

Stating that the minor child is a critically ill minor child

The certificate must name the minor child, and indicate that they are critically ill (or, given the s. 49.4(1) definition of critically ill, that they have been critically injured). There is no requirement that the certificate specify what the illness (or injury) is; it need only indicate that it is critical.

It is for the health practitioner, and no one else, to make an assessment as to whether the minor child is critically ill (see the discussion of the definition of critically ill in subsection (1) above). If they issue a certificate stating that the minor child is a critically ill (or injured) minor child, the s. 49.4(2) requirement is fulfilled. In other words, it is not an employment standards officer's role to determine whether the minor child is in fact critically ill or injured.

It is Program policy that a certificate will not satisfy the eligibility criteria if it states what illness or injury the minor child has without also stating that the minor child is a critically ill or critically injured minor child (or that the illness or injury from which the minor child is suffering is critical). This is so even if the certificate names an illness or injury that sounds critical. (Note, however, that nothing in the ESA 2000 prevents the employee in question from returning to the health practitioner and obtaining another certificate that does state that the minor child is a critically ill - or injured – minor child, or that the illness or injury from which the child is suffering is critical). It is Program policy that this eligibility criteria will be met if the certificate doesn’t contains the words critically ill (or critical illness) or critically injured (or critical injury) but instead contains words that are synonymous with the notion that the child's life is at risk. So, for example, if the certificate contains the words "life threatening", "terminally ill", or something else that is synonymous with the expectation that the child could die or is expected to die, this criterion will be met. Furthermore, it is Program policy that the eligibility criteria will be met if the certificate doesn’t contain the specific words minor child but instead references only a child where some other evidence is available to establish that the child is under the age of 18, or where the age of the individual is contained in the certificate and they are under 18 years of age.

An employee's entitlement to critical illness leave is in addition to any entitlement the employee may have with respect to the same child to family medical leave, family caregiver leave, personal emergency leave, and child death leave, crime-related child disappearance leave, domestic or sexual violence leave and personal emergency leave. A single certificate may satisfy the requirements for a certificate under more than one leave. An employee is not required to obtain separate certificates for each leave if the wording used in a single certificate meets the requirements for more than one leave.

Who requires the care or support of one or more family members

The certificate must state that the critically ill (or injured) minor child requires the care or support of at least one family member. Family member is a defined term.

Sets out the period during which the minor child requires the care or support

The certificate must set out the period during which the minor child requires the care or support of one or more family members. The period would typically be described by specifying a start date and an end date. However, in some cases it may not be possible to specify an end date, and in other cases it may be that the health practitioner does not foresee the child ever recovering. Recognizing this, the Program takes the position that it is acceptable if the certificate, instead of specifying an end date, states that care or support will be required indefinitely or that it will be required to the end of the minor child's life.

Same – s. 49.4(3)

49.4(3) Subject to subsections (4), an employee is entitled to take up to 37 weeks leave under this section to provide care or support to a critically ill minor child.

This subsection establishes what the critical illness leave entitlement is under subsection (2): up to 37 weeks of leave to provide care or support to the critically ill minor child who is a family member of the employee: up to 37 weeks of leave .

The subsection must be read in conjunction with s. 49.4(14), which provides for additional leaves in certain circumstances.

Nothing in the ESA 2000 requires that the weeks of critical illness leave be taken consecutively. Further, unlike the case with family medical leave, the ESA 2000 does not require that critical illness leave be taken in periods of entire weeks. However, because the critical illness leave entitlement is expressed in terms of a number of weeks, rather than a number of days (as is the case with personal emergency leave), it is Program policy that the entitlement is that there are 37 weeks in which the employee may take leave and thus where an employee takes any time off during a week as critical illness leave – even as little as one day – they are considered to have used up one week of their 37 weeks of entitlement.

Additionally, because the ESA 2000 does not require that critical illness leave be taken in periods of entire weeks, s. 52.1 of the ESA 2000 – which applies only to leaves that must be taken in entire weeks – does not apply*.

In summary, it is Program policy that the entitlement to critical illness leave in relation to a minor child who is a family member of the employee is as follows:

- There are 37 weeks (which is defined as Sunday to Saturday) in which an employee is entitled to be on critical illness leave.
- The 37 weeks in which the leave may be taken can be consecutive, or they can be separated.

- The employee is entitled to be on leave only when the employee is providing care or support to the critically ill minor child.
- The employee may take leave for periods less than a full week (e.g. single days, at the beginning, middle, or end of a week), but if they do, they are considered to have used up one week of their 37-week entitlement. If the employee is on leave for two or more periods within the same week (e.g. on leave on Monday and on Thursday of the same week), only one week of the 37-week entitlement is used up.
- The employer cannot require the employee to take an entire week of leave, cannot prevent the employee from working prior to taking a single day(s) of leave during a week, and cannot prevent the employee from returning to work after a single day(s) of leave during the week.

This subsection must be read in conjunction with other relevant subsections of s. 49.4, particularly (4)(8)(9)-(10), (16) and (19) which address the following issues/scenarios:

- Subsection (4): the entitlement if the period during which the minor child requires care or support is less than 37 weeks.
- Subsections (8) and (9): the latest date the employee can remain on leave.
- Subsection (10): the latest date the employee can remain on leave if a minor child dies.
- Subsection (16): eligibility for additional leaves.
- Subsection (19): deviation from the plan originally provided to the employer setting out when leave would be taken.

---

*Section 52.1, which applies to family medical leave (since that leave is a leave that must be taken in periods of entire weeks) provides that an employee who ceases to provide care or support before the end of a week is entitled to stay on family medical leave for the rest of the week and can return to work before the end of the week only if the employer agrees. In contrast, in the case of critical illness leave, because section 52.1 does not apply, an employee who ceases to provide care or support before the end of a week is required to return to work and the employer has no right to prevent the employee from returning to work.

Same – Period Less Than 37 Weeks – s. 49.4(4)

49.4(4) If the certificate described in subsection (2) sets out a period of less than 37 weeks, the employee is entitled to take a leave only for the number of weeks in the period specified in the certificate.

While subsection (3) provides that an employee is entitled to take up to 37 weeks of critical illness leave to provide care or support to a critically ill minor child, subsection (4) provides an exception where the medical certificate indicates that the number of weeks during which the minor child will require care or support is a number less than 37 weeks. In that case, the employee can only take a leave for the number of weeks indicated. (Note, however, that if the minor child is still critically ill and in need of care or support after the period specified in the certificate has expired, the employee may be eligible for a further leave pursuant to subsection (14)).

Entitlement to Leave – Critically Ill Adult – s. 49.4(5)

49.4(5) An employee who has been employed by their employer for at least six consecutive months is entitled to a leave of absence without pay to provide care or support to a critically ill adult who is a family member of the employee if a qualified health practitioner issues a certificate that,

a) states that the adult is a critically ill adult who requires the care or support of one or more family members; and

b) sets out the period during which the adult requires the care or support.

This subsection provides for an entitlement to critical illness leave in respect of an adult if the eligibility requirements set out in the subsection are met. (Note the entitlement provisions with respect to a critical illness leave for a minor child are set out in subsection (2) above.)

Employed by their Employer for at Least Six Consecutive Months

To be eligible for critical illness leave, the employee has to have been employed for at least six consecutive months prior to the first day of the leave. It is not necessary that the employee have been actively working for the six-month period, so long as they were an employee during this time. For example, the employee could have been off receiving short-term disability benefits, on vacation, or on layoff during this period. The employee could also be on another statutory leave, including, for example, a family caregiver leave to care for the critically ill adult during the period.

To Provide Care or Support to a critically ill adult who is a family member of the employee

Critical illness leave under subsection (5) is for providing care or support to the critically ill adult who is a family member of the employee. This could include, for example, providing psychological or emotional support to the adult, or providing or participating in their personal care. The list of family members for whom the employee can take the leave is set out in the definition of “family member” in subsection 49.4(1).

Qualified Health Practitioner Issues a Certificate

An employee is eligible for critical illness leave if a qualified health practitioner issues a certificate stating that an adult who is a family member of the employee is critically ill and requires the care or support of one or more family members, and setting out the period during which the adult requires the care or support.

a) Qualified Health Practitioner

See the discussion of this term at subsection (1) above.

b) Issues a Certificate

Because s. 49.4(5) uses the present tense "issues" (as opposed to "has issued"), an employee may begin a critical illness leave before a certificate is issued.

For example, an employee might obtain the certificate soon after beginning the leave, or after the leave is over, or – If the employer engages in a reprisal against the employee – soon after the reprisal or when asked to by an employment standards officer during the course of a reprisal investigation. In all of these cases, because a certificate ultimately was issued, the employee will be considered to have fulfilled this eligibility criterion. However, if the employee never does obtain a certificate, they will not have an entitlement to critical illness leave.

The employee may wish to use the Ministry's "Medical Certificate to Support Entitlement to Family Caregiver Leave, Family Medical Leave, and/or Critical Illness Leave" form when obtaining the medical certificate. It is available on the Ministry of Labour's website.

If an employee is applying for Employment Insurance (EI) benefits in respect of the same critically ill adult, a copy of the medical certificate submitted to Employment and Social Development Canada may also be used for the purposes of critical illness leave.

c) Stating that the adult is a critically ill adult

The certificate must name the adult, and indicate that they are critically ill (or, given the s. 49.4(1) definition of critically ill, that they have been critically injured). There is no requirement that the certificate specify what the illness (or injury) is; it need only indicate that it is critical.

It is for the health practitioner, and no one else, to make an assessment as to whether the adult is critically ill (see the discussion of the definition of critically ill in subsection (1) above). If they issue a certificate stating that the adult is a critically ill (or injured) adult, the s. 49.4(5) requirement is fulfilled. In other words, it is not an employment standards officer's role to determine whether the adult is in fact critically ill or injured.

It is Program policy that a certificate will not satisfy the eligibility criteria if it states what illness or injury the adult has without also stating that the adult is a critically ill or critically injured adult (or that the illness or injury from which the adult is suffering is critical). This is so even if the certificate names an illness or injury that sounds critical (note, however, that nothing in the ESA 2000 prevents the employee in question from returning to the health practitioner and obtaining another certificate that does state that the adult is a critically ill - or injured – adult, or that the illness or injury from which the adult is suffering is critical). It is Program policy that this eligibility criteria will be met if the certificate doesn’t contains the words critically ill (or critical illness) or critically injured (or critical injury) but instead contains words that are synonymous with the notion that the adult's life is at risk. So, for example, if the certificate contains the words "life threatening", "terminally ill", or something else that is synonymous with the expectation that the adult could die or is expected to die, this criterion will be met.

An employee's entitlement to critical illness leave is in addition to any entitlement the employee may have with respect to the same adult to domestic or sexual violence leave, family medical leave, family caregiver leave or personal emergency leave. A single certificate may satisfy the requirements for a certificate under more than one leave. An employee is not required to obtain separate certificates for each leave if the wording used in a single certificate meets the requirements for more than one leave.

d) Who requires the care or support of one or more family members

The certificate must state that the critically ill (or injured) adult requires the care or support of at least one family member. Family member is a defined term.

e) Sets out the period during which the adult family member requires care or support

The certificate must set out the period during which the adult requires the care or support of one or more family members. The period would typically be described by specifying a start date and an end date. However, in some cases it may not be possible to specify an end date, and in other cases it may be that the health practitioner does not foresee the adult ever recovering. Recognizing this, the Program takes the position that it is acceptable if the certificate, instead of specifying an end date, states that care or support will be required indefinitely or that it will be required to the end of the adult's life.

Same – s. 49.4(6)

49.4(6) Subject to subsection (7), an employee is entitled to take up to 17 weeks of leave under this section to provide care or support to a critically ill adult.

This subsection establishes what the critical illness leave entitlement is under subsection (5): up to 17 weeks of leave to provide care or support to the critically ill adult who is a family member of the employee.

The subsection must be read in conjunction with s. 49.4(15), which provides for additional leaves in certain circumstances.

Nothing in the ESA 2000 requires that the weeks of critical illness leave be taken consecutively. Further, unlike the case with family medical leave, the ESA 2000 does not require that critical illness leave be taken in periods of entire weeks. However, because the critical illness leave entitlement is expressed in terms of a number of weeks, rather than a number of days (as is the case with personal emergency leave), it is Program policy that the entitlement is that there are 17 weeks in which the employee may take leave and thus where an employee takes any time off during a week as critical illness leave – even as little as one day – they are considered to have used up one week of their 17 weeks of entitlement.

Additionally, because the ESA 2000 does not require that critical illness leave be taken in periods of entire weeks, s. 52.1 of the ESA 2000 – which applies only to leaves that must be taken in entire weeks – does not apply.

In summary, it is Program policy that the entitlement to critical illness leave in relation to an adult who is a family member of the employee is as follows:

- There are 17 weeks (which is defined as Sunday to Saturday) in which an employee is entitled to be on critical illness leave.
- The 17 weeks in which the leave may be taken can be consecutive, or they can be separated.
- The employee is entitled to be on leave only when the employee is providing care or support to the critically ill adult.
- The employee may take leave for periods less than a full week (e.g. single days, at the beginning, middle, or end of a week), but if they do, they are considered to have used up one week of their 17-week entitlement. If the employee is on leave for two or more periods within the same week (e.g. on leave on Monday and on Thursday of the same week), only one week of the 17-week entitlement is used up.
- The employer cannot require the employee to take an entire week of leave, cannot prevent the employee from working prior to taking a single day(s) of leave during a week, and cannot prevent the employee from returning to work after a single day(s) of leave during the week.

This subsection must be read in conjunction with other relevant subsections of s. 49.4, particularly (7)-(10), (15) and (19) which address the following issues/scenarios:

- Subsection (7): the entitlement if the period during which the adult requires care or support is less than 17 weeks.

- Subsection (8) and (9): the latest date the employee can remain on leave.
- Subsection (10): the latest date the employee can remain on leave if an adult dies.
- Subsection (15): eligibility for "additional leaves".
- Subsection (19): deviation from the plan originally provided to the employer setting out when leave would be taken.

Period of Less Than 17 Weeks – s. 49.4(7)

(7) If the certificate described in subsection (5) sets out a period of less than 17 weeks, the employee is entitled to take a leave only for the number of weeks in the period specified in the certificate.

While subsection (6) provides that an employee is entitled to take up to 17 weeks of critical illness leave to provide care or support to a critically ill adult, subsection (7) provides an exception where the medical certificate indicates that the number of weeks during which the adult will require care or support is a number less than 17 weeks. In that case, the employee can only take a leave for the number of weeks indicated (note, however, that if the adult is still critically ill and in need of care or support after the period specified in the certificate has expired, the employee may be eligible for a further leave pursuant to subsection (15)).

When Leave Must End – s. 49.4(8); Limitation Period – s. 49.4(9)

49.4(8) Subject to subsection (9), a leave under this section ends no later than the last day of the period specified in the certificate described in subsection (2) or (5).

(9) If the period specified in the certificate described in subsection (2) or (5) is 52 weeks or longer, the leave ends no later than the last day of the 52-week period that begins on the earlier of,

(a) the first day of the week in which the certificate is issued; and

(b) the first day of the week in which the minor child or adult in respect of whom the certificate was issued became critically ill.

These subsections establish the latest date an employee can remain on critical illness leave; in other words, they set out the date the window for taking a critical illness leave closes. These subsections must be read in conjunction with the provisions that set out the maximum length of the leave, which is 37 weeks in relation to a minor child, and 17 weeks in relation to an adult. These subsections must also be read in conjunction with subsections (9) and (10), which establish the latest date an employee can remain on leave if the minor child or adult dies while the employee is on leave. In addition, regard should be had to subsections (14), (15) and (16); those subsections provide for further leaves if a critically ill minor child or adult remains critically ill.

Window for Taking Leave Closes on Last Day for Care/Support Set Out in Certificate – s. 49.4(8)

The general rule is that an employee's right to be on leave ends on the last day of the period the minor child or adult requires care or support as specified in the certificate issued by the qualified health practitioner.

If Care/Support is 52 Weeks or More: Window for Taking Leave Ends at End of 52nd Week – s. 49.4(9)

If the certificate states that the minor child or adult requires care or support for a period of 52 weeks or longer, the employee's right to be on leave ends on the last day of the 52-week period that starts the earlier of:

- The first day of the week the certificate was issued; and
- The first day of the week the minor child or adult became critically ill.

Example:

- A minor child became critically ill on Friday, February 8.
- A qualified health practitioner issued a certificate on Tuesday, February 12.
- The certificate stated that the child will require care or support indefinitely.

Pursuant to subsection (9), the employee's right to be on leave will end on the last day of the 52-week period that starts the first day of the week the child became critically ill.

The definition of a week is a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday (see s. 49.4(1)).

Accordingly:

- The first day of the week the minor child became critically ill is Sunday, February 3.
- The employee's right to be on leave ends on the last day of the 52-week period that starts Sunday, February 3.
- That day is the 52nd Saturday that follows Sunday, February 3, which will be Saturday, February 1 (in a non-leap year).

Note, however, that while the right to be on the leave ends on Saturday, February 1, the employee may qualify for an additional leave after the original leave ends, in accordance with subsection (16).

Death of Minor Child or Adult – s. 49.4(10)

49.4(10) If a critically ill minor child or adult dies while an employee is on a leave under this section, the employee's entitlement to be on leave under this section ends on the last day of the week in which the minor child or adult dies.

This subsection establishes the latest date an employee can be on critical illness leave if the critically ill minor child or adult for whom the leave was taken dies. In effect, it establishes an exception to the rules regarding the last day an employee can be on leave that are established by subsections (8) and (9).

Subsection (10) provides that if an employee is on critical illness leave and the minor child or adult dies, the employee's right to be on leave ends at the end of the week (which, in accordance with the definition of a week in s. 49.4(1), will be a Saturday) in which the person dies.

Note that if an employee's minor child dies, the employee will generally be entitled to take child death leave per s.49.5. In other cases, the employee may be entitled to take personal emergency leave if the individual who dies is an individual listed in s. 50(2).

Total Amount of Leave – Critically Ill Minor Child – s. 49.4(11)

49.4(11) The total amount of leave that may be taken by one or more employees under this section in respect of the same critically ill minor child is 37 weeks.

Total Amount of Leave – Critically Ill Adult – s. 49.4(12)

49.4(12) The total amount of leave that may be taken by one or more employees under this section in respect of the same critically ill adult is 17 weeks.

Sharing the Leave

Under subsection (11) and (12), the maximum amount of leave available to an employee or employees in respect of the same minor child or adult who is critically ill is 37 weeks in relation to a minor child, and 17 weeks in relation to an adult.

Where more than one employee takes critical illness leave with respect to the same person the 37 or 17 week maximum (whichever applies) has to be shared by the employees. The employees who are sharing the leave can be on leave at the same time, or at different times; the ESA 2000 does not impose any restrictions in this regard (the sharing requirement applies whether or not the employees work for the same employer).

The sharing requirement applies only where the two or more employees take leave under this section, i.e., s. 49.4 of the ESA 2000. An employee who takes a leave similar to critical illness leave pursuant to a contractual provision that provides a greater right than s. 49.4 (which thus prevails over s. 49.4 pursuant to s. 5(2) of the ESA 2000) is not taking leave under this section; therefore the amount of leave that employee takes does not reduce the amount of leave that other employees can take in respect of the same minor child or adult under s. 49.4.

Likewise, an employee who takes a leave similar to ESA 2000 critical illness leave pursuant to the employment standards legislation of another jurisdiction is not taking leave under this section. So, for example, if one family member of a critically ill minor child works in Ontario and the other family member works in, say, Manitoba, and they each take critical illness leave to care for the minor child pursuant to their respective provincial employment standards statutes, the Ontario employee has the full 37-week leave entitlement; they will not have to share the 37 weeks with the other family member.

Subsection (11) and (12) Do Not Displace Limits Set out in Subsections (4) or (7)

Note that in accordance with principles of statutory interpretation, s. 49.4 (11) and (12), like other subsections in s. 49.4, must be read within the context of s. 49.4 as a whole; it does not, therefore, displace the limits set out in s. 49.4(4) and (7). Section 49.4(4) states that if the certificate issued by the qualified health practitioner specifies the number of weeks the critically ill minor child will require care or support as a number less than 37, then it is that number of weeks of leave (and not 37 weeks) that the employee will be entitled to. S. 49.4(7) performs the same function for a certificate issued in relation to a critically ill adult that provides a lesser number of weeks than 17. Simply put, s. 49.4(11) and (12) do not give an employee or employees a longer period of leave than the period specified in the certificate where that period is less than 37 weeks for a minor child or 17 weeks for an adult.

Additional Leaves

Lastly, subsections (11) and (12) also apply with respect to any additional leaves taken under subsections (14) or (15). Subsection (14) allows for additional leaves of up to 37 weeks after each 52-week period described in subsection (9) for a minor child, if the eligibility criteria are met for a second, third, etc. time. Subsection (15) allows for additional leaves of up to 17 weeks after each 52-week period described in subsection (9) for an adult, if the eligibility criteria are met for a second, third, etc. time.

Subsection (13) below addresses the situation where a minor child turns 18 within 52 weeks of the certificate issuance and for whom the full 37 weeks of leave have not been taken.

Limitation Where Child Turns 18 – s. 49.4(13)

49.4(13) If an employee takes leave in respect of a critically ill minor child under subsection (2), the employee may not take leave in respect of the same individual under subsection (5) before the 52-week period described in subsection (9) expires.

This subsection addresses the scenario where an employee begins a leave in relation to a minor child who turns 18 before the full entitlement to the leave is taken. In this case, the employee will be entitled to take the full duration of the original 37-week leave, but will not be entitled to a leave under subsection (5) until the original limitation period established by subsection (9) has expired.

For example, if a certificate is issued under subsection (2) on Thursday, January 5th, the 52-week period described in subsection (9) will start on Sunday, January 1. If the minor child turns 18 on March 1, the employee remains entitled to take up to 37 weeks of leave within the 52-week period between January 1 and December 31. However, if the employee uses all 37 weeks by September 30, and the now-adult family member remains critically ill, the employee will have to wait until January 1 for a new certificate to be issued under subsection (5) and become entitled to a new leave of 17 weeks in relation to a critically ill adult.

Further Leave – Critically Ill Minor Child – s. 49.4(14)

49.4(14) If a minor child in respect of whom an employee has taken a leave under this section remains critically ill while the employee is on leave or after the employee returns to work, but before the 52-week period described in subsection (9) expires, the employee is entitled to take an extension of the leave or a new leave if,

(a) a qualified health practitioner issues an additional certificate described in subsection (2) for the minor child that sets out a different period during which the minor child requires care or support;

(b) the amount of leave that has been taken and the amount of leave the employer takes under this subsection does not exceed 37 weeks in total; and

(c) the leave ends no later than the last day of the 52-week period described in subsection (9).

In general terms, subsection (14) is meant to result in an appropriate solution where the health practitioner's certificate that was originally issued did not accurately predict (i.e. underestimated) the period during which the minor child would require care or support.

Subsection (14) addresses the situation where a minor child remains critically ill and requires care or support beyond the period specified in the certificate, but only up to the end of the 52-week period (subsection (16) addresses the situation where a minor child remains critically ill beyond the 52 weeks. In general terms, subsection (16) permits employees to take additional leaves of up to 37 weeks in subsequent 52-week periods).

This subsection – subsection (14) – addresses the situation in which:

- An employee wishes to extend their leave for a period longer than that which they originally intended to take because the minor child remains critically ill; or
- An employee who has returned to work at the end of their leave wishes to take a new leave because the minor child remains critically ill.

In this situation, s. 49.4(14) allows the employee to do so, subject to certain limitations:

- First, a qualified health practitioner must issue a subsequent certificate after the first certificate was issued setting out a care or support period that differs from the period set out in the first certificate. It will typically be just the end date of the care or support period that will be different in the subsequent certificate; there is no requirement that both the start date and the end date be different in order to meet this requirement (the rationale here, presumably, is that the period for which the employee originally planned to take leave was based on a certificate that had underestimated the length of the period for which the minor child would require care or support).
- Second, the total amount of leave taken must not exceed 37 weeks.
- Third, the leave must end no later than the last day of the 52-week period that begins on the earlier of (a) the first day of the week in which the first certificate was issued and (b) the first day of the week in which the minor child became critically ill*.

Child Turns 18 Before Subsequent Certificate Issued

An employee does not become ineligible for a further leave pursuant to subsection (14) solely because the minor child turned 18 before a subsequent certificate is issued.

Example:

- A health practitioner's certificate is issued stating that a child requires care or support from January 1 to February 1.
- The child turns 18 on January 15.
- He continues to require care or support on February 1, and a subsequent certificate is issued on February 1 stating that he requires care or support until June 1.

The employee in this situation will be entitled to a further leave, despite the fact that the individual in respect of whom the leave is being taken is 18 years old (and no longer falls within the definition of a minor child in s. 49.4) at the point the employee is qualifying for a further leave. Note that subsection (13) will not prevent an employee from becoming eligible to take further leave under subsection (14). As stated above, subsection (14) is meant to result in an appropriate solution where the health practitioner's certificate underestimated the period during which the child or children require care or support. Had the first certificate accurately predicted the period of care or support, the employee would have been eligible for leave until June 1. Note, however, that an employee will be ineligible for an additional leave pursuant to subsection (16) if the child is 18 years old at the time the employee is attempting to qualify for an additional leave. This is because subsection (16), unlike subsection (14), provides that “the requirements of this section apply” to the additional leave, and this includes the requirement that the individual in respect of whom the employee wants to take the leave meet the definition of minor child by being under 18 years of age. In that case, the employee could qualify for a new, shorter 17 week leave on the basis of a certificate issued pursuant to subsection (5), but the employee would need to wait until the original 52-week period started by the issuance of the most recent certificate had elapsed per subsection (13).

There is no limit to the number of extensions or new leaves an employee is entitled to under s. 49.4(14), but the subsection does limit the total number of weeks of leave that can be taken in the 52-week period to no more than 37 weeks and requires that the end of the leave or leaves be no later than the last day of the 52-week period that begins on the earlier of (a) the first day of the week in which the first certificate was issued and (b) the first day of the week in which the minor child became critically ill. Note, however, that this does not prevent an employee from taking additional leaves under subsection 49.4(16) after the 52-week period expires.

Example: Minor Child – Two Certificates Whose Periods Total 37 Weeks or Less

- A minor child became critically ill on January 1.
- A qualified health practitioner issued a certificate on January 1.
- The certificate stated that the child will require care or support for four weeks (until January 28).
- The child was still critically ill on January 28.
- A qualified health practitioner issued another certificate on January 29, stating that the child will require care or support for another four weeks (until February 25).
- The child was not critically ill beyond February 25.

In this scenario, the employee would be entitled to take critical illness leave pursuant to subsection (2) during the four week period of January 1 to January 28, and a "further" four-week leave pursuant to subsection (14) during the period January 29 to February 25.

This provides the employee the same entitlement they would have had if the first certificate accurately predicted the period the child would require care or support.

Example: Minor Child - Two Certificates Whose Periods Total Between 37 and 52 Weeks

- A minor child became critically ill on January 1.
- A qualified health practitioner issued a certificate on January 1.
- The certificate stated that the child will require care or support for 30 weeks (until July 29).
- The child was still critically ill on July 29.
- A qualified health practitioner issued another certificate on July 30, stating that the child will require care or support for another ten weeks (until October 6).
- The child was not critically ill beyond October 6.

In this scenario, the employee would be entitled to take critical illness leave pursuant to subsection (2) during the 30-week period January 1 to July 29, and a further leave pursuant to subsection (14) during the 10-week period July 30 to October 6. However, pursuant to paragraph (b) of subsection (14), the employee is only entitled to be on leave for a maximum of 37 weeks during that 40-week period.

_____

*This is the meaning of the reference in subsection 49.4(14) to the “52-week period described in subsection (9)”. It does not mean that the first certificate must have specified a care or support period of 52 weeks or longer. Among other things, this also means that if a medical certificate obtained by an employee specified a period of less than 37 weeks, but the employee then obtained a second medical certificate that specified a longer period than was specified in the first certificate, the employee could extend the leave or take a new leave, provided that the total amount of leave taken did not exceed 37 weeks and that the leave ends no later than the last day of the 52-week period that begins on the earlier of (a) the first day of the week in which the first certificate was issued and (b) the first day of the week in which the minor child became critically ill.

Further Leave – Critically Ill Adult – s. 49(15)

49.4(15) If an adult in respect of whom an employee has taken a leave under this section remains critically ill while the employee is on leave or after the employee returns to work, but before the 52-week period described in subsection (9) expires, the employee is entitled to take an extension of the leave or a new leave if,

> (a)a qualified health practitioner issues an additional certificate described in subsection (5) for the adult that sets out a different period during which the adult requires care or support;
>
> (b) the amount of leave that has been taken and the amount of leave the employee takes under this subsection does not exceed 17 weeks in total; and
>
> (c) the leave ends no later than the last day of the 52-week period described in subsection (9).

In general terms, subsection (15) is meant to result in an appropriate solution where the health practitioner's certificate that was originally issued did not accurately predict (i.e. underestimated) the period during which the adult would require care or support.

Subsection (15) addresses the situation where an adult remains critically ill and requires care or support beyond the period specified in the certificate, but only up to the end of the 52-week period. (Subsection (16) addresses the situation where an adult remains critically ill beyond the 52 weeks. In general terms, subsection (16) permits employees to take additional leaves of up to 17 weeks in subsequent 52-week periods).

This subsection - subsection (15) - addresses the situation in which:

- An employee wishes to extend their leave for a period longer than that which they originally intended to take because the adult remains critically ill; or
- An employee who has returned to work at the end of their leave wishes to take a new leave because the adult remains critically ill.

In this situation, s. 49.4(15) allows the employee to do so, subject to certain limitations:

- First, a qualified health practitioner must issue a subsequent certificate after the first certificate was issued setting out a care or support period that differs from the period set out in the first certificate. It will typically be just the end date of the care or support period that will be different in the subsequent certificate; there is no requirement that both the start date and the end date be different in order to meet this requirement (he rationale here, presumably, is that the period for which the employee originally planned to take leave was based on a certificate that had underestimated the length of the period for which the adult would require care or support).
- Second, the total amount of leave taken must not exceed 17 weeks.
- Third, the leave must end no later than the last day of the 52-week period that begins on the earlier of (a) the first day of the week in which the first certificate was issued and (b) the first day of the week in which the adult became critically ill.

There is no limit to the number of extensions or new leaves an employee is entitled to under s. 49.4(15), but the subsection does limit the total number of weeks of leave that can be taken in the 52-week period to no more than 17 weeks and requires that the end of the leave or leaves be no later than the last day of the 52-week period that begins on the earlier of (a) the first day of the week in which the first certificate was issued and (b) the first day of the week in which the adult became critically ill. Note, however, that this does not prevent an employee from taking additional leaves under subsection 49.4(16) after the 52-week period expires.

Example: Adult – Two Certificates Whose Periods Total 17 Weeks or Less

- An adult became critically ill on January 1.
- A qualified health practitioner issued a certificate on January 1.
- The certificate stated that the adult will require care or support for four weeks (until January 28).
- The adult was still critically ill on January 28.
- A qualified health practitioner issued another certificate on January 29, stating that the adult will require care or support for another four weeks (until February 25).
- The adult was not critically ill beyond February 25.

In this scenario, the employee would be entitled to take critical illness leave pursuant to subsection (5) during the four week period of January 1 to January 28, and a further four-week leave pursuant to subsection (15) during the period January 29 to February 25.

This provides the employee the same entitlement they would have had if the first certificate accurately predicted the period the child would require care or support.

Example: Adult – Two Certificates Whose Periods Total Between 17 and 52 Weeks

- An adult became critically ill on January 1.
- A qualified health practitioner issued a certificate on January 1.
- The certificate stated that the adult will require care or support for 10 weeks (until March 11).
- The adult was still critically ill on March 11.

- A qualified health practitioner issued another certificate on March 12, stating that the adult will require care or support for another ten weeks (until May 20).
- The adult was not critically ill beyond May 20.

In this scenario, the employee would be entitled to take critical illness leave pursuant to subsection (5) during the 10-week period January 1 to March 11, and a further leave pursuant to subsection (15) during the 10-week period March 12 to May 20. However, pursuant to paragraph (b) of subsection (15), the employee is only entitled to be on leave for a maximum of 17 weeks during that 20-week period.

Additional Leaves – s. 49.4(16)

49.4(16) If a minor child or adult in respect of whom an employee has taken a leave under this section remains critically ill after the 52-week period described in subsection (9) expires, the employee is entitled to take another leave and the requirements of this section apply to the new leave.

In general terms, this subsection addresses the situation where a minor child or adult is still critically ill 52 weeks or more after first developing a critical illness. It provides that employees are able to re-qualify for additional critical illness leave(s) of up to 37 weeks for a minor child or up to 17 weeks for an adult in subsequent 52-week periods.

Subsection (16) provides that if an employee took critically ill child care leave for a minor child or an adult, and the person remains critically ill after the end of the 52-week period described in subsection (9) (i.e., the 52-week period that begins on the earlier of (a) the first day of the week in which the first certificate was issued and (b) the first day of the week in which the minor child or adult became critically ill), the employee is entitled to take another critical illness leave if they again meet the requirements of s. 49.4 (see subsection (9) above for details regarding the 52-week period).

Note that if a minor child or adult that was critically ill develops a new critical illness, the employee will be entitled to another critically ill child care, critical illness leave. However, the entitlement will arise simply by virtue of meeting the qualifying condition in s. 49.4(2) or (5); the entitlement does not arise from subsection (13) (since it only applies to employees whose child remains critically ill) and, accordingly, the restrictions in subsection (13) as to the earliest date an additional leave may be taken do not apply with respect to a leave taken because of a new, subsequent critical illness. This means that, for example, if an employee who took leave for the first 37 weeks in a 52-week period to care for a minor child and then that same minor whose child develops developed a new critical illness in week 40 will, the employee would, assuming the qualifying criteria of subsection (2) are met, be entitled to begin a new leave as of week 40. There is no upper limit to the number of additional leaves an employee is entitled to under this subsection. After each 52-week period described above elapses, if the minor child or adult the employee has taken leave in relation to remains critically ill, then the employee may qualify for a fresh critical illness leave by again meeting the requirements of s. 49.4.

One of the requirements of s. 49.4(2) is that the individual in respect of whom the employee wants to take the leave is under 18 years of age. Accordingly, an employee is not eligible for an additional leave under that subsection if the individual in respect of whom the employee wants to take the leave is, at the time the eligibility for an additional leave is being assessed, already 18 years of age – in that case, the employee may qualify for a new leave under subsection (5) but will be subject to the requirements of subsection (13) However, an employee will be eligible for a further leave pursuant to subsection (14) even if the individual is 18 years at the time the employee is trying to qualify for a further leave. This is because, unlike subsection (16), subsection (14) does not provide that “the requirements of this section apply” to the further leave (see subsection (14) above).

Each additional leave an employee is entitled to is governed by the restrictions of s. 49.4 as they pertain to that additional leave. For example, the provisions regarding when the leave must end, what happens if a minor child or adult dies, the total amount of each leave in subsections (11) and (12), eligibility for a further leave under subsections (14) and (15) and eligibility for more additional leaves under subsection (16).

Note that subsections (11) and (12) apply each time an employee takes a leave under this section and any additional leaves must be shared if they are taken by more than one employee in relation to the same critically ill person. In other words, an employee is entitled to no more than 37 weeks of leave (for a minor child) or 17 weeks of leave (for an adult) with respect to the original leave and to no more than 37 or 17 weeks of leave with respect to each additional leave in subsequent 52 week periods. There is no cap on the number of leaves (each of which may be up to 37 or 17 weeks in a 52-week period) an employee may be entitled to.

Advising Employer – s. 49.4(17); Same – s. 49.4(18)

49.4(17) An employee who wishes to take a leave under this section shall advise their employer in writing that they will be doing so and shall provide the employer with a written plan that indicates the weeks in which they will take the leave.

(18) If an employee must begin a leave under this section before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it and shall provide the employer with a written plan that indicates the weeks in which they will take the leave.

S. 49.4(17) requires employees to advise their employers in writing before starting the leave that they will be taking critical illness leave. This subsection also requires employees to, before starting the leave, provide a written plan setting out the weeks in which the leave will be taken. Where employees will be taking some of the leave in single days, the requirement is that the written plan must indicate the weeks in which the leave will be taken; it need not indicate which days in those weeks.

In circumstances where the employee cannot advise the employer before the leave commences, the employee is required, pursuant to s. 49.4(18), to advise the employer (in writing) and provide the written plan as soon as possible after beginning the leave.

If an employee wants to take a leave at a time other than that indicated in the plan, the employee has to meet the requirements of subsection (19).

An employee does not lose their right to critical illness leave if they fail to comply with ss. 49.4(17) or (18). An employee's entitlement to critical illness leave arises by virtue of meeting the eligibility criteria in s. 49.4(2) or (5), and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins or the failure to provide a written plan does not negate that entitlement. This approach is consistent with the Program's long-standing policy for all leaves contained in Part XIV where the structures of the entitlement and notice provisions are similar to these. See for example ESA Part XIV, ss. 46(4) (pregnancy leave) and 48(4) (parental leave).

The question may arise as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy), where the time off is a critical illness leave under the ESA 2000. S. 49.4(18) provides that "if an employee must begin a leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it." It is thus clear that the ESA 2000 contemplates situations where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of starting the leave and that the employee nevertheless has a right to take leave in such situations (although the employee does have an obligation to advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it). On the other hand, the failure to give notice in advance of taking leave, when the employee could have done so, can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating s. 74. However, the following points should be borne in mind:

- The employee's failure to give advance notice or a written plan does not nullify the right to take the leave if the qualifying conditions in subsections 49.4(2) or (5) have been met (in other words, the failure to give advance notice does not have the result that the time taken off by the employee is not critical illness leave).
- An employer may impose discipline where the employee failed to provide written notice or a written plan before starting the leave in situations where the employee could have done so; however, the reason for the discipline must be because of the failure to give written notice or a written plan before starting the leave and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.
- Likewise, an employer may impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the leave or any written plan (before or after the start of the leave). Again, however, the reason for the discipline must be because of the failure to provide any notice or to provide any plan and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.

Same – Change in Employee's Plan – s. 49.4(19)

49.4(19) An employee may take a leave at a time other than that indicated in the plan provided under subsection (17) or (18) if the change to the time of the leave meets the requirements of this section and,

(a) the employee requests permission from the employer to do so in writing and the employer grants permission in writing; or

(b) the employee provides the employer with such written notice of the change as is reasonable in the circumstances.

This subsection provides that once an employee provides the employer with a written plan that indicates the weeks in which they will take the leave, as required by subsection (17) or (18), the employee is permitted to deviate from that plan only if:

- The employee asks for permission for the change in writing and the employer grants permission in writing; or
- The employee gives such written notice of the change as is reasonable in the circumstances. When determining what is reasonable in the circumstances, the circumstances of the both the employee and the employer are taken into account.

Examples of the employee's circumstances that may impact on how much advance notice of the change is reasonable include:

- The unpredictability of the progress of a minor child or adult's illness or injury that may have made it extremely difficult to establish with any certainty the dates of the leave; and
- The suddenness of any change in the minor child or adult's condition, whether for the better or for the worse.

An example of the employer's circumstances that may impact on how much advance notice of the change is reasonable is the cost and disruption of having to accommodate the change in plans, for example, if the employer hired a long-term replacement for an employee who originally advised he would be on leave for 37 consecutive weeks but now wishes to return to work after 15 weeks and alternate weeks of leave with weeks at work, the amount of advance notice of the change required would be greater than if the employer had not hired a replacement.

It is the Program's position that the employer can refuse to allow the employee to deviate from the dates provided in the original written plan if neither condition set out in clause (a) or (b) are met.

The requirements of these subsections apply whenever the employee is deviating from the plan. This includes, for example, situations where the employee gave the employer a written plan that advised that she will be on leave for the next two weeks, but which was silent about any other dates or advised that more leave would be taken in the future but that the dates are yet unknown and will be provided in the future. Taking leave beyond those initial two weeks is a change in the employee's plan; accordingly, the requirements of paragraph (a) or (b) will apply.

An employee can make multiple changes to their written plan, so long as they meet the requirements of paragraph (a) or (b) each time.

Subsection (19) does not apply if the change to the dates of the leave is required by the ESA 2000 itself. For example, if the employee advised the employer that he would be on leave for 37 consecutive weeks but the minor child dies in the 15th week, the ESA 2000 (s. 49.4(10)) provides that the leave ends at the end of the week in which the minor child dies. The employee is entitled to return to work at the end of that week - the employee does not have to meet the requirements of subsection (19) in order to return to work at the end of that week.

Copy of Certificate – s. 49.4(20)

49.4(20) If requested by the employer, the employee shall provide the employer with a copy of the certificate referred to in subsection (2) or (5) or clause 14(a) or 15(a) as soon as possible.

This section provides that if the employer asks the employee for a copy of the s. 49.4(2), (5), (14) or (15) certificate (i.e., a certificate issued by a qualified health practitioner that states that a minor child or an adult is a critically ill minor child or adult who requires care or support and that sets out the period during which the person requires the care or support), the employee is required to provide it as soon as possible.

This subsection applies to all of the certificates referred to in section 49.4. For example, if an employee takes a further leave under subsections (14) or (15) or an additional leave under subsection (16) and accordingly obtained a second, third, fourth, etc. certificate, the employee is required to provide the employer with a copy of any subsequent certificate that is requested by the employer.

An employee's failure to provide a copy of the certificate does not disentitle them to critical illness leave. It is the Program's view that the requirement to provide a copy of the certificate is not a condition precedent to the entitlement to critical illness leave; the conditions for entitlement are set out in s. 49.4(2) and (5).

However, as provided in s. 49.4(2) and (5), in order to be entitled to the leave, the employee must obtain a certificate. In other words, while the failure to provide a copy of the certificate to the employer does not disentitle the employee, a failure to have obtained the required certificate will do so.

That is not to say the leave cannot begin before the certificate is obtained. If the employee has not obtained a certificate before commencing the leave, they may do so at a later date and thereby retroactively qualify for the leave. If, for example, an employer penalizes an employee on the basis that they did not have a certificate prior to commencing the leave, such conduct would constitute a reprisal if the employee subsequently obtained the certificate.

s. 49.4(21) – REPEALED

Transition – s. 49.4(22)

49.4(22) If a certificate mentioned in subsection (2) or (12), as those subsections read immediately before the day section 26 of Schedule 1 to the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 came into force, was issued before that day, then this section, as it read immediately before that day, applies.

The current critical illness leave provisions came into force on December 3, 2017. Prior to this date, section 49.4 was titled “critically ill child care leave” and only employees whose own children were critically ill were eligible for a leave of up to 37 weeks if a qualified health practitioner issued the appropriate certificate.

If an employee has a certificate issued by a qualified health practitioner to support critically ill child care leave, and the certificate was issued before December 3, 2017, then the employee’s leave will be governed by the provisions of section 49.4 as they existed before that day. Note that the employee will be bound by the provisions of the previous leave even if the certificate had been issued, but the employee had not yet commenced the leave on December 3, 2017.

ESA Part XIV Section 49.5 – Child Death Leave

Child death leave came into force on January 1, 2018 as a result of the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 22 which amended the ESA 2000. The ESA 2000 previously provided a crime-related child death or disappearance leave, which entitled employees who were parents of a child who had disappeared or who died as a probable result of a crime to a leave of absence. If the child of the employee had died as the probable result of crime, the employee was entitled to 104 weeks of leave. If the child of the employee had disappeared as the probable result of a crime, the employee was entitled to 52 weeks of leave. If the child who had disappeared as the probable result of crime was subsequently found dead, the employee was then entitled to 104 weeks of leave running from the time the employee began the original leave.

Child death leave provides the same entitlements for a child’s death as the previous crime-related child death or disappearance leave, although there is no longer a requirement that the child died as a result of (or as a probable result of) a crime. In other words, child death leave can be taken in respect of the death of an employee’s child, no matter the circumstances of the death. Please see s. 49.5(12) below for transitional information relating to a crime-related child death leave that commenced before January 1, 2018.

Definitions – s. 49.5(1)

49.5(1) In this section,

"child" means a child, step-child, foster child or child who is under legal guardianship, and who is under 18 years of age;

"crime" means an offence under the Criminal Code (Canada), other than an offence prescribed by the regulations made under paragraph 209.4 (f) of the Canada Labour Code (Canada);

"week" means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

This section contains definitions of three terms that are used in the child death leave provisions.

Child

For the purpose of the child death leave provisions, a child is the employee's child (which includes an adopted child, even if the adoption proceedings have not been finalized), step-child, foster child or child for whom the employee has been appointed as a legal guardian and who is under 18 years of age.

Crime

An employee is not entitled to a leave if the child's death was the result of a crime and the employee has been charged with a crime in relation to the death. Additionally, the employee will not be entitled to a leave if it is probable, considering the circumstances, that the child was a party to a crime in relation to their own death.

"Crime" is defined to mean an offence under the federal Criminal Code, other than offences that are prescribed by regulations that are made under s. 209.4(f) of the Canada Labour Code, RSC 1985, c L-2.

The Canada Labour Code provides for a crime-related child death or disappearance leave if it is probable, considering the circumstances, that the child's death or disappearance was as a result of a crime. Note that the federal leave is similar to the previous crime-related child death or disappearance leave under the ESA 2000. The Canada Labour Code defines crime as an offence under the Criminal Code, and provides that regulations may be made under the Canada Labour Code to exclude some Criminal Code offences from the definition of crime. Any offences that are excluded from the *Canada Labour Code'*s definition of crime through a regulation made under s. 209.4(f) of the Canada Labour Code are similarly excluded from the ESA 2000's definition of crime for the purposes of s. 49.5.

Week

"Week" means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday. For the purposes of child death leave, week will always be Sunday to Saturday, even if the employer's work week is different.

Entitlement to Leave – s. 49.5(2)

49.5(2) An employee who has been employed by an employer for at least six consecutive months is entitled to a leave of absence without pay of up to 104 weeks if a child of the employee dies.

Subsection 49.5(2) provides an entitlement for an employee who has been employed by their employer for at least six consecutive months to a leave of absence without pay if the employee's child dies. The employee may take a leave of up to 104 weeks.

The question has arisen as to whether an employee who has experienced a still-birth would be entitled to take child death leave. Given that still-births are legally distinct and treated differently than live births and deaths under the Vital Statistics Act (i.e. in the province of Ontario, per Regulation 1094 of the Vital Statistics Act, a death certificate is not issued in the case of a still-birth), it's Program policy that the answer is no. As such, it is Program policy that an employee would not be eligible to take child death leave in this circumstance. Note, though, that the employee who had the still-birth would – if the stillbirth occurred no more than 17 weeks before the due date – be entitled to take pregnancy leave (which would end either 17 weeks after the leave began, or 12 weeks after the still-birth, whichever day is later – see s. 47(1)(b). The employee may also be eligible for Sick Leave. Other employees may also be eligible for other leave entitlements – e.g. an employee who is a family member of the employee who had the still-birth may be eligible for Family Responsibility Leave to provide care for the employee who had the still-birth if the eligibility criteria for that leave are met.

Exception – s. 49.5(3)

49.5(3) An employee is not entitled to a leave of absence under this section if the employee is charged with a crime in relation to the death of the child or if it is probable, considering the circumstances, that the child was a party to a crime in relation to his or her death.

Subsection 49.5(3) provides that there is no entitlement to a leave under s. 49.5 if:

- The employee is charged with a crime in relation to the child's death; or
- It is probable, considering the circumstances, that the child was a party to a crime in relation to their death.

Single Period – s. 49.5(4)

49.5(4) An employee may take a leave under this section only in a single period.

Subsection 49.5(4) provides that an employee can take a leave under s. 49.5 only in one single period. A return to work prior to the expiry of the maximum length of the leave would end the entitlement to the leave.

Limitation Period – s. 49.5(5)

49.5(5) An employee may take a leave under this section only during the 105-week period that begins in the week the child dies.

Subsection 49.5(5) provides that the entitlement of up to 104 weeks of leave available under s. 49.5(2) because of the death of a child can be taken only during the 105-week period that begins in the week the child died.

Total Amount of Leave – s. 49.5(6)

49.5(6) The total amount of leave that may be taken by one or more employees under this section in respect of a death, or deaths that are the result of the same event, is 104 weeks.

Under s. 49.5(6), the maximum amount of leave available to an employee or employees in respect of the same child, or children who died as the result of the same event, is 104 weeks.

Sharing the Leave

Where more than one employee takes leave under s. 49.5(2) because of the death of the same child - or the same children who died as the result of the same event - the 104 week maximum has to be shared by the employees. The employees who are sharing the leave can be on leave at the same time, or at different times; the ESA 2000 does not impose any restrictions in this regard. The sharing requirement applies whether or not the employees work for the same employer.

The sharing requirement applies only where the two or more employees take leave under this section, i.e., s. 49.5 of the ESA 2000. An employee who takes a leave similar to child death leave pursuant to a contractual provision that provides a greater right than s. 49.5, which thus prevails over s. 49.5 under ESA Part III, s. 5(2), is not taking leave under this section; therefore, the amount of leave that employee takes does not reduce the amount of leave that other employees can take in respect of the same child under s. 49.5. Likewise, an employee who takes a leave similar to ESA 2000 child death leave under the employment standards legislation of another jurisdiction is not taking leave under s. 49.5. Thus, if one parent of a child who has died works in Ontario and the other parent works in, say, Manitoba, and they each take child death leave pursuant to their respective employment standards statutes, the Ontario employee has the full 104-week entitlement; they will not have to share the entitlement with the other parent.

Advising Employer – s. 49.5(7); Same – s. 49.5(8)

49.5(7) An employee who wishes to take a leave under this section shall advise the employer in writing and shall provide the employer with a written plan that indicates the weeks in which the employee will take the leave.

(8) If an employee must begin a leave under this section before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it and shall provide the employer with a written plan that indicates the weeks in which the employee will take the leave.

Subsection 49.5(7) requires employees to advise their employers in writing that they will be taking child death leave, and to provide a written plan setting out the weeks in which the leave will be taken.

This subsection must be read in conjunction with s. 49.5(4), which establishes that a leave under s. 49.5 can be taken only in a single period. In other words, they must provide the start and end dates for the leave.

In circumstances where the employee cannot advise the employer before the leave commences, the employee is required, pursuant to s. 49.5(8), to advise the employer in writing as soon as possible after beginning the leave and to provide the written plan setting out the weeks in which the leave will be taken.

If an employee wants to take a leave at a time other than that indicated in the plan, the employee has to meet the requirements of s. 49.5(9).

An employee does not lose their right to child death leave if they fail to comply with ss. 49.5(7) or (8). An employee's entitlement to child death leave arises by virtue of meeting the eligibility criteria in s. 49.5(2), and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins, or the failure to provide a written plan, does not negate that entitlement. This approach is consistent with the Program's long-standing policy for all leaves contained in Part XIV where the structures of the entitlement and notice provisions are similar to these. See for example ESA Part XIV, s. 46(4) and s. 48(4).

The question may arise as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy) where the time off is a child death leave under the ESA 2000. Section 49.5(8) provides that "if an employee must begin a leave . . . before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it." It is clear that the ESA 2000 contemplates situations where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of starting the leave and that the employee nevertheless has a right to take leave in such situations, although the employee does have an obligation to advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it. On the other hand, the failure to give notice in advance of taking leave, when the employee could have done so, can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating ESA Part XVIII, s. 74. However, the following points should be borne in mind:

- The employee's failure to give advance notice or a written plan does not nullify the right to take the leave if the qualifying conditions in ss. 49.5(2) have been met. In other words, the failure to give advance notice does not have the result that the time taken off by the employee is not child death leave.
- An employer may impose discipline where the employee failed to provide written notice or a written plan before starting the leave in situations where the employee could have done so; however, the reason for the discipline must be because of the failure to give written notice or a written plan before starting the leave and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.
- Likewise, an employer may impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the leave or any written plan (before or after the start of the leave); however, the reason for the discipline must be because of the failure to provide any notice or to provide any plan and not because the employee exercised their right to take leave.

Same – Change in Employee's Plan – s. 49.5(9)

49.5(9) An employee may take a leave at a time other than that indicated in the plan provided under subsection (7) or (8) if the change to the time of the leave meets the requirements of this section and,

(a) the employee requests permission from the employer to do so in writing and the employer grants permission in writing; or

(b) the employee provides the employer with four weeks written notice before the change is to take place.

Subsection 49.5(9) provides that once an employee provides the employer with a written plan that indicates the weeks in which they will take the leave, as required by ss. 49.5(7) or (8), the employee is permitted to deviate from that plan only if:

a) The employee asks for permission for the change in writing and the employer grants permission in writing; or

b) The employee gives written notice of the change four weeks before the change is to take place.

It is the Program's position that the employer can refuse to allow the employee to deviate from the dates provided in the original written plan if neither condition set out in clause (a) or (b) are met.

An employee can make multiple changes to their written plan, so long as they meet the requirements of paragraph (a) or (b) each time.

This subsection must be read in conjunction with s. 49.5(4), which requires that leave under s. 49.5 can be taken only in a single period.

Evidence – s. 49.5(10)

49.5(10) An employer may require an employee who takes a leave under this section to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances of the employee's entitlement to the leave.

This provision gives an employer some ability to require an employee to provide proof that they are or were entitled to take child death leave. The employer can require an employee to provide evidence that is reasonable in the circumstances that they are or were entitled to take the leave, for example, a death certificate.

s. 49.5(11) – REPEALED

Transition – s. 49.5(12)

49.5(12) If, on December 31, 2017, an employee was on a crime-related child death or disappearance leave under this section, as it is read on that date, then the employee's entitlement to the leave continues in accordance with this section as it read on that date.

If an employee was on a crime-related child death or disappearance leave on December 31, 2017, the employee does not lose the right to continue that leave; an employee in that situation would continue on the leave in accordance with the provisions as they read on that date.

ESA Part XIV Section 49.6 – Crime-Related Child Disappearance Leave

Definitions – s. 49.6(1)

49.6(1) In this section,

"child" means a child, step-child, foster child or child who is under legal guardianship, and who is under 18 years of age;

"crime" means an offence under the Criminal Code (Canada), other than an offence prescribed by the regulations made under paragraph 209.4 (f) of the Canada Labour Code (Canada);

"week" means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday.

This section contains definitions of three terms that are used in the crime-related child disappearance leave provisions.

Child

For the purpose of the crime-related child disappearance leave provisions, a child is the employee's child (which includes an adopted child, even if the adoption proceedings have not been finalized), step-child, foster child, or child for whom the employee has been appointed as a legal guardian, and who is under 18 years of age.

Crime

Employees are entitled to a leave only if, among other things, it is probable, considering the circumstances, that the child's disappearance was the "result of a crime".

Crime is defined to mean an offence under the federal Criminal Code, other than offences that are prescribed by regulations that are made under s. 209.4(f) of the Canada Labour Code, RSC 1985, c L-2.

Like the Employment Standards Act, 2000, the Canada Labour Code provides for a crime-related child disappearance leave if it is probable, considering the circumstances, that the child's disappearance was as a result of a crime. The Canada Labour Code defines crime as an offence under the Criminal Code, and provides that regulations may be made under the Canada Labour Code to exclude some Criminal Code offences from the definition of crime. Any offences that are excluded from the *Canada Labour Code'*s definition of crime through a regulation made under s. 209.4(f) of the Canada Labour Code are similarly excluded from the ESA 2000's definition of crime for the purposes of s. 49.6.

Week

Week means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday. For the purposes of crime-related disappearance leave, week will always be Sunday to Saturday, even if the employer's work week is different.

Entitlement to Leave – Disappearance of Child – s. 49.6(2)

49.6(2) An employee who has been employed by an employer for at least six consecutive months is entitled to a leave of absence without pay of up to 104 weeks if a child of the employee disappears and it is probable, considering the circumstances, that the child disappeared as a result of a crime.

This subsection provides an entitlement for an employee who has been employed by their employer for at least six consecutive months to a leave of absence without pay if the employee's child disappears and it is probable, considering the circumstances, that the child disappeared as a result of a crime. The employee may take a leave of up to 104 weeks.

Crime is a defined term: see s. 49.6(1) above for details.

Transition – s. 49.6(3)

Despite subsection (2), if the disappearance occurred before January 1, 2018, the employee is entitled to a leave of absence without pay in accordance with section 49.5 as it read on December 31, 2017.

The crime-related child disappearance leave provisions came into force on January 1, 2018 as a result of the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, which amended the ESA 2000 by dividing the previously existing crime-related child death or disappearance leave into two separate leaves: crime-related child disappearance leave and child death leave. Under the previous crime-related child death or disappearance leave, an employee whose child disappeared as the likely result of a crime was entitled to a leave of 52 weeks. Under the new crime-related child disappearance leave, a leave may be taken for up to 104 weeks.

If the disappearance of a child, which triggers the leave entitlement, occurred prior to January 1, 2018, the employee is entitled to a leave of up to 52 weeks. If the disappearance of a child, which triggers the leave entitlement, occurs on or after January 1, 2018 the employee is entitled to a leave of up to 104 weeks pursuant to s. 49.6(2). Any employee who was on crime-related child disappearance leave as of December 31, 2017 will be entitled to complete the remaining period of the leave (to a maximum of 52 weeks).

Exception – s. 49.6(4), Change in Circumstance – s. 49.6(5)

49.6(4) An employee is not entitled to a leave of absence under this section if the employee is charged with the crime or if it is probable, considering the circumstances, that the child was a party to the crime.

(5) If an employee takes a leave of absence under this section and the circumstances that made it probable that the child of the employee disappeared as a result of a crime change and it no longer seems probable that the child disappeared as a result of a crime, the employee's entitlement to leave ends on the day on which it no longer seems probable.

Subsection 49.6(4) provides that there is no entitlement to a leave under this section if:

- The employee is charged with the crime that is the cause of the child's disappearance; or
- It is probable, considering the circumstances, that the child was a party to the crime that caused their disappearance.

Subsection 49.6(5) provides that if an employee started a leave under s. 49.6 but it subsequently no longer seems probable that the child's disappearance was a result of a crime, the entitlement to leave ends on the day on which it no longer seems probable.

Child Found – s. 49.6(6); Same – s. 49.6(7)

49.6(6) The following rules apply if an employee takes a leave of absence under this section and the child is found within the 104-week period that begins in the week the child disappears:

1. If the child is found alive, the employee is entitled to remain on leave for 14 days after the child is found.

2. If the child is found dead, the employee's entitlement to be on leave under this section ends at the end of the week in which the child is found.

(6) For greater certainty, nothing in paragraph 2 of subsection (6) affects the employee's eligibility for child death leave under section 49.5.

These subsections establish the entitlements where a leave is taken because of the crime-related disappearance of the child and the child is subsequently found.

If the child is found alive in the 104-week period that begins the week the child disappeared, the employee is entitled to remain on leave for 14 days after the day the child is found.

If the child is found dead in the 104-week period that begins the week the child disappeared, the employee is no longer entitled to remain on leave past the end of the week in which the child is found. Note that week is defined in s. 49.6(1). However, s. 49.6(7) explicitly states that the employee's entitlement to Child Death Leave per s. 49.5 is unaffected by the previous leave taken. So, the employee may be eligible to begin a leave under s. 49.5. Section 49.5 contains provisions requiring the employee to give notice to the employer of their intention to take the leave; however, if the employee cannot give written notice in advance of taking the leave, notice can be given as soon as possible after beginning it. Failure to do so will not disentitle the employee to the leave.

Single Period – s. 49.6(8)

49.6(8) An employee may take a leave under this section only in a single period.

Subsection 49.6(8) provides that an employee can take a leave under s. 49.6 only in one single period. A return to work prior to the expiry of the maximum length of the leave would end the entitlement to the leave.

Limitation Period – s. 49.6(9)

49.6(9) Except as otherwise provided for in subsection (8), an employee may take a leave under this section only during the 105-week period that begins in the week the child disappears.

This subsection provides that, subject to s. 49.6(8), the entitlement of up to 104 weeks of leave available because of the crime-related disappearance of a child can be taken only during the 105-week period that begins in the week the child disappeared. Note that the term week is defined for the purposes of this provision in s. 49.6(1).

Total Amount of Leave – s. 49.6(10)

49.6(10) The total amount of leave that may be taken by one or more employees under this section in respect of a disappearance, or disappearances that are the result of the same event, is 104 weeks.

Sharing the Leave

Under s. 49.6(10), the maximum amount of leave available to an employee - or employees - in respect of the same child, or children who disappeared as the result of the same event, is 104 weeks.

Where more than one employee takes a leave because of the crime-related disappearance of the same child – or the same children who disappeared as the result of the same event – the 104 week maximum has to be shared by the employees. The employees who are sharing the leave can be on leave at the same time, or at different times; the ESA 2000 does not impose any restrictions in this regard. The sharing requirement applies whether or not the employees work for the same employer.

The sharing requirement applies only where the two or more employees take leave "under this section" i.e., s. 49.6 of the ESA 2000. An employee who takes a leave similar to crime-related child disappearance leave pursuant to a contractual provision that provides a greater right than s. 49.6, which thus prevails over s. 49.6 under ESA Part III, s. 5(2), is not taking leave under this section; therefore, the amount of leave that employee takes does not reduce the amount of leave that other employees can take in respect of the same child under s. 49.6. Likewise, an employee who takes a leave similar to ESA 2000 crime-related child disappearance leave under the employment standards legislation of another jurisdiction is not taking leave under s. 49.6. Thus, if one parent of a child who has disappeared as a probable result of crime works in Ontario and the other parent works in, say, Manitoba, and they each take crime-related disappearance leave pursuant to their respective employment standards statutes, the Ontario employee has the full 104-week entitlement; they will not have to share the entitlement with the other parent.

Advising Employer – s. 49.6(11); Same – s. 49.6(12)

49.6(11) An employee who wishes to take a leave under this section shall advise the employer in writing and shall provide the employer with a written plan that indicates the weeks in which the employee will take the leave.

(12) If an employee must begin a leave under this section before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it and shall provide the employer with a written plan that indicates the weeks in which the employee will take the leave.

Section 49.6(11) requires employees to advise their employers that they will be taking crime-related child disappearance leave, and to provide a written plan setting out the weeks in which the leave will be taken.

This subsection must be read in conjunction with s. 49.6(9), which establishes when the leave may be taken and s. 49.6(8), that provides the leave must be taken only in a single period.

In circumstances where the employee cannot advise the employer before the leave commences, the employee is required, pursuant to s. 49.6(12), to advise the employer in writing as soon as possible after beginning the leave and to provide the written plan setting out the weeks in which the leave will be taken.

If an employee wants to take a leave at a time other than that indicated in the plan, the employee has to meet the requirements of s. 49.6(13).

An employee does not lose their right to crime-related child disappearance leave if they fail to comply with ss. 49.6(11) or (12). An employee's entitlement to crime-related child disappearance leave arises by virtue of meeting the eligibility criteria in s. 49.6(2), and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins, or the failure to provide a written plan, does not negate that entitlement. This approach is consistent with the Program's long-standing policy for all leaves contained in Part XIV where the structures of the entitlement and notice provisions are similar to these. See for example ESA Part XIV, s. 46(4) and s. 48(4).

The question may arise as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy) where the time off is a crime-related child disappearance leave under the ESA 2000. Section 49.6(12) provides that "if an employee must begin a leave . . . before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it." It is clear that the ESA 2000 contemplates situations where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of starting the leave and that the employee nevertheless has a right to take leave in such situations (although the employee does have an obligation to advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it). On the other hand, the failure to give notice in advance of taking leave, when the employee could have done so, can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating s. 74. However, the following points should be borne in mind:

1. The employee's failure to give advance notice or a written plan does not nullify the right to take the leave if the qualifying conditions in s. 49.6(2) have been met. In other words, the failure to give advance notice does not have the result that the time taken off by the employee is not crime-related child disappearance leave.
2. An employer may impose discipline where the employee failed to provide written notice or a written plan before starting the leave in situations where the employee could have done so; however, the reason for the discipline must be because of the failure to give written notice or a written plan before starting the leave and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.
3. Likewise, an employer may impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the leave or any written plan (before or after the start of the leave); however, the reason for the discipline must be because of the failure to provide any notice or to provide any plan and not because the employee exercised their right to take leave.

Same – Change in Employee's Plan – s. 49.6(13)

49.6(13) An employee may take a leave at a time other than that indicated in the plan provided under subsection (11) or (12) if the change to the time of the leave meets the requirements of this section and,

(a) the employee requests permission from the employer to do so in writing and the employer grants permission in writing; or

(b) the employee provides the employer with four weeks written notice before the change is to take place.

This subsection establishes that once an employee provides the employer with a written plan indicating the weeks in which they will take the leave, as required by ss. 49.6(11) or (12), the employee is permitted to deviate from that plan only if:

a. The employee asks for permission for the change in writing and the employer grants permission in writing; or
b. The employee gives written notice of the change four weeks before the change is to take place.

It is the Program's position that the employer can refuse to allow the employee to deviate from the dates provided in the original written plan if neither condition set out in clause (a) or (b) are met.

An employee can make multiple changes to their written plan, so long as they meet the requirements of paragraph (a) or (b) each time.

This subsection must be read in conjunction with s. 49.6(8), which requires that leave under s. 49.6 can be taken only in a single period.

Evidence – s. 49.6(14)

49.6(14) An employer may require an employee who takes a leave under this section to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances of the employee's entitlement to the leave.

This provision gives an employer some ability to require an employee to provide proof that they are or were entitled to take crime-related child disappearance leave. The employer can require an employee to provide evidence that is reasonable in the circumstances that they are or were entitled to take the leave.

s. 49.6(15) – REPEALED

ESA Part XIV Section 49.7 – Domestic or Sexual Violence Leave

The domestic or sexual violence leave provisions came into force on January 1, 2018 as a result of the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017, which amended the ESA 2000. The intention of the section is to provide job-protected leave of up to 10 days and 15 weeks per calendar year to an employee for particular enumerated purposes if the employee or the employee's child has experienced or been threatened with domestic or sexual violence.

Definitions – s. 49.7(1)

49.7 (1) In this section,

"child" means a child, step-child, foster child or child who is under legal guardianship, and who is under 18 years of age.

"week" means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on Sunday and ending on Saturday. ("semaine")

This subsection contains two definitions of terms used in s. 49.7

For the purposes of the domestic violence or sexual violence leave provisions, a "child" means someone who is under 18 years of age and who is the employee's child (which includes an adopted child, even if the adoption proceedings have not been finalized), step-child, foster child, or child who is under the employee's legal guardianship.

Note this is the same definition of child used for the purposes of child death leave in ESA Part XIV, s. 49.5(1) and crime-related child disappearance leave in ESA Part XIV, s. 49.6(1).

In order to be considered a child for the purpose of entitlements to domestic or sexual violence leave, the child must be under 18 years of age when they experienced or were threatened with domestic or sexual violence, and when the employee takes the leave for any of the enumerated purposes if the leave is being taken in relation to the child.

"Week" means a period of seven consecutive days beginning on a Sunday and ending on a Saturday. For the purposes of s. 49.7, week will always be Sunday to Saturday even if the employer's work week is different.

Entitlement to Leave – s. 49.7(2)

49.7(2) An employee who has been employed by an employer for at least 13 consecutive weeks is entitled to a leave of absence if the employee or a child of the employee experiences domestic or sexual violence, or the threat of domestic or sexual violence, and the leave of absence is taken for any of the following purposes:

1. To seek medical attention for the employee or the child of the employee in respect of a physical or psychological injury or disability caused by the domestic or sexual violence.

2. To obtain services from a victim services organization for the employee or the child of the employee.

3. To obtain psychological or other professional counselling for the employee or the child of the employee.

4. To relocate temporarily or permanently.

5. To seek legal or law enforcement assistance, including preparing for or participating in any civil or criminal legal proceeding related to or resulting from the domestic or sexual violence.

6. Such other purposes as may be prescribed.

This subsection provides for an entitlement to domestic or sexual violence leave if the eligibility requirements set out in the provision are met.

Employed by an employer for at least 13 consecutive weeks

To be eligible for a domestic or sexual violence leave, the employee must have been employed by the same employer for a minimum of 13 weeks before taking the leave. It is not necessary that the employee have been actively working, so long as they were an employee during this time. For example, the employee could have been off receiving short-term disability benefits, on vacation, or on lay-off, or on a statutory leave during this period.

Employee or their child experiences domestic or sexual violence, or the threat of it

In order to be eligible for this leave, either the employee or the employee's child must have experienced or been threatened with sexual or domestic violence. It is Program policy that an employee will be eligible to take the leave even if the incident or threat of domestic or sexual violence occurred prior to January 1, 2018, the coming into force date of this provision, as long as the eligibility requirements (such as length of employment, etc.) are satisfied.

"Domestic or sexual violence" is not a defined term.

However, as a guideline, domestic violence may include physical, emotional or psychological abuse or an act of coercion, stalking, harassment or financial control. A threat of such abuse is also covered by this provision.It may be committed by an employee's current or former spouse or intimate partner, or between an individual and a child who resides with the individual or between an individual and an adult or child who is related to the individual by blood, marriage, foster care or adoption.

Sexual violence can include acts such as sexual assault, harassment, stalking, indecent exposure, voyeurism, sexual exploitation and sexual solicitation. It can be committed by anyone, whether or not they have any relationship to the employee. A threat of sexual violence is also covered by this provision.

It is Program policy to take an employee's statement that domestic or sexual violence has occurred or was threatened at face value. In other words, an employment standards officer need not "look behind" the statement to determine whether the violence actually occurred or was threatened. However, note that an employer is entitled to request evidence reasonable in the circumstances to support an employee's right to take domestic or sexual violence leave for specific defined purposes.

Leave of absence is taken for any of the following purposes:

1. To seek medical attention for the employee or the child of the employee in respect of a physical or psychological injury or disability caused by the domestic or sexual violence;
2. To obtain services from a victim services organization for the employee or the child of the employee;
3. To obtain psychological or other professional counselling for the employee or the child of the employee;
4. To relocate temporarily or permanently;
5. To seek legal or law enforcement assistance, including preparing for or participating in any civil or criminal legal proceeding related to or resulting from the domestic or sexual violence;
6. Such other purposes as may be prescribed.

In order to be eligible for a domestic or sexual violence leave, the leave must be taken for one or more of the specific purposes listed in this subsection.

In other words, even though the employee or the employee's child may have experienced or been threatened with domestic or sexual violence, the employee will not be entitled to take the leave unless it is taken for at least one of the purposes set out above.

Note that in some cases, a single period of leave may be taken for multiple purposes (i.e., counselling provided by a rape crisis centre could be considered to fall under both paragraphs 2 and 3 below). An employee may also take more than one period of leave for a single purpose, for example to attend weekly psychological counselling sessions. And lastly, an employee may take different periods of leave for different purposes, for example to seek medical attention at one point, and to seek legal assistance or participate in a Family Court or criminal trial at a later point in time.

Finally, it should also be noted that where an employee is entitled to take domestic violence or sexual violence leave, the employee (within the constraints imposed under this section) has the right to determine when or if to commence the leave. In other words, the employer does not have the right to schedule a leave for the employee. The employee's right also effectively overrides an employer's right to schedule vacation.

As per ESA Part XI, ss. 35 and 35.1, an employer is otherwise entitled to schedule the employee's vacation time, subject to the limits created by those sections. The Program's policy concerning an employee's right to choose when to commence a leave (within the parameters of that specific leave) is consistent with ESA Part XIV, s. 51.1, which applies where there is a conflict between an employer's obligation to schedule vacation within the time limits set out within the ESA 2000 or where vacation entitlements would be lost under a contract of employment, because of a Part XIV leave. In accordance with that section, any vacation that would otherwise be lost is deferred to the end of the leave.

Seek medical attention

An employee or their child may need medical attention as a result of physical or psychological injury sustained during an act or threat of domestic or sexual violence. In some cases, there may be an initial treatment and then a follow up visits or treatments at a later date. Medical attention would include, for example, any medical consultation, medical treatment, dental care, rehabilitative therapies such as physiotherapy, massage therapy or chiropractic treatments and consultation with a counsellor, psychologist or psychiatrist as long as the consultations/treatments were related to an original injury caused by domestic or sexual violence.

Obtain services from a victim services organization

Services from organizations that assist victims may be provided over a short period of time for initial intake, making referrals, assessment or treatment or longer periods to provide ongoing counselling or assistance with relocation or other practical needs arising from an incident or threat of domestic or sexual violence. For example, meeting with staff at a local shelter to arrange accommodations would be captured under this paragraph. Note, though, that, pursuant to Program Policy, simply residing in a domestic violence shelter, while itself a service contemplated under this paragraph would generally not be considered an act of "obtaining" such a service. Ongoing residency therefore would not generally by itself qualify the employee to take a leave under this paragraph. See the description about relocating below for more details.

A victim services organization might also include a referral service for victims of domestic or sexual violence, a community housing corporation or a community legal aid clinic.

Obtain psychological or other professional counselling

Psychological or other professional counselling may include counselling provided by a psychologist or psychological associate, psychotherapist, family counsellor, relationship counsellor, or social worker. Counselling or treatment by a qualified psychiatrist may also fall under either this purpose, or alternatively under medical attention. Psychological counselling may also include native healing circles or peer support in the form of a group or individual counselling. It is possible that professional counselling may be of a non-medical nature.

Relocate temporarily or permanently

Relocating temporarily or permanently may include the process of seeking accommodations, inspecting premises and meeting potential landlords or municipal housing authorities, or going through the intake process at a short or medium-term domestic violence shelter, as well as the actual process of moving furniture and possessions at the point of relocation or at a later date. It could include a period of time in which an employee moves to stay with relatives or friends. It would not include relocating to a new residence with the intimate partner or person who was responsible for the sexual or domestic violence or threat thereof, or relocating if it is unrelated to domestic or sexual violence or the threat thereof.

Seek legal or law enforcement assistance

Seeking legal or law enforcement assistance includes preparing for or participating in any civil or criminal legal proceeding related to or resulting from the violence. As examples, an employee may wish to make a police report*, may be required to appear as a witness in a criminal or civil matter or may meet with legal counsel in advance of such a proceeding. An employee may also wish to consult with a lawyer or legal clinic to consider their options without proceeding further, or decide to commence a civil action.

*Note: Whether or not criminal charges were laid as a result of a report made to the police by an employee would not be a relevant consideration under this paragraph; the process of seeking legal enforcement assistance would be considered a valid purpose to take the leave.

Such other purposes as may be prescribed

At this time, there are no regulations in force relating to this section and hence no other purposes have been prescribed.

Exception – s. 49.7(3)

49.7(3) Subsection (2) does not apply if the domestic or sexual violence is committed by the employee.

This subsection provides that an employee is not entitled to a domestic or sexual violence leave if the employee committed the domestic or sexual violence (or threatened such action) themselves. Note that a criminal charge does not have to be laid for this subsection to apply.

Length of Leave – 49.7(4)

49.7(4) An employee is entitled to take, in each calendar year,

a) Up to 10 days of leave under this section; and
b) Up to 15 weeks of leave under this section.

This subsection creates the entitlement to take leave of up to 10 days (taken intermittently or in a single block) and up to 15 weeks (taken either in single weeks or a continuous period or multiple periods totalling no more than 15 weeks) within a calendar year if an employee meets the eligibility requirements of s. 49.7(2). An employee may take further leaves if the employee qualifies for the leave in a subsequent calendar year.

Note that whenever an employee meets all of the requirements for the leave, i.e. the employee has been employed for at least 13 weeks and the employee or the employee's child has experienced domestic or sexual violence or the threat thereof and needs to take the leave for any of the enumerated purposes in s. 49.7(2), the employee will be entitled to a maximum of 10 days plus 15 weeks of leave within a calendar year under ss. 49.7(4)(a) and (b).

It is up to the employee to determine which leave is being used in relation to any particular absence, and communicate to the employer, by complying with the notice requirements of s. 49.7(10),(11),(13) and (14), whether they are drawing on the leave entitlement under either s. 49.7(4) clause (a) or (b). For example, if the employee takes a single day of leave and notifies the employer that they are taking the leave under s.49.7(4)(a), the employer is not entitled to deem the absence as an entire week of leave (but can deem a part day as a full day of leave pursuant to s. 49.7(9). Whereas if the employee takes a single day of leave and notifies the employer that they are taking the leave under s. 49.7(4)(b), the employer is entitled to deem the absence as an entire week of leave - see s. 49.7(12).

Entitlement to Paid Leave – s. 49.7(5)

49.7(5) If an employee takes a leave under this section, the employee is entitled to take the first five such days as paid days of leave in each calendar year and the balance of their entitlement under this section as unpaid leave.

This section provides that the employee is entitled to be paid for the first five days of domestic or sexual violence leave taken within a calendar year. Any further days or weeks that are taken will be unpaid. The first five days of leave are to be paid whether the employee takes leave per s. 49.7(4)(a) (10 days of leave), or (b) (15 weeks). If an employee normally works a five day week and takes three weeks of leave under s. 49.7(4)(b) and this is the first period of leave to be taken within the calendar year, then the first 5 days of the first week would be paid, while the second and third week would not. Similarly, if in a calendar year, an employee takes three days of leave under s. 49.7(4)(a) in March and two weeks of leave under s.49.7(4)(b) in June, the employee would be entitled to be paid for all three days of the s. 49.7(4)(a) leave in March and the first two days of the s. 49.7(4)(b) leave taken in June.

Domestic or Sexual Violence Leave Pay – s. 49.7(6)

49.7(6) Subject to subsections (7) and (8), if an employee takes a paid day of leave under this section, the employer shall pay the employee,

(a) either,

> (i) the wages the employee would have earned had they not taken the leave, or
>
> (ii) if the employee receives performance-related wages, including commissions or a piece work rate, the greater of the employee's hourly rate, if any, and the minimum wage that would have applied to the employee for the number of hours the employee would have worked had they not taken the leave; or

(b) if some other manner of calculation is prescribed, the amount determined using that manner of calculation.

This section sets out the manner of calculating the amount of domestic or sexual violence leave pay.

Note that, subject to ss. 49.7(7) and (8), the calculation entitles employees only to wages they would have earned if they were at work and not on domestic or sexual violence leave. If an employee takes any part of a day as leave under s. 49.7(4)(a) and the employer deems the employee to have taken one day of leave in accordance with s. 49.7(9), the employer is required to pay domestic or sexual violence leave pay for the time taken as domestic or sexual violence leave (i.e., when the employee is absent) plus any wages the employee earns while actively working during the day in question. The same would apply to situations where an employee takes any part of a week as leave under s. 49.7(4)(b) and the employer deems the employee to have taken one week of leave in accordance with s. 49.7(12).

This provision is also read subject to ss. 49.7(7) and (8). Per s. 49.7(7), overtime pay and shift premium amounts are not to be included in domestic or sexual violence leave pay even if the employee "would have earned" these if the employee worked. Subsection 49.7(8) provides that if a paid day of domestic or sexual violence leave falls on a public holiday, the employee is not entitled to premium pay for any leave taken.

Domestic or sexual violence leave pay for a work day can be any amount from a single hour's pay or less to an entire day of wages, depending on how much leave is taken.

At this time, no other manner of calculating domestic or sexual violence leave pay has been prescribed.

In order to determine how much domestic or sexual violence leave pay an employee is entitled to, two things need to be established:

1) How much domestic or sexual violence leave was taken, or the number of hours in a work day, minus the number of hours worked, if any, and
2) How domestic or sexual violence leave pay will be calculated, either as
    a. What an employee's wages would have been for the day had they not taken the leave, or
    b. For employees paid by performance-related wages, either an hourly rate if there is one set by contract, or the applicable minimum wage if not.

Length of the work day

If the employee works a regular work day, with set hours, this is the length of the day for the purpose of calculating domestic or sexual violence leave pay.

If the employee is scheduled to work a particular number of hours on the day on which domestic or sexual violence leave is taken, the length of the day will be what was scheduled, even if the employee regularly works a set number of hours that is different from the scheduled shift.

Amount of domestic or sexual violence leave taken

The amount of domestic or sexual violence leave taken on a single day is calculated by deducting the number of hours actually worked, if any, from the total number of hours in the day. For example, if it is determined that the employee was scheduled to work nine hours on the day, and they took five hours to attend a medical appointment and counselling session, they would be entitled to four hours of wages and five hours of domestic or sexual violence leave pay.

If the same employee did not work but took the entire day as domestic or sexual violence leave, they would be entitled to nine hours of domestic or sexual violence leave pay.

Wages the employee would have earned that day had they not taken the leave

For employees who are not paid by performance-related wages:

Hourly Wage (Non-Salaried Employees)

If the employee is paid by an hourly wage, the amount of domestic and sexual violence leave pay is the number of hours of domestic and sexual violence leave x the hourly rate.

Example 1: Employee with a single rate of pay

- Employee's wage rate is $17.25 per hour
- Employee normally works 8.5 hours in a day
- Employee left work to take domestic or sexual violence leave after working 1.5 hours
- Employee normally works 8.5 hours per day, but worked 1.5 hours and took domestic or sexual violence leave for the rest of the day = 7 hours of domestic or sexual violence leave
- Domestic or sexual violence leave ("DSVL") pay: 7 hours x $17.25 = $120.75
- In addition to DSVL pay, employee is entitled to wages for hours actually worked on the same day = 1.5 hours x $17.25)

Example 2: Employee with more than one rate of pay

- Employee is paid $16.00 per hour for Job A and $17.50 per hour for Job B
- Employee is scheduled to work 10 hours: first five hours on Job A and second five hours on Job B.
- Employee worked for the first three hours doing Job A, and took the rest of the day as domestic or sexual violence leave: 10 hours – 3 hours = 7
- Of the 7 hours of domestic or sexual violence leave, two were Job A and 5 were Job B
- DSVL pay: (2 hours x $16.00 = $32.00) + (5 hours x $17.50 = $87.50) = $119.50
- In addition to the DSVL pay, employee is also entitled to wages for hours actually worked

Salaried Employees

If the employee is paid by salary and has a regular number of days within a pay period and regular hours, the amount of leave pay is

- If the employee took a full day or shift as domestic or sexual violence leave, the employee's daily rate (salary ÷ number of days in a pay period)
- If the employee took part of a day or shift as domestic or sexual violence leave, the employee's hourly rate (salary ÷ number of hours in a pay period) x number of hours of domestic or sexual violence leave

This is, in effect, simple salary continuance. If an employer pays an employee with a fixed salary the normal amount of pay for a week with a day of full or partial domestic or sexual violence leave in it, the domestic or sexual violence leave pay provisions of the ESA 2000 will be satisfied.

Examples: Salaried employees with regular number of days and hours within pay period

Example 1:

- Employee earns $1500.00 per bi-weekly pay period and works a five day week
- Employee takes one day of domestic or sexual violence leave
- DSVL pay: $1500.00 ÷ 10 = $150.00

Example 2:

- Employee earns $1500.00 per bi-weekly pay period and works a 40 hour week
- Employee takes take four hours of domestic or sexual violence leave
- Hourly rate: $1500.00 ÷ 80 = $18.75 per hour
- DSVL pay: $18.75 x 4 = $75.00
- Note that employee is also entitled to wages earned for the part of the day that they worked

Performance-related wages

The amount of domestic or sexual violence leave pay for an employee paid fully or partly by a system of wage calculation related to performance is the greater of the employee's "hourly rate, if any" and the minimum wage that would have applied to the employee. Performance-related wages can include commission only, commission plus an hourly wage, piece work, or compensation as a flat-rate mechanic. An hourly rate refers to an hourly rate set by an employment contract.

Example 1: Employee earns an hourly rate + commission

- Employee earns $16.00 per hour plus 2% commission on sales
- Employee takes 6.5 hours of domestic or sexual violence leave
- DSVL pay: $16.00 x 6.5 = $104.00
- In addition to DSVL pay, employee is entitled to their hourly wage for any hours worked plus commission earned while working that day, if any

Example 2: Employee paid entirely by commission

- Employee earns 10% commission on all sales, plus expenses and a car allowance
- Employee is scheduled to work 8 hours, works 5 hours and makes sales of $500.00 and then takes 3 hours of domestic or sexual violence leave
- DSVL pay: $applicable minimum wage rate x 3
- In addition to the DSVL pay, employee is entitled to 10% commission on the $500.00 of sales that the employee made on that day.

Example 3: Employee is a homeworker paid by piece work

- Employee earns $3.50 per phone call answered
- Employee is scheduled to work 8.5 hours, works two hours, answers 9 phone calls, and takes 6.5 hours of domestic or sexual violence leave
- DSVL pay: $applicable minimum wage x 6.5
- In addition to the DSVL pay, employee is entitled to $3.50 x 9 for actual work performed on the day.

Domestic or Sexual Violence Leave Where Higher Rate of Wages – s. 49.7(7)

49.7(7) If a paid day of leave under this section falls on a day or at a time of day when overtime pay, a shift premium, or both would be payable by the employer,

(a) the employee is not entitled to more than their regular rate for any leave taken under this section; and

(b) the employee is not entitled to the shift premium for any leave taken under this section.

This section excludes overtime pay or a shift premium (for example, an amount paid or an increase in hourly wage for working evenings or weekends) from inclusion when calculating domestic or sexual violence leave pay. The employee would be entitled to be paid for hours of domestic or sexual violence leave using the “regular” rate of pay, and not for example 1.5 times the regular rate per the overtime provisions of the ESA 2000.

Example: Employee scheduled to work overtime hours on a day when domestic or sexual violence leave was taken

- Employee is paid $16.00 per hour, has already worked 40 hours in a work week and is scheduled to work an additional shift of 8.5 hours (with a 30 minute unpaid meal break) on a Saturday.
- Employee does not work any of the scheduled shift and takes domestic or sexual violence leave

- Employee would have earned wages for 8 hours of work had they not taken the leave (4 of which would have exceeded the overtime threshold of 44 in a week)
- DSVL pay: 8 hours x $16.00 per hour = $128.00

Similarly, if an employee is scheduled to work hours that would normally attract a shift premium, and if the employee misses all or some of the shift to take domestic or sexual violence leave, then domestic or sexual violence leave pay will be calculated on the employee's base rate and would not include the shift premium.

Example: Employee entitled to shift premium pay on a day when domestic or sexual violence leave was taken

- Employee is paid $15.50 per hour, plus an additional $2.50 per hour for weekend shifts
- Employee is scheduled to work a Saturday shift (7.5 hours with a 30 minute unpaid meal break), takes domestic or sexual violence leave and does not work any hours
- Employee would have earned wages for 7 hours of work had they not taken the leave
- DSVL pay: 7 hours x $15.50 = $108.50

Domestic or Sexual Violence Leave on Public Holiday – s. 49.7(8)

49.7(8) If a paid day of leave under this section falls on a public holiday, the employee is not entitled to premium pay for any leave taken under this section.

Under ESA Part X Public Holidays, employees who agree to, or are required to work on a public holiday may be entitled to receive premium pay of at least one and one half their regular rate for hours worked on that day. The effect of this subsection is that despite the entitlement in s. 49.7(6) to be paid "the wages the employee would have earned had they not taken the leave", the employee is not entitled to any premium pay that they would have earned by working on the public holiday had the leave not been taken.

Example:

- Employee scheduled to work on public holiday for 9 hours and paid public holiday pay plus premium pay for 9 hours
- Employee worked three hours and took six hours as DSVL
- Employees earns $15.00 per hour
- Premium pay for hours worked on the public holiday: $15.00 x 1.5 x 3 = $67.50
- DSVL pay: public holiday pay calculated in accordance with s. 24
- Note that the employee is not entitled to premium pay for the six hours taken as domestic or sexual violence leave

For more information on public holiday entitlements, please see ESA Part X.

Leave Deemed to Be Taken in Entire Days – s. 49.7(9)

49.7(9) For the purposes of an employee's entitlement under clause 4(a), if an employee takes any part of a day as leave, the employer may deem the employee to have taken one day of leave on that day.

Employees may or may not need an entire day to attend to the issue that gave rise to the sexual or domestic violence leave. For example, an employee may need only a part day in order to meet with legal counsel to discuss an upcoming legal matter.

Section 49.7(9) allows an employer in this circumstance to count a part day off work as an entire day's leave for the purpose of the 10 day entitlement where the leave is taken under s. 49.7(4)(a). However, this is the only purpose for which the employer can deem the part day off work as an entire day's leave. It cannot deem the employee not to have worked at all on the day. The employee is entitled to be paid for the time that was actually worked, and the hours that were worked will be counted for the purposes of, among other things, determining whether the relevant overtime threshold has been reached, whether the limits on, for example, the daily and weekly hours of work have been reached, and whether the daily, weekly/bi-weekly and in-between shifts rest requirements have been met.

Note that this provision allows the employer to attribute one day's leave to a part day of absence, but it does not require the employer to do so.

Note also that the employee is entitled to be on leave only during the time they are engaging in one of the activities enumerated in s. 49.7(2).

Advising Employer – s. 49.7(10)

49.7(10) An employee who wishes to take leave under clause (4)(a) shall advise the employer that the employee will be doing so.

Subsection 49.7(10) requires an employee to advise their employer that the employee will be taking domestic or sexual violence leave under s. 49.7(4)(a), which establishes the 10 day portion of the leave. The subsection does not specify that the notice must be writing, and hence, if it is not, the employee will not be disentitled to the leave, oral notice is sufficient.

Same – s. 49.7(11)

49.7(11) If an employee must begin a leave under clause (4)(a) before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it.

This subsection provides that where the employee must begin a leave under s. 49.7(4)(a) before providing the employer with the notice otherwise required under s. 49.7(10), the employee must advise the employer as soon as possible after beginning the leave. The subsection does not specify that the notice must be writing, and hence, the notice can be provided orally.

Further, an employee does not lose their right to domestic or sexual violence leave if they fail entirely to comply with ss. 49.7(10) or (11). An employee's entitlement to domestic or sexual violence leave arises by virtue of meeting the eligibility criteria in s. 49.7(2), and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins does not negate that entitlement. This approach is consistent with the Program's long-standing policy for all leaves contained in Part XIV where the structures of the entitlement and notice provisions are similar to these.

The question may arise as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy) where the time off is taken as a domestic or sexual violence leave. Section 49.7(11) provides that "if an employee must begin a leave… before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it." It is clear that the ESA 2000 contemplates situations where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of starting the leave and that the employee nevertheless has a right to take leave in such situations, although the employee does have an obligation advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it. On the other hand, the failure to give notice in advance of taking leave when the employee could have done so can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating ESA Part XVIII, s. 74. However the following points should be borne in mind:

1. As noted above, the employee's failure to give advance notice does not nullify the right to take the leave if the qualifying conditions in s. 49.7(2) have been met. In other words, the failure to give advance notice does not have the result that the time taken off by the employee is not domestic or sexual violence leave.
2. An employer may impose discipline where the employee failed to provide advance even though the employee could have done so; however, the reason for the discipline must be because of the failure to give advance notice and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.
3. Likewise, an employer may impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the leave (before or after the start of the leave); however, the reason for the discipline would have to be because of the failure to provide notice and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.

Leave Deemed to Be Taken in Entire Weeks – s. 49.7(12)

49.7(12) For the purposes of an employee's entitlement under clause 4(b), if an employee takes any part of a week as leave, the employer may deem the employee to have taken one week of leave.

Where the leave is taken under s. 49.7(4)(b), employees may or may not need an entire week to attend to the issue that gave rise to the domestic or sexual violence leave.

Section 49.7(12) allows an employer in this circumstance to count a part week off work as an entire week's leave for the purpose of the 15-week entitlement. However, this is the only purpose for which the employer can deem the part week off work as an entire week's leave. It cannot deem the employee not to have worked at all during the week. The employee is entitled to be paid for the time that was actually worked, and the hours that were worked will be counted for the purposes of, among other things, determining whether the relevant overtime threshold has been reached, whether the limits on, for example, the daily and weekly hours of work have been reached, and whether the daily, weekly/bi-weekly and in-between shifts rest requirements have been met.

While that this provision allows the employer to attribute one week's leave to a part week of absence, it does not require the employer to do so.

Note also that the employee is entitled to be on leave only during the time they are engaging in one of the activities enumerated in s. 49.7(2).

Advising Employer – s. 49.7(13)

49.7(13) An employee who wishes to take leave under clause (4)(b) shall advise the employer in writing that the employee will be doing so.

Subsection 49.7(13) requires an employee to advise their employer that the employee will be taking domestic or sexual violence leave under clause (4)(b), which is the 15-week portion of the leave. Unlike the requirements under s. 49.7(10), s. 49.7(13) specifies that the notice must be writing.

Same – s. 49.7(14)

49.7(14) If an employee must begin a leave under clause (4)(b) before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it.

This subsection provides that where the employee must begin a leave under clause (4)(b) before providing the employer with the notice otherwise required under s. 49.7(13), that the employee must advise the employer as soon as possible after beginning the leave. Unlike s. 49.7(11), s. 49.7(14) specifies that the notice must be writing.

Further, an employee does not lose their right to domestic or sexual violence leave if they fail entirely to comply with ss. 49.7(13) or (14). An employee's entitlement to domestic or sexual violence leave arises by virtue of meeting the eligibility criteria in s. 49.7(2), and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins does not negate that entitlement. This approach is consistent with the Program's long-standing policy for all leaves contained in Part XIV where the structures of the entitlement and notice provisions are similar to these.

The question may arise as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy) where the time off is taken as a domestic or sexual violence leave. Section 49.7(14) provides that "if an employee must begin a leave…before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it." It is clear that the ESA 2000 contemplates situations where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of starting the leave and that the employee nevertheless has a right to take leave in such situations, although the employee does have an obligation advise the employer of the leave in writing as soon as possible after beginning it. On the other hand, the failure to give notice in advance of taking leave when the employee could have done so can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating ESA Part XVIII, s. 74. However the following points should be borne in mind:

1. As noted above, the employee's failure to give advance written notice does not nullify the right to take the leave if the qualifying conditions in s. 49.7(2) have been met. In other words, the failure to give advance written notice does not have the result that the time taken off by the employee is not domestic or sexual violence leave.
2. An employer may impose discipline where the employee failed to provide advance written notice even though the employee could have done so; however, the reason for the discipline must be because of the failure to give advance written notice and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.
3. Likewise, an employer may impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any written notice of the leave (before or after the start of the leave); however, the reason for the discipline would have to be because of the failure to provide written notice and not because the employee exercised the right to take leave.

Evidence – s. 49.7(15)

49.7(15) An employer may require an employee who takes a leave under this section to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances of the employee's entitlement to the leave.

This provision gives an employer some ability to require an employee to provide proof that they are entitled to take domestic or sexual violence leave. The employer can require an employee to provide evidence that is “reasonable in the circumstances” that they are or was entitled to take the leave.

Evidence of entitlement to domestic or sexual violence leave may take many forms, though what is reasonable in the circumstances will be situation-specific. For example, it could be an email relating to an appointment for legal, professional or counselling services, an invoice or receipt if any of the professional services are provided on a “pay for service” or reimbursement basis, or a rental agreement or lease. There is nothing in the legislation that prohibits an employer from asking for a medical certificate, and there could be scenarios where it would be reasonable in the circumstances to ask for a medical note.

Employers are not permitted to require detailed medical certificates citing the diagnosis and/or treatment of an employee’s medical condition that gave rise to the domestic or sexual violence leave entitlement. It is Program policy that it is reasonable to request only the following information on a medical certificate:

- The expected duration of the absence,
- The date the employee was seen by a health care professional, and
- Whether the patient was examined in person by the health care professional issuing the certificate.

Note that it is Program policy that the employee is not required to provide evidence relating to the fact that they have experienced domestic violence or sexual violence (or the threat thereof) to an employment standards officer during the course of a claim investigation: the employee would be required to provide evidence only relating to the defined purpose(s) for which the leave was taken.

What will be reasonable in the circumstances will depend on all the circumstances in a given situation, and the general approach to what is reasonable refers to both the timelines in which the evidence is provided to the employer as well as the evidence itself. In some cases, no evidence may be available, a third party may refuse to provide evidence (for example, a domestic violence shelter may decline to issue any document that would reveal its location), or evidence may involve a security risk that a reasonable employee would not be expected to take, (for example, providing information to an employer about a temporary residence location). See ESA Part XIV, s. 50 for a discussion on what reasonable in the circumstances means in the context of evidence to support a sick leave.

s. 49.7(16) – REPEALED

Confidentiality – s. 49.7(17); Disclosure Permitted – s. 49.7(18)

(17) An employer shall ensure that mechanisms are in place to protect the confidentiality of records given to or produced by the employer that relate to an employee taking a leave under this section.

(18) Nothing in subsection (17) prevents an employer from disclosing a record where,

(a) the employee has consented to the disclosure of the record;

(b) disclosure is made to an officer, employee, consultant or agent of the employer who needs the record in the performance of their duties;

(c) the disclosure is authorized or required by law;

(d) the disclosure is prescribed as a permitted disclosure.

Section 49.7(17) creates the requirement for an employer to have mechanisms in place to protect the confidentiality of any records given to the employer related to an employee taking domestic or sexual violence leave and any employer-created records relating to an employee taking the leave. Note that this provision applies to domestic or sexual violence leave only, not to other Part XIV leaves. Section 49.7(18) clarifies under what circumstances an employer may release or share this type of information.

Mechanisms

Mechanisms may refer to various things put in place by the employer to prevent records related to an employee taking domestic or sexual violence leave from being seen by anyone not authorized to receive the information by s. 49.7(18). It may include a secure password set to protect electronic information, or a physical location for records storage with limited access, such as a filing cabinet in a restricted area. It may also refer to a particular method of receiving the information, such as designating a particular human resources employee as a single point of contact to limit the risk of confidential information becoming public.

Disclosure

Section 49.7(18) clarifies under what circumstances an employer may disclose records relating to domestic or sexual violence leave. The employer may release records if the employee has provided consent: although s. 49.7(18)(a) does not state that the consent should be in writing, for record-keeping purposes consent in writing is preferred. Disclosure may also be made to an officer, another employee, consultant or agent of the employer if the information is required for the person to do their job, for example, securing evidence or checking information such as start and end dates of periods of leave for the purpose of processing payroll. In general, the information disclosed by an employer to any of these individuals is limited to only as much information as the other employee, consultant, or agent requires to perform their duties and no more.

Section 49.7(18)(c) also permits an employer to disclose information or records as authorized or required by law. This may include release of information to an employment standards officer in the course of a claim investigation, or a police officer if a criminal investigation is commenced and the officer has a warrant for the information. It may also include a situation where an employer has a positive obligation under the Occupational Health and Safety Act to provide limited information to workers who are at risk of physical violence in the workplace due to another employee's history of violent behaviour.

Note that at the time of writing, no permitted disclosure per s. 49.7(18)(d) has been prescribed.

ESA Part XIV Section 50 – Sick Leave

Sick Leave – s. 50(1)

50(1) An employee who has been employed by an employer for at least two consecutive weeks is entitled to a leave of absence without pay because of a personal illness, injury or medical emergency.

The sick leave provisions were introduced into the ESA 2000 effective January 1, 2019 by the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018.

Note that, pursuant to O Reg 285/01, s. 3, certain employees who meet the qualifying criteria for a sick leave will not be entitled to take it if taking it would constitute an act of professional misconduct or a dereliction of professional duty. Section 3 of O Reg 285/01 reads:

3. Sections 50, 50.0.1 and 50.0.2 of the Act do not apply to any of the following persons in circumstances in which the exercise of the entitlement would constitute an act of professional misconduct or a dereliction of professional duty:

> 1. A person described in clause 2(1) (a), (c), (d) or (e).
>
> 2. A person employed as a registered practitioner of a health profession set out in Schedule 1 to the Regulated Health Professions Act, 1991, including a person described in clause 2(1)(b).

See O Reg 285/01, s. 3 for more information.

What Triggers an Entitlement to Sick Leave

Section 50(1) sets out the qualifying conditions an employee must meet in order to be entitled to sick leave. To qualify, the employee must have been employed by the employer for at least two consecutive weeks and the need for the leave must be because of one of the following events:

- personal illness
- personal injury, or
- personal medical emergency.

Sick leave is an unpaid leave. If an event is not listed in s. 50(1), the employee is not entitled to sick leave for that event. If the employee has not been employed for at least two consecutive weeks, the employee is not entitled to sick leave.

Injury, Illness or Medical Emergency

For the most part, the meaning of these terms is self-evident.

One issue that arises with respect to leaves taken because of illness, injury or medical emergency is whether an employee is entitled to take sick leave for pre-planned or so-called "elective" surgery. Because the surgery is scheduled ahead of time, it is not a medical "emergency". However, because, generally speaking, people undergo surgery for the treatment or prevention of a medical condition, it is Program policy that most surgeries, including those that are pre-planned or elective, that are performed to address or prevent manifestation of a medical condition (e.g., laser eye surgery to correct poor distance vision) are because of an illness or injury and, consequently, entitle an employee to sick leave. This does not include medically unnecessary plastic surgeries that are performed for purely cosmetic reasons and that are not related to an underlying illness or injury; these types of surgeries are not because of an illness or injury.

Another issue that arises concerns doctor's appointments. An appointment for an annual check-up would generally not trigger an entitlement to leave unless it has been scheduled in respect of an illness, injury or medical emergency. However, if an employee had regularly scheduled appointments for the treatment or management of a chronic medical condition such as Crohn's disease or diabetes, those appointments would trigger an entitlement because they are absences related to an illness.

Regular prenatal appointments scheduled for an employee during the course of a normal, healthy pregnancy would not trigger an entitlement to sick leave because a healthy pregnancy is not an illness. Note that in this regard, consideration should also be given to the Ontario Human Rights Code, RSO 1990, c H.19 obligations to accommodate pregnant employees. Pursuant to the Code, an employer may be required to accommodate a pregnant employee's need for regular prenatal visits up to the point of undue hardship. However, if a pregnant employee has an illness or medical condition (even if related to or exacerbated by the pregnancy) they would be entitled to sick leave as the doctor's appointments would be considered to be related to an illness.

Whether an illness, injury or medical emergency was caused by the employee's own actions or by external factors beyond the employee's control is irrelevant to the question of an employee's entitlement to sick leave. For example, an employee who broke their tailbone while tobogganing at night in an inebriated state would not be disentitled to sick leave just because the injury was caused by their own carelessness. While some may argue that in such cases the employee should not be entitled to sick leave days, there is no basis in the legislation to support such a view, and it is Program policy that absences for illness or injury, caused by the employee's own action can qualify as sick leave days.

Designating Absences as Sick Leave

For employees who are entitled to sick leave as provided for in s. 50, questions have arisen as to whether an employee who is absent from work for one of the reasons listed in s. 50(1) must use one of their three days of sick leave. For further information on this issue refer to the discussion under ss. 50 (3) and (4).

Limit – s. 50(2)

50(2) An employee's entitlement to leave under this section is limited to a total of three days in each calendar year.

This section provides that an employee is entitled to take up to three days of sick leave every calendar year. The entitlement is to a total of three days of sick leave per calendar year, not three days per personal illness, injury or medical emergency.

The ESA 2000 does not place any restrictions on whether the three days have to be taken consecutively or individually. Employees can take sick leave in part days (although see s. 50(5), which allows employers to deem one day's leave to be taken when an employee takes part of a day off work for sick leave), entire days, or in periods of more than one day.

The question arises as to whether the three-day entitlement should be prorated for employees who are part-time, or who started their employment partway through a calendar year but have been employed for at least two consecutive weeks. There is nothing in the legislation to suggest that employees who are eligible for sick leave should be entitled to less than three days a calendar year in any of these situations. Accordingly, it is Program policy that pro-rating of the three-day entitlement for part-time employees or employees who were hired partway through a calendar year is not permitted.

The ESA 2000 does not provide for the carryover of unused days of sick leave from one calendar year into the next calendar year. In other words, employees do not have a statutory right to "bank" unused sick leave days year over year.

It is Program policy that an employee who quits or is terminated and who is subsequently re-hired by the same employer during the same calendar year is entitled to a new three-day entitlement after two consecutive weeks of employment upon their re-hire. This is the case even if the employee took some sick leave during their first term of employment in that calendar year.

See ESA Part III, s. 5(2) for a discussion of the application of the greater right or benefit provision to sick leave. See also the discussion at ss. 50(7)–(9) for information regarding the interplay between contractual leave entitlements and statutory entitlements to sick leave where the contractual leave does not amount to a greater right or benefit.

Advising employer – s. 50(3) and 50(4)

50(3) An employee who wishes to take a leave under this section shall advise his or her employer that he or she will be doing so.

50(4) If the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it.

Advising Employer

Section 50(3) requires employees to tell their employers ahead of time that they will be taking sick leave. In circumstances where that cannot be done, the employee is required, pursuant to s. 50(4), to inform the employer as soon as possible after beginning the leave.

The ESA 2000 does not require the employee to advise the employer of the sick leave in writing. Oral notice is sufficient.

The ESA 2000 does not specify any particular method by which the employer is to be advised that the employee will be taking sick leave. Consequently, an employee would be complying with this section whether the employee, for example, advised the employer by phone, left a note on the manager's desk or had a colleague take a message to the employer on their behalf.

Employees do not lose their right to sick leave if they fail to comply with ss. 50(3) or (4). An employee's entitlement to sick leave arises by virtue of one of a number of triggering events arising, and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins does not negate that entitlement. This approach has been affirmed in a grievance arbitration decision by the Ontario Labour Relations Board in the context of the former personal emergency leave, which used identical language to subsections (3) and (4) and which had similarly-structured entitlement provisions to those found in sick leave – see International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 115 v The State Group Inc., 2019 CanLII 22129 (ON LRB). In that decision, the Vice-Chair found that notice to the employer is not a prerequisite to exercising the right to the leave. Note that this approach is also consistent with the Program's long-standing policy in the pregnancy and parental leave context, where the structure of the entitlement and notice provisions are also similar to these. See ESA Part XIV, s. 46(4) and s. 48(4).

An issue has arisen as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy), where the time off is a sick leave under the ESA 2000. Section 50(1) describes the employee's entitlement. Section 50(3) requires the employee taking sick leave to advise the employer that they are taking the leave, and s. 50(4) provides that "if the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it." It is clear from s. 50(4) that the ESA 2000 contemplates situations where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of commencing the sick leave. Part of the sick leave entitlement under the ESA 2000 is the right to take the sick leave even if advance notice cannot be given, with the proviso that the employee must advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it.

The failure to give notice in advance of taking leave, when it would have been possible for the employee to do so, can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating ESA Part XVIII, s. 74, the anti-reprisal provision. However, the following points should be considered: The employee's failure to give advance notice would not be a lawful basis on which to deprive the employee of the right to take the leave if the qualifying conditions in s. 50(1) have been met. An employer could not, for example, take the position that failure to give advance notice when it would have been possible for the employee to do so will result in the time taken off not being counted as a sick leave day.

Any discipline for failing to provide notice in situations where such notice is required under s. 50(3) (i.e., where s. 50(4) does not apply) would have to be appropriately linked to the failure to give advance notice and must not, in effect penalize the employee for exercising the right to leave. The motive for any discipline that the employer does impose must clearly be the employee's failure to give advance notice and not the taking of the leave itself.

In addition, an employer would be able to impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the sick leave, or if the employee provides notice of the leave so late that one wouldn't reasonably be able to say that it falls within s. 50(4). Again, however, the employer's disciplinary action would have to be appropriate, and in no way a penalty or reprisal for the employee having taken the leave, but only for the failure to give notice. In this regard see Ryding-Regency Meat Packers Ltd. v. U.F.C.W., Local 1000A. In that case, the arbitrator concluded that s. 50(1) establishes an entitlement to leave when the qualifying events have occurred (this case referred to the former personal emergency leave, which an employee could become entitled to take when a defined relative became ill and the employee took time off work to care for the relative). The fact that the employee's grandmother was ill was not disputed. Because s. 50(1) separate from the notice requirements, the employee could be disciplined for not giving notice that he was taking or had taken leave but did not lose his entitlement to the leave itself.

Designating Absences as Sick Leave

For employees who are entitled to sick leave as provided for in s. 50, questions have arisen as to whether an employee who is absent from work for one of the reasons listed in s. 50(1) must use one of their three days of sick leave.

Impact of Subsections (7) – (9)

Subsection (7) provides that where an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a leave under s. 50, the employee is deemed to have taken a leave under s. 50. Subsections (8) and (9) establish rules that apply to the deemed leave.

Accordingly, if subsections (7) to (9) apply to an absence, i.e. an employee takes paid or unpaid leave under the contract of employment in circumstances in which sick leave could be taken, the employee will be deemed pursuant to ss. 50(7) to have taken ESA sick leave and drawn down against the three-day s. 50 entitlement. See the discussion under ss. 50 (7) to (9) for more information regarding the impact of contractual entitlements on the statutory right to sick leave.

Result Where Subsections (7) – (9) Do Not Apply

On the other hand, if subsections (7) to (9) do not apply, i.e. an employee who is entitled to sick leave is absent due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50(1) but does not take a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract for that absence (either because the employee does not have a contractual right or does not exercise it), it is the employee (not the employer) who decides whether to designate the absence as a statutory sick leave.

If the employee who is entitled to sick leave and who is absent from work due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50(1) wishes to designate the absence as a statutory sick leave, then the absence is a sick leave that draws down against the three-day statutory entitlement and attracts the corresponding reprisal protections, and all of the other ancillary rights that attach to statutory leaves that are set out in ss. 51-53.1.

In the case where ss. (7) to (9) do not apply, an employee may be entitled to statutory sick leave and be absent from work due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50(1) and decide not to claim the absence as a sick leave day. This is not considered as contracting out of the ESA 2000 if an employee does not take advantage of their leave entitlements; the employee has merely chosen not to exercise them.

If the employee who is entitled to sick leave by virtue of being absent from work due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50(1) does not wish to designate the absence as a sick leave, and the absence cannot be considered an authorized absence on some other ground (e.g., another leave under the ESA 2000 or vacation authorized by the employer), the absence would have no statutory reprisal protection. For this reason, an employee who takes a day off for a reason that would qualify under s. 50 but who would prefer not to have the day charged against their sick leave allotment may feel effectively forced into designating the day as such a leave. This in itself does not constitute any violation of the ESA 2000: it is not unlawful for an employer to inform an employee that should the employee not designate an absence as a statutory sick leave day, then it would be considered an unexcused absence that will lead to disciplinary action.

Note that if the employee did not know of the right to take sick leave, the default is that the absence is considered to be statutory sick leave with the corresponding reprisal protection. An employee does not lose their right to any of the leaves provided for under the ESA 2000 because they were unaware of their entitlements.

Leave deemed to be taken in entire days – s. 50(5)

50(5) For the purposes of an employee's entitlement under subsection (1), if an employee takes any part of a day as leave under this section, the employer may deem the employee to have taken one day of leave on that day.

Employees may not need an entire work day to attend to the event that gave rise to the sick leave and might only take part of a day off as sick leave. Section 50(5) allows an employer in this situation to count a part-day off work as an entire day's leave for the purpose of counting the absence against the statutory three-day leave entitlement. This is the only purpose for which the employer can deem the part day off work as an entire day's leave. The employer cannot deem the employee not to have worked at all on the day. Where an employee worked a partial day and took a part-day of sick leave, the employee is entitled to be paid the earnings for the time that was actually worked that day. As well, the hours that were worked will be counted for the purposes of, among other things, determining whether the relevant overtime threshold has been reached, whether the limits on, for example, the daily and weekly hours of work have been reached, and whether the daily, weekly/bi-weekly and in-between shifts rest requirements have been met.

For clarity, this provision does not require employees to take sick leave in full day periods. It simply allows an employer to reduce the employee's three-day entitlement by a day if an employee is on sick leave for only part of a day.

Note that this provision allows the employer to attribute one day's leave to a part day of absence. It does not require the employer to do so.

For example, an employee goes home early from work because of the stomach flu. They worked a four-hour day rather than their usual eight hours and takes sick leave. In that case, the employer may consider the employee to have used up one of their three days of sick leave and the employee would be paid her earnings for the four hours that she actually worked.

Just because an employer may consider an employee to have used one day of leave due to a part day of absence does not mean that the employee then has the right to take the entire day off if the triggering event did not last the entire day. For example, an employee's shift is from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. From 10 a.m. to 11 a.m., they have to attend a medical appointment in relation to a chronic medical condition they live with. The employee claims the absence as a sick leave. Their employer is entitled to reduce the employee's sick leave entitlement by one day, but the employee must nevertheless return to work after the appointment is over. Employees have the right to be away from work under the sick leave provisions of the ESA 2000 only for as long as the event that triggered the entitlement lasts. After the triggering event is over, the employee's normal obligations to attend at work are resumed.

In addition, employers cannot prohibit employees who took a part day of leave from returning to work for the remainder of their shift. This is because of, among other reasons, the employer's obligation to reinstate the employee at the end of the leave in ESA Part XIV and the prohibition against penalizing employees for having taken a leave in ESA Part XVIII, s. 74.

An issue has arisen as to whether an employer could exercise its discretion and deem a partial day absence as a full day for some employees, but not for others, or whether this might allow employers to selectively punish employees who have too many absences in violation of the reprisal provisions of the ESA 2000.

The answer will depend on the facts. In particular, why did the employer treat the employees differently? Where an employer deems a full day's absence for some employees, but not for others, it is a question of fact as to whether the employer would be in violation of the ESA 2000.

For instance, an employer counts a three-hour sick leave as a full day's leave for employee A but not for employee B, who also takes a three-hour sick leave because the employer considers employee B to be a better worker than employee A. Although this might be unfair as between employee A and B, it would not be a violation of the ESA 2000, as it would not be a reprisal for exercising a right under the ESA 2000.

If, on the other hand, the motivation for the differential treatment was that employee A frequently took sick leave every year of only a few hours, and the employer assigned a full day's absence to these short leaves as a way to ensure employee A used up all of their statutory entitlement as soon as possible because the employer found it inconvenient for the employee to be away for many short periods of time, that would be an unlawful reprisal.

As another example, it would also be an unlawful reprisal if the motive for the differential treatment was because employee A made inquiries about ESA rights or refused to agree to average hours for overtime pay purposes.

Evidence – s. 50(6)

50(6) An employer may require an employee who takes leave under this section to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances that the employee is entitled to the leave.

Subsection 50(6) gives an employer the ability to require an employee to provide proof that they are or were entitled to take sick leave. The employer can require an employee to provide evidence that is reasonable in the circumstances that they are or were entitled to take the leave.

Evidence of entitlement to sick leave may take many forms. For example, if it is reasonable in the circumstances, it could take the form of a receipt from a drugstore or pharmacy or a medical bracelet from a hospital.

What will be reasonable in the circumstances will depend on all of the circumstances in any given situation. In FAG Bearings Ltd. v Francis, 2005 CanLII 35873 (ON LRB), a decision made in relation to the former personal emergency leave provisions, the employer had a disciplinary policy that provided for a four-step progression for any infraction of a company rule or policy. Under the disciplinary policy, an employee's employment would be terminated if there was a fourth disciplinary incident in a rolling twelve-month period. In this case, the third disciplinary incident was a response to the claimant failing to provide a doctor's note when he left work early because of back pain. The employer argued that the discipline was a consequence of the employee's failure to provide a doctor's note within a reasonable period of time following the absence, and not because he had exercised a right to emergency leave under the ESA 2000. The employee argued that he should have been provided with more time to provide a note. The Ontario Labour Relations Board concluded that the requirement to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances contemplates that both the evidence required and the timelines for providing it be reasonable in the circumstances. The Board noted that the right to leave would be defeated if an employee who is legitimately entitled to it could be disciplined for failing to comply with an unreasonable time frame set by their employer. Conversely, the employer's right to verify entitlement to a leave would also be defeated if it could not require the employee to provide the evidence within a reasonable period of time. In this case, the Board found that the time to provide the evidence had been reasonable and the discipline was imposed solely as a consequence of the employee's failure to provide evidence as required under the ESA 2000. On that basis, the Board found the employer had not violated ESA Part XVIII, s. 74 since the discipline was not related to the exercise of the employee's right to leave under s. 50(1).

Another helpful decision relating to evidence in the context of the former personal emergency leave is Re Tilbury Assembly Ltd. and United Auto Workers, Local 251. There, an employee with an absenteeism problem had left her shift early complaining of a severe headache. The employer had a policy that this employee was required to provide a physician's note in all cases of absence due to personal illness because of her history of absenteeism. In this instance, the employee did not obtain such a note, but instead bought some extra-strength pain relievers and took them and went to bed in a dark room, which was how she customarily dealt with this type of headache, which she experienced two or three times a year. Although the employee provided a note and receipt from the pharmacist from whom she purchased the pain relievers, the employer disciplined her for the failure to produce a physician's note. The employee grieved. The arbitrator held that the ESA 2000 gives an employer a right to require an employee to produce evidence, but only such evidence as was reasonable in the circumstances. While the employee's record of absences was one circumstance to be taken into account in determining what was reasonable, it was outweighed by the fact that the employee did have a note and receipt from a pharmacist, by the fact that her experience with the type of headache she had indicated that taking the pain relievers and going to bed in a dark room would provide effective treatment and by the fact that employee would likely face a considerable wait in a hospital emergency facility in order to see a doctor for her headache. The arbitrator found that the employer's requirement of a note from a physician was not reasonable in these circumstances and reversed the discipline.

What evidence is reasonable in the circumstances, including whether it is reasonable for the employer to require a medical note, will be fact-specific. The factors and principles that may be relevant when assessing reasonableness are listed below.

- The duration of the leave. For example, it may not be reasonable, depending on all the circumstances, for an employer to require an employee who was away from work for only one day with a cold to provide a doctor's note.
- Whether there is a pattern of absences or a record of absenteeism. For example, if an employee claims to be ill and takes sick leave only on Friday afternoons during the summer, it may be reasonable for the employer to require some proof of the illness even though the leave is of short duration.
- Whether any evidence is available. For example, an employer did not ask an employee who was on a sick leave for a doctor's note until after the employee had returned to work. If the employee is no longer ill at that point, it may be impossible for them to get any evidence of the illness.
- Where evidence is available, but only with some difficulty, whether it is reasonable to expect the employee to obtain the evidence (See the Tilbury Assembly decision, discussed above.)
- The cost of the evidence. For example, it may not be reasonable, depending on all the circumstances, for an employer to require an employee who earns minimum wage to obtain a doctor's note if the doctor charges the employee $25 for it.
- The employee had earlier asked for the time off for non-sick leave reasons for the time at which the absence occurred but was denied.
- The employee had announced plans in advance to miss work.

In circumstances where it is reasonable to require a medical certificate to support an employee's entitlement to sick leave under the ESA, it is Program policy that employers are not permitted to require detailed medical certificates citing the diagnosis and/or treatment of the medical condition of the employee that gave rise to the sick leave entitlement. It is Program policy that it is reasonable to request only the following information on a medical certificate:

- The expected duration of the absence (or, if the absence is over, the date(s) of the absence addressed by the certificate),
- The date the employee was seen by a health care professional, and
- Whether the patient was examined in person by the health care professional issuing the certificate.

Note that any evidence the employee provides to support the employee's claim of an entitlement to sick leave is just that – evidence – and is not necessarily determinative of the question of whether the employee had an entitlement. Depending on the circumstances, it may be reasonable for the employer to require additional evidence from the employee.

Note also that the Program policy restrictions on what an employer can require on medical certificates apply only to medical certificates as evidence in support of an employer's entitlement to statutory sick leave. The Program's policy does not apply to the content of medical certificates in the context of other employment issues such as return-to-work situations or for accommodation purposes.

Sick Leave Taken Under Employment Contract – s. 50(7)

Same, Application of Act to Deemed Leave – s. 50(8)

Same, Application of Subs. (5) to Deemed Leave – s. 50(9)

50(7) If an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which he or she would also be entitled to take a leave under this section, the employee is deemed to have taken the leave under this section.

50(8) All applicable requirements and prohibitions under this Act apply to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (7).

50(9) Subsection (5) applies with necessary modifications to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (7).

These provisions, when read together, establish what happens when an employee takes a leave of absence under an employment contract (which includes a collective agreement) in circumstances that would also entitle the employee to a leave under ESA Part XIV, s. 50.

“Circumstances” refers only to the triggering event that would entitle the employee to statutory sick leave, i.e., the employee is absent because of personal illness, injury or medical emergency.

It is Program policy that “circumstances” does not include the two-week employment eligibility criterion. Accordingly, these provisions will be triggered when an employee takes a leave of absence under an employment contract due to personal illness, injury or medical emergency even during the first two weeks of employment; this is the case regardless of the fact that the employee does not have the right to take statutory sick leave during this time.

Subsections (7) to (9) codify the long-standing Program policy on the interplay between contractual leave entitlements and statutory leave entitlements where the contractual leave does not amount to a greater right or benefit than statutory sick leave under ESA Part III, s. 5(2).

Note that if a contract does provide a greater right or benefit than the statutory sick leave entitlement – the determination of which includes consideration of reprisal protections and the entitlements under general provisions concerning leaves such as the right to reinstatement – the contractual leave provision applies and s. 50, including these subsections, does not apply. See the discussion of ESA Part III, s. 5(2) for details.

In general terms, subsections (7) to (9) provide that an employee who claims a contractual benefit for an absence – in circumstances in which the employee would also be entitled to take sick leave - does not give the employee an entitlement to those contractual absences plus an additional three days of sick leave.

Sick Leave Taken Under Employment Contract

50(7) If an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which he or she would also be entitled to take a leave under this section, the employee is deemed to have taken the leave under this section.

If an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a leave under ESA Part XIV, s. 50, the employee is deemed to have taken a day of sick leave and the absence will reduce the employee’s three-day per calendar year sick leave allotment accordingly. Note that this provision must be read in conjunction with subsections (8) and (9), discussed below.

For this provision to apply, the reason for the absence (the “triggering event”) must qualify for both the contractual leave and the statutory leave.

Some examples:

- An employee’s contract of employment provides three paid “flex days” that can be used for any reason. The employee is absent from work for three days because they are ill. They claim the benefit of these flex days because they are a paid leave. Subsection 50(7) deems the employee to have used three ESA sick leave days. As a result, the employee will have no further entitlement to sick leave under the ESA 2000.
- An employee’s contract of employment offers flex days that can be used for any reason, and the employee uses one of those days to deal with a matter that is unrelated to a personal illness or medical emergency (for example, to attend a child’s dance recital). In this situation, the employee would not be deemed to have taken a day of sick leave pursuant to this provision. This is because an employee is not entitled to take a statutory sick leave day to attend a child’s dance recital , and, therefore, the contractual leave was not taken in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a sick leave.

This provision has the potential to deem a statutory leave to be taken when a contractual leave is taken. It does not do the converse: it does not deem a contractual leave to be taken if a statutory leave is taken in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a contractual leave. The question as to whether statutory absences will also draw down against the contractual right is not a matter for the employment standards program.

Application of Act to Deemed Leaves

50(8) All applicable requirements and prohibitions under this Act apply to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (7).

If an absence has been deemed to be a statutory leave under s. 50(7), this provision establishes that all requirements and prohibitions under the ESA 2000 apply to the absence.

This includes all requirements and prohibitions in ESA Part XIV, s. 50 as well as general rights and obligations found in other sections and parts of the ESA 2000.

Examples include: the right to reinstatement, maintenance of benefits (if relevant), protection from reprisal, obligations on the employee with respect to advising the employer of the leave and providing evidence reasonable in the circumstances to demonstrate an entitlement to the leave (where required by the employer).

Application of ESA Part XIV, s. 50(5) to Deemed Leaves

50(9) Subsection (5) applies with necessary modifications to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (7).

This provision states that subsection (5) applies, with necessary modifications, to a leave that is deemed to be a sick leave pursuant to subsection (7).

This means that if an employee takes a partial-day leave pursuant to their contract of employment, and that leave is deemed to be a day of sick leave under subsection (7), the employer may deem the absence to be a full day of sick leave and reduce the employee's three-day per calendar year allotment of sick days accordingly.

ESA Part XIV Section 50 – Personal Emergency Leave – REPEALED

The personal emergency leave (PEL) provisions in ESA Part XIV, s. 50 were repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The PEL provisions are therefore no longer in force. However, employees may still have a complaint relating to PEL that arose during the period of time when that leave was in force. For that reason, the Program's interpretation of the s. 50 PEL provisions remains as part of this publication.

Definitions – s. 50(0.1)

Subsection 50(0.1) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of this provision is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provision was in force.

50 (0.1) In this section,

a) "qualified health practitioner" means,a person who is qualified to practise as a physician, a registered nurse or a psychologist under the laws of the jurisdiction in which care or treatment is provided to the employee or to an individual described in subsection (2), or

b) in the prescribed circumstances, a member of a prescribed class of health practitioners.

This subsection defines the term "qualified health practitioner" for the purposes of s. 50. This term is used in subsection (13), which provides that an employer cannot require an employee to provide a certificate from a qualified health practitioner as evidence that the employee is entitled to take a leave under this section.

Where care or treatment is provided in Ontario:

- "A person who is qualified to practise as a physician" means a member of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario (this includes psychiatrists);
- "A person who is qualified to practise as a registered nurse" means in accordance with O Reg 275/94 of the Nursing Act, 1991, SO 1991, c 32, a member of the College of Nurses of Ontario who holds a general or extended certificate of registration as a registered nurse (nurse practitioners hold extended certificates); and
- "A person who is qualified to practise as a psychologist" means an individual who is a member of the College of Psychologists of Ontario.

Where care or treatment is provided in a jurisdiction other than Ontario the question of whether the person providing it is a qualified health practitioner is determined with reference to the laws of that other jurisdiction. At this time, there are no additional prescribed classes of qualified health practitioners.

Personal Emergency Leave – ss. 50(1) & (2) – REPEALED

Subsections 50(1) and (2) were repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of these provisions is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provisions were in force.

50(1) An employee is entitled to a leave of absence because of any of the following:

1. A personal illness, injury or medical emergency.

2. The death, illness, injury or medical emergency of an individual described in subsection (2).

3. An urgent matter that concerns an individual described in subsection (2).

(2) Paragraphs 2 and 3 of subsection (1) apply with respect to the following individuals:

1. The employee's spouse.

2. A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee's spouse.

3. A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.

4. A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or of the employee's spouse.

5. The spouse of a child of the employee.

6. The employee's brother or sister.

7. A relative of the employee who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance.

The personal emergency leave provisions were introduced by the ESA 2000.

Sections 50(1) and 50(2) set out the qualifying conditions an employee must meet in order to be entitled to a personal emergency leave of absence. To qualify, the need for the leave must be due to one of the specified events and the event must relate to one of the specified individuals.

Note that, pursuant to O Reg 285/01, s. 3 certain employees who meet the qualifying criteria for a personal emergency leave will not be entitled to take it if taking it would constitute an act of professional misconduct or a dereliction of professional duty. Section 3 of O Reg 285/01 reads:

3. Section 50 of the Act does not apply to any of the following persons in circumstances in which the exercise of the entitlement would constitute an act of professional misconduct or a dereliction of professional duty:

1. A person described in clause 2(1) (a), (c), (d) or (e).

2. A person employed as a registered practitioner of a health profession set out in Schedule 1 to the Regulated Health Professions Act, 1991, including a person described in clause 2(1)(b).

See O Reg 285/01, s. 3 for more information.

Events That Trigger an Entitlement to Personal Emergency Leave

Sections 50(1) and 50(2) list the events, and the people to whom the events must relate, that entitle employees to take personal emergency leave. The list is exhaustive. If an event or the person to whom the event relates is not listed in ss. 50(1) and 50(2), the employee is not entitled to personal emergency leave.

Employees can take a personal emergency leave of absence for the following reasons:

- A personal illness, injury or medical emergency.

One of the following if it relates to certain specified individuals:

- Death,
- Illness,
- Injury,
- Medical emergency, or
- Urgent matter.

The events described in subsection (2) above must relate to any of the following people:

- The employee's spouse (which includes a same-sex spouse);
- A parent, step-parent, foster parent, child, step-child, foster child, grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or the employee's spouse (which includes a same-sex spouse);
- The spouse (which includes a same sex spouse) of the employee's child;
- The employee's brother or sister; and
- Any relative of the employee not listed above who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance.

The terms "parent" and "spouse" are defined in ESA Part XIV, s. 45.

If the event or person to whom the event relates is not contained in the above list, the employee is not entitled to a personal emergency leave. For example, while an "urgent matter" in respect of a person specified in s. 50(2) entitles an employee to personal emergency leave, a personal urgent matter does not (unless the urgent matter also falls into the category of "illness, injury or medical emergency").

Death, Illness, Injury or Medical Emergency

For the most part, the meaning of these terms is self-evident. One issue that arises in respect of personal emergency leave taken because of the death of a specified family member or dependent relative is whether the leave days must be taken coincident with the death or can be taken at some later time. Section 50(1) states that an employee is entitled to the leave "because" of the death, illness, injury or medical emergency of an individual described in s. 50(2). As a result, time off work to attend a burial, internment of ashes or memorial service for the deceased that occurs at any time after the death qualifies as a personal emergency leave as it is taken because of the death.

An issue that arises with respect to leaves taken because of illness, injury or medical emergency is whether an employee is entitled to take personal emergency leave for pre-planned or so-called "elective" surgery. Because the surgery is scheduled ahead of time, it is not a medical "emergency". However, because, generally speaking, people undergo surgery for the treatment or prevention of a medical condition, it is Program policy that most surgeries, including those that are pre-planned or elective, that are performed to address or prevent manifestation of a medical condition (e.g., laser eye surgery to correct poor distance vision) are because of an illness or injury and, consequently, entitle an employee to personal emergency leave. This does not include medically unnecessary plastic surgeries that are performed for purely cosmetic reasons and that are not related to an underlying illness or injury; these types of surgeries are not because of an illness or injury.

Another issue that arises concerns doctor's appointments. An appointment for an annual check-up would generally not trigger an entitlement to leave unless it has been scheduled in respect of an illness, injury or medical emergency. However, if an employee had regularly scheduled appointments for the treatment or management of a chronic medical condition such as Crohn's disease or diabetes, those appointments would trigger an entitlement because they are absences related to an illness.

Regular prenatal appointments scheduled for an employee during the course of a normal, healthy pregnancy would not trigger an entitlement to personal emergency leave because a healthy pregnancy is not an illness. Note that in this regard, consideration should be given to the Ontario Human Rights Code, RSO 1990, c H.19 obligations to accommodate pregnant employees. Pursuant to the Code, an employer may be required to accommodate a pregnant employee's need for regular prenatal visits up to the point of undue hardship. However, if a pregnant employee has an illness or medical condition (even if related to or exacerbated by the pregnancy) they would be entitled to personal emergency leave as the doctor's appointments would be considered to be related to an illness.

However, see the discussion at subsections (12) and (13) below regarding evidence that an employee may be required to provide an employer to show that they are entitled to a personal emergency leave.

Whether an illness, injury or medical emergency was caused by the employee's own actions or by external factors beyond the employee's control is irrelevant to the question of an employee's entitlement to personal emergency leave. For example, an employee who broke her tailbone while tobogganing at night in an inebriated state would not be disentitled to the personal emergency leave just because the injury was caused by her own carelessness. While some may argue that in such cases the employee should not be entitled to personal emergency leave days, there is no basis in the legislation to support such a view, and it is Program policy that absences for illness or injury, caused by the employee's own action can count as personal emergency leave days.

See below for a discussion on "Designating Absences as Personal Emergency Leave."

Urgent Matter

One of the events that entitle an employee to personal emergency leave is an "urgent matter" that concerns any of the people listed in s. 50(2). Urgent matter is not defined in the ESA 2000. It is Program policy that one of the traits of an "urgent matter" is that the event be unplanned or out of the employee's control, and raise the possibility of serious negative consequences, including emotional harm, if it is not responded to. For example, it is an urgent matter if:

- An employee's nanny or babysitter calls in sick;
- The basement of an elderly parent floods and the parent is unable to deal with the situation; or

An employee has an appointment to meet with their child's counselor to discuss behaviour problems at school. The appointment is during the employee's shift, and the appointment could not be rescheduled outside of the employee's working hours.

Some examples of situations that are not an urgent matter include:

- An employee wishing to attend a brother's wedding; or

- An employee wishing to attend a child's play.

While both of these events are out of the employee's control, the employee's inability to attend these events does not raise the possibility of serious negative consequences.

When determining whether an event is an urgent matter, an objective standard is applied. That is, the employee's subjective perception of the urgency of the matter is not determinative. However, subjective factors and circumstances that are particular to the individual employee should be taken into account. The question to ask is, would a reasonable employee in the same circumstances as the employee in question have felt that the matter was an urgent one?

Relative of the Employee Who is Dependent on the Employee for Care or Assistance

Section 50(1) entitles employees to a personal emergency leave if there is a death, illness, injury, medical emergency or urgent matter concerning a person specified in paragraphs 1 to 6 of subsection 50(2), as well as a person described in paragraph 7 of subsection 50(2), that is, "a relative of the employee who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance".

Relative

The ESA 2000 does not specify how close the familial relationship has to be in order to meet this criterion. The person must only be a relative. In the absence of a definition of relative, the term must be interpreted in accordance with its plain, ordinary grammatical sense and general acceptance.

Black's Law Dictionary, 10th ed., defines a relative as “a person connected with another by blood or affinity; a person who is kin with another.”

Accordingly, it is Program policy that to be a relative of an employee, the individual should be related through blood or through marriage, adoption or common law relationships between people of the same or opposite sex who are not married. Conversely, it is Program policy that "relative" in s. 50(2), paragraph 7 will not include those individuals who are not connected either by blood or through marriage, adoption or a common law relationship, since including them would be extending the meaning of relative beyond the ordinary, commonly understood meaning.

With respect to common law relationships, the question arises as to how long the individuals have to live together in a conjugal relationship before it can be said that a spousal relationship exists, thus granting relative status to relatives of the employee's spouse. The answer is that there is no minimum amount of time that the individuals must be together in order to qualify as a common law spouse for the purpose of entitlement to personal emergency leave. Unlike the Family Law Act, RSO 1990, c F.3 which, for the purposes of support obligations, limits the definition of unmarried "spouse" to those people who have lived together continuously for three years or are in a relationship of some permanence if they are the birth or adoptive parents of a child, ESA Part XIV, s. 45 requires only that the individuals "live together in a conjugal relationship outside marriage".

Accordingly, it is Program policy that the relationship of relative can be established through a common law relationship between people of the same or opposite sex once there is a conjugal relationship, regardless of how long it has been. (Note that the entitlement to personal emergency leave does not arise solely by virtue of the illness, injury, medical emergency, death or urgent matter of a relative. If that relative is not in a category specified in paragraphs 1 through 6, that relative must be dependent on the employee for care or assistance before there is an entitlement to personal emergency leave. See the discussion below).

Dependent

An employee is entitled to take personal emergency leave with respect to the illness, injury, medical emergency, death or urgent matter of an individual not in a category specified in paragraphs 1 through 6, only where that individual is a relative who is "dependent on the employee for care or assistance". The ESA 2000 does not specify how dependent a relative has to be on the employee for this provision to apply. It only requires that there be a dependence for care or assistance. As individuals can be dependent on one another for care or assistance without being entirely dependent on that person, it is Program policy that this provision will apply to any relative who is reliant on the employee to some degree for care or assistance in meeting their basic living needs. The relative does not have to be completely reliant on the employee for all of their needs for this provision to apply.

There is no requirement that the relative be living with the employee for this provision to apply.

The type of event that entitles an employee to a personal emergency leave does not have to relate to the particular type of dependence the relative has on the employee in order to meet this criteria. For example, an employee's great-uncle depends on the employee to purchase his prescriptions and ensure he takes his medication. The employee wants to take personal emergency leave because her great-uncle's house is broken into and he needs assistance. The employee will be entitled to personal emergency leave even though the matter that is being responded to (a break-in) is unrelated to the type of dependence (ensuring that medication is taken).

Designating Absences as Personal Emergency Leave

For employees who are entitled to personal emergency leave as provided for in s. 50, questions have arisen as to whether an employee who is absent from work for one of the reasons listed in s. 50(1) must use one of their 10 days of personal emergency leave. It is Program policy that where an employee is entitled to personal emergency leave and is absent due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50(1), it is the employee (not the employer) that decides whether to designate an absence a personal emergency leave. An employee may be entitled to personal emergency leave and be absent from work due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50(1) and decide not to claim the absence as a personal emergency leave day. This would not be considered as contracting out of the ESA 2000 if an employee does not take advantage of their leave entitlements; the employee has merely chosen not to exercise them.

Step 1: The employee entitled to personal emergency leave is absent due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50(1).

Step 2: Did the employee know of their right to personal emergency leave?

If the answer is no, then the default is that the absence is considered to be personal emergency leave with the corresponding reprisal protection. An employee does not lose their right to any of the leaves provided for under the ESA 2000 because they were unaware of their entitlements.

If the employee is aware of their right to personal emergency leave go to step 3.

Step 3: Does the employee wish to designate the absence as personal emergency leave?

If the answer is yes, then the absence is a personal emergency leave with the corresponding reprisal protections.

If the employee does not wish to designate the absence as a personal emergency leave, and the absence cannot be considered an authorized absence on some other ground (e.g., another leave under the ESA 2000 or vacation authorized by the employer), the absence would have no statutory reprisal protection. For this reason, an employee who takes a day off for a reason that would qualify under s. 50 but who would prefer not to have the day charged against their personal emergency leave allotment may feel effectively forced into designating the day as such a leave. However, this in itself does not constitute any violation of the ESA 2000; it is not unlawful for an employer to inform an employee that should they not designate an absence as a personal emergency leave day, then it would be considered an unexcused absence that will lead to disciplinary action.

Note that if an employer offers a benefit plan for sick days, bereavement days or for any other event that any leave under the ESA 2000 can be taken, and the employee opts to claim benefits under the plan, it is Program policy that the employee has in effect designated the absence as a day of statutory leave and it will reduce the employee's ESA 2000 entitlement to that particular statutory leave accordingly. For example, if an employer offers four paid bereavement days under a benefits plan and the employee is absent four days because of the death of a parent and claims benefits under the plan, the employee is considered to have used four of their PEL days. Note also that there is nothing in the ESA 2000 that would prohibit an employer from subtracting any personal emergency leave days that are taken from any paid days provided by a benefit plan offered by an employer or from any other contractual leave entitlement (e.g. "flex days"). Notably, while this is not prohibited under the ESA 2000, an employment contract may address the issue of whether any PEL days count against any contractual leave entitlements.

Where a benefit plan offered by the employer constitutes a true greater right or benefit than the personal emergency leave standard, then the terms of the contract will apply instead of the standard (as the employee will have a greater contractual entitlement) and the issue of an employer drawing down on personal emergency days leave becomes moot.

While not prohibited under the ESA 2000, an employment contract may address the issue of whether any work-related injury governed by the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act (WSIA) may count against PEL days.

Advising Employer – ss. 50(3) & (4) – REPEALED

Subsections 50(3) and (4) were repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of these provisions is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provisions were in force.

50(3) An employee who wishes to take leave under this section shall advise their employer that they will be doing so.

(4) If the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it.

Section 50(3) requires employees to tell their employers ahead of time that they will be taking personal emergency leave. In circumstances where that cannot be done, the employee is required, pursuant to s. 50(4), to inform the employer as soon as possible after beginning the leave.

The ESA 2000 does not require the employee to advise the employer of the personal emergency leave in writing. Oral notice is sufficient.

In fact, the ESA 2000 does not specify any particular method by which the employer is to be advised that the employee will be taking personal emergency leave. Consequently, an employee would be complying with this section whether they, for example, advised the employer by phone, left a note on the manager's desk or had a colleague take a message to the employer on their behalf.

An employee does not lose their right to emergency leave if they fail to comply with ss. 50(3) or (4). An employee's entitlement to emergency leave arises by virtue of having one of a number of defined "emergencies", and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins does not negate that entitlement. This approach has been affirmed in a grievance arbitration decision by the Ontario Labour Relations Board – see International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 115 v The State Group Inc., 2019 CanLII 22129 (ON LRB). In that decision, the Vice-Chair found that notice to the employer is not a prerequisite to exercising the right to the leave. This approach is also consistent with the Program's long-standing policy in the pregnancy and parental leave context, where the structure of the entitlement and notice provisions are similar to these. See ESAPart XIV, s. 46(4) and s. 48(4).

An issue has arisen as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy), where the time off is a personal emergency leave under the ESA 2000. Sections 50(1) and (2) describe the employee's entitlement, i.e., the type of emergency situation and with respect to which individuals. Section 50(3) requires the employee taking personal emergency leave to advise the employer that they are taking the leave, and s. 50(4) provides that "if the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it." It is clear from s. 50(4) that the ESA 2000 contemplates situations where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of commencing the personal emergency leave. Part of the personal emergency leave entitlement under the ESA 2000 is the right to take the personal emergency leave even if advance notice cannot be given, with the proviso that the employee must advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it. The failure to give notice in advance of taking leave, when it would have been possible for the employee to do so, can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating ESA Part XVIII, s. 74. However, the following points should be borne in mind:

The employee's failure to give advance notice would not be a lawful basis on which to deprive the employee of the right to take the leave if the qualifying conditions in ss. 50(1) and (2) have been met. An employer could not, for example, take the position that failure to give advance notice when it would have been possible for the employee to do so will result in the time taken off not being counted as a personal emergency leave day.

Any discipline for failing to provide notice in situations where such notice is required under s. 50(3) (i.e., where s. 50(4) does not apply) would have to be appropriately linked to the failure to give advance notice and must not, in effect penalize the employee for exercising the right to leave. The motive for any discipline that the employer does impose must clearly be the employee's failure to give advance notice and not the taking of the leave itself.

In addition, an employer would be able to impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the personal emergency leave (before or after the leave), or if the employee provides notice of the leave so late that one wouldn't reasonably be able to say that it falls within s. 50(4). However, the employer's disciplinary action would have to be appropriate, and in no way a penalty or reprisal for the employee having taken the leave, but only for the failure to give notice. In this regard see Ryding-Regency Meat Packers Ltd. v. U.F.C.W., Local 1000A. In that case, the arbitrator concluded that s. 50(1) establishes an entitlement to leave where a person described in s. 50(2) is ill. The fact that the employee's grandmother was ill was not disputed. Because s. 50(1) and (2) are in no way linked to the notice requirements, the employee could be disciplined for not giving notice that he was taking or had taken leave but did not lose his entitlement to the emergency leave.

Limit – s. 50(5) – REPEALED

Subsection 50(5) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of this provision is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provision was in force.

50(5) Subject to subsection (6) an employee is entitled to take a total of two days of paid leave and eight days of unpaid leave under this section in each calendar year.

This section provides that an employee is entitled to take up to ten days of personal emergency leave every calendar year, and that two of the days of leave are to be paid. This provision also references s. 50(6) which limits the entitlement to paid leave to employees who have been employed for at least one week.

The ESA 2000 does not place any restrictions regarding whether the ten days have to be taken consecutively or individually. Employees can take personal emergency leave in part days (although see s. 50(7), which allows employers to deem one day's leave to be taken when an employee takes part of a day off work for personal emergency leave), entire days, or in periods of more than one day.

The question arises as to whether the tenday entitlement should be prorated for employees who are part-time, or who started their employment partway through a calendar year. There is nothing in the legislation to suggest that employees who are eligible for personal emergency leave should be entitled to less than ten days a calendar year in any of these situations. Accordingly, it is Program policy that there should be no pro-rating of the 10-day entitlement. The ESA 2000 does not provide for employees to be able to carry unused days of personal emergency leave from one calendar year over into the next calendar year.

It is also Program policy that an employee who quits or is terminated and who is subsequently re-hired by the same employer during the same calendar year is entitled to a "fresh" ten-day entitlement (including two paid days once employed for a week).

See "Greater Right or Benefit" at ESA Part III, s. 5 for a discussion of the relationship between the right to ten days' leave under this Part and rights to leaves under contracts and collective agreements. See subsection (1) above for a discussion on Designating Absences as Personal Emergency Leave.

Special rules relating to personal emergency leave pay

Automobile manufacturing/marshalling: per O Reg 502/06, s. 4, employees who work in the defined industry of automobile and automobile parts manufacturing, automobile marshalling and automobile parts warehousing have a different entitlement to personal emergency leave. These employees are entitled to seven days of personal emergency leave for an illness, injury or medical emergency related either to the employee or one of the individuals listed in O Reg 502/06, s. 4(4) or an urgent matter for any of the specified individuals. In addition, these defined industry employees are entitled to up to three days of leave because of the death of any of the specified individuals in O Reg 502/06, s. 4(4) each time there is such a death. O Reg 502/06 also establishes an exception to the requirement that the first two days of personal emergency leave are to be paid if certain criteria are met. See O Reg 502/06, s. 4 for more details.

Construction employees: per O Reg 285/01, s. 3.0.1, a "construction employee who works in the construction industry" is not entitled to personal emergency leave pay if the employee receives 0.8% of their hourly rate or wages for "personal emergency pay". However, the employee will remain entitled to 10 days of personal emergency leave per calendar year. See O Reg 285/01, s. 3.0.1 for more details.

When this section originally came into force on September 4, 2001, it provided that the entitlement was to 10 days' leave each year. This section was amended by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Hours of Work and Other Matters), 2004, SO 2004, c 21 (which came into force on March 1, 2005) to provide that the entitlement is to ten days of leave each calendar year. The section was further amended by the Fair Workplaces, Better Jobs Act, 2017 SO 2017, c22 on January 1, 2018 to provide for two days of paid leave.

Same, Entitlement to Paid Leave – s. 50(6) – REPEALED

Subsection 50(6) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of this provision is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provision was in force.

50(6) If an employee has been employed by an employer for less than one week, the following rules apply:

1. The employee is not entitled to paid days of leave under this section.

2. Once the employee has been employed by the employer for one week or longer, the employee is entitled to paid days of leave under subsection (5), and any unpaid days of leave that the employee has already taken in the calendar year shall be counted against the employee's entitlement under that subsection.

3. Subsection (8) does not apply until the employee has been employed by the employer for one week or longer.

This section limits the entitlement to paid leave to employees who have been employed by the employer for one week or more. An employee who takes personal emergency leave within the first week of employment will not be entitled to be paid for it, but will retain the entitlement to two paid days if further leave is taken later in the calendar year. The provision also clarifies that any unpaid days of leave that have been taken by an employee before they were employed for one week will be counted against the total entitlement of 10 days per calendar year. This section must be read in conjunction with s. 50(8), which requires that the first two days of leave within the calendar year must be paid; employees who have been employed for less than one week are specifically excluded from that rule until they have been employed for one week or longer.

For example, an employee takes two days of personal emergency leave in the first week of employment, and then two further days of leave in the sixth week of employment: the employee will be entitled to an unpaid, job-protected leave for the first two days, and will be entitled to paid, job-protected leave for days three and four (even though they are not the first two days of leave taken within the year).

Note that if the employer has a policy or the employee's contract of employment that provides, for example, three days of paid sick leave per year regardless of the length of employment and the employee was absent during the first week of employment for a reason that triggered both the policy/contract's sick leave provisions as well as personal emergency leave, the employee will be considered to have received their paid PEL entitlements. In other words, if an employee in the scenario above uses all three days of paid sick leave during the first week of employment for a personal illness, the employer is not prohibited by anything in the ESA 2000 from counting the paid sick days against the employee's entitlement per the employment contract, as well as three personal emergency leave days and two days of personal emergency leave pay from the employee's statutory entitlement. However, note that the amount of pay the employee received under the contract must at least equal the employee's entitlement to personal emergency leave pay under the ESA 2000.

Leave Deemed to be Taken in Entire Days – s. 50(7) – REPEALED

Subsection 50(7) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of this provision is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provision was in force.

50(7) If an employee takes any part of a day as paid or unpaid leave under this section, the employer may deem the employee to have taken one day of paid or unpaid leave on that day, as applicable, for the purposes of subsection (5) or (6).

Employees frequently do not need an entire work day to attend to the event that gave rise to the personal emergency leave, and will only take part of a day off as personal emergency leave. Section 50(6) allows an employer in this situation to count the part-day off work as an entire day's leave for the purpose of the 10-day leave entitlement. This is the only purpose for which the employer can deem the part day off work as an entire day's leave. It cannot deem the employee not to have worked at all on the day. The employee is entitled to be paid for the time that was actually worked and personal emergency leave pay with respect to the time that was not worked (if the partial absence was on a day for which the employee was entitled to personal emergency leave pay). As well, the hours that were worked will be counted for the purposes of, among other things, determining whether the relevant overtime threshold has been reached, whether the limits on, for example, the daily and weekly hours of work have been reached, and whether the daily, weekly/bi-weekly and in-between shifts rest requirements have been met.

For example, an employee goes home early from work because of the stomach flu (e.g., a four-hour day rather than his usual eight hours) and takes PEL In that case, the employer may attribute a full personal emergency leave day to the partial day's absence.

Just because an employer may attribute an entire day's leave to a part day of absence does not mean that the employee then has the right to take the entire day off if the emergency did not last the entire day. For example, an employee's shift is from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. They have to meet with his son's school principal on an urgent matter from 10 a.m. to 11 a.m. Their employer is entitled to count the absence as an entire day's personal emergency leave, but the employee must nevertheless return to work after the meeting is over. Employees have the right to be away from work under the personal emergency leave provisions of the ESA 2000 only for as long as the emergency lasts. After the emergency is over, the employee's normal obligations to attend at work are resumed.

Note that this provision allows the employer to attribute one day's leave to a part day of absence. It does not require the employer to do so.

An issue has arisen as to whether an employer could exercise its discretion and deem a partial day absence as a full day for some employees, but not for others, or whether this might allow employers to selectively punish employees who have too many absences in violation of the reprisal provisions of the ESA 2000.

The answer will depend on the facts. In particular, why did the employer treat the employees differently? Where an employer deems a full day's absence for some employees, but not for others, it is a question of fact as to whether the employer would be in violation of the ESA 2000. For instance, if the employer counts a three-hour personal emergency leave as a full day's leave for employee A but not for employee B, who also takes a three-hour personal emergency leave because the employer considers employee B to be a better worker than employee A, although this might be unfair as between employee A and B, it would not be a violation of the ESA 2000, as it would not be reprisal for exercising a right under the ESA 2000. If, on the other hand, the motivation for the differential treatment was that Employee A frequently took personal emergency leave of only a few hours, and the employer assigned a full day's absence to these short leaves as a way to ensure employee A used up all of their statutory entitlement as soon as possible because the employer found it inconvenient for the employee to be away for many short periods of time, that would be an unlawful reprisal.

Paid Days First – s. 50(8) – REPEALED

Subsection 50(8) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of this provision is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provision was in force.

50(8) The two paid days must be taken first in a calendar year before any of the unpaid days can be taken under this section.

This section requires that the employee be paid for the first two days of leave. The employer does not have the discretion to pay the employee, for example, for the ninth and tenth days of leave (or any other days) instead of the first two days (unless s. 50(6) applies).

The entitlement would exist regardless of when the paid leave days are taken, for example, if an employee took the first two days of leave on the last two days of a calendar year, the employee could also take the first two days of the following calendar year as paid leave providing a qualifying event had occurred involving either the employee or a person described in s. 50(2). In this case, the employee could be entitled to up to four days of paid leave, potentially within the same week.

Note also that there is no requirement for an employee to request payment for either of the first two days of the leave; the entitlement to personal emergency leave pay flows automatically from the ESA 2000. See International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 115 v The State Group Inc., 2019 CanLII 22129 (ON LRB).

Personal Emergency Leave Pay – s. 50(9) – REPEALED

Subsection 50(9) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of this provision is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provision was in force.

50(9) Subject to subsections (10) and (11), if an employee takes a paid day of leave under this section, the employer shall pay the employee,

(a) either,

1. the wages the employee would have earned had they not taken the leave, or
2. if the employee receives performance-related wages, including commissions or a piece work rate, the greater of the employee's hourly rate, if any, and the minimum wage that would have applied to the employee for the number of hours the employee would have worked had they not taken the leave; or

(b) if some other manner of calculation is prescribed, the amount determined using that manner of calculation,

This section sets out the manner of calculating the amount of personal emergency leave pay.

Note, subject to subsection (10) and (11), the calculation entitles employees only to wages they would have earned if they were at work and not on personal emergency leave: this is read in conjunction with s. 50(7), and will allow an employer to deem a partial day personal emergency leave absence as a complete day of leave, but only require the employer to pay personal emergency leave pay representing the amount of time at work missed as well as any wages the employee earns while actively at work on that day. Per s. 50(10), overtime pay and shift premium amounts are not to be included in personal emergency leave pay even if the employee "would have earned" these if the employee worked. Per s. 50(11), if a paid day of personal emergency leave falls on a public holiday, the employee is not entitled to premium pay for any leave taken. Personal emergency leave pay for a day can be any amount from a single hour's pay or less to an entire day of wages, depending on how much leave is taken.

At this time, no other manner of calculating personal emergency leave pay has been prescribed.

Calculating Personal Emergency Leave Pay

In order to determine how much personal emergency leave pay an employee is entitled to, two things need to be established:

1. How much personal emergency leave was taken, or the number of hours in a "work day" minus the number of hours worked, if any, and
2. How personal emergency leave pay will be calculated, either as i. What an employee's wages would have been for the work day or
    ii. For employees paid by "performance-related wages", either an hourly rate if there is one, or the applicable minimum wage if not.

Length of the Work Day

If the employee:

- Works a regular work day, with set hours, this is the length of the day for the purpose of calculating personal emergency leave pay.
- Is scheduled to work a particular number of hours on the day on which personal emergency leave is taken, the length of the work day will be what was scheduled, even if the employee regularly works a set number of hours that is different from the scheduled shift.

Amount of Personal Emergency Leave Taken

The amount of personal emergency leave taken on a single day is calculated by deducting the number of hours actually worked, if any, from the total number of hours in the work day. For example, if it is determined that the employee was scheduled to work nine hours on the day, and they took five hours to deal with a personal illness, they would be entitled to four hours of wages and five hours of personal emergency leave pay. If the same employee missed the entire day, they would be entitled to nine hours of personal emergency leave pay.

The situation may arise when an employee may be required to report to work at a particular time, but does not have a shift or work period of a specified length. In that case, when assessing the amount of wages an employee would have earned had they not taken PEL in order to determine the amount of PEL pay owing, the employer must make a reasonable estimate of how long the employee would have worked on that day. For example, it could be reasonable for an employer to take an average of the number of hours worked by all the employees in the same position as the employee who took leave on the day, or if another employee was called in to replace the employee on the day, it could be reasonable to refer to the length of that employee's shift.

When an employment standards officer is investigating a claim from an employee who believes they received less personal emergency leave pay than the ESA 2000 requires (perhaps because the employer took the position that the business was not busy on that particular day and the employer intended to send the employee home early) the officer makes a determination on whether the amount paid by the employer was reasonable. Evidence may include direct evidence from other employees, receipts, point of sale records, customer or production logs, or the staff schedule from the day in question. If the employer has a staff rotation policy and employees are sent home early in a particular order when the business is not busy, was the employee the next person on the list?

Wages the employee would have earned that day had they not taken the leave"

For employees who are not paid by performance-related wages:

Hourly Wage (Non-Salaried Employees)

If the employee is paid by an hourly wage, the amount of personal emergency leave pay is the number of hours of personal emergency leave x the hourly rate.

Example 1: Employee with a single rate of pay

- Employee's wage rate is $17.25 per hour.
- Employee normally works 8.5 hours in a day. The employee left work to take personal emergency leave after working 1.5 hours

Entitlement:

- Employee normally works 8.5 hours per day, but worked 1.5 hours and took personal emergency leave for the rest of the day = 7 hours of personal emergency leave
- Personal Emergency Leave ("PEL") Pay: 7 hours x $17.25 = $120.75
- Note that the employee is also entitled to wages for hours actually worked on the same day = 1.5 hours x $17.25)

Example 2: Employee with more than one rate of pay

- Employee is paid $16.00/hour for Job "A" and $17.50/hour for Job "B"

- Employee is scheduled to work 10 hours: first five hours on Job "A" and second five hours on Job "B"

Entitlement:

- The employee worked for the first three hours doing Job A, and took the rest of the day as personal emergency leave: 10 hours – 3 hours = 7
- Of the 7 hours of personal emergency leave, 2 were Job A and 5 were Job B
- PEL Pay: (2 hours x $16.00 = $32.00) + (5 hours x $17.50 = $87.50) = $119.50
- Note that the employee is also entitled to wages for hours actually worked: (3 hours x $16.00 = $48.00)

Salaried employees

If the employee is paid by salary and has a regular number of days within a pay period and regular hours, the amount of personal emergency leave pay is:

- If the employee took a full day or shift as personal emergency leave, the employee's daily rate (salary ÷ number of days in a pay period)
- If the employee took part of a day or shift as personal emergency leave, the employee's hourly rate (salary ÷ number of hours in a pay period) x number of hours of personal emergency leave

This is, in effect, salary continuance. If an employer pays an employee with a fixed salary the normal amount of pay for a week with a day of full or partial personal emergency leave in it, the personal emergency leave pay provisions of the ESA 2000 will be satisfied.

Examples: Salaried employees with regular number of days and hours within pay period

Example 1:
An employee is paid $1500.00 per bi-weekly pay period and works a five-day week. One day of personal emergency leave is taken. Personal emergency leave pay = $1500.00 ÷ 10 = $150.00.

Example 2:
An employee is paid $1500.00 per bi-weekly pay period and works a 40 hour week. The employee takes four hours of personal emergency leave. Hourly rate: $1500.00 ÷ 80 = $18.75/hour. Personal emergency leave pay: $18.75 x 4 = $75.00. Note that the employee is also entitled to wages earned for the part of the day that they worked.

Impact of top-ups on the PEL pay calculations

A situation may arise where the employee receives a "top-up" or subsidy from a third party in addition to an hourly rate of pay or salary. For example, an employee who works in a daycare centre may be paid $16.00/hour plus $2.00/hour as part of a municipal or provincial government initiative to raise wages for workers in the sector. Depending on how the subsidy is structured, it may or may not be considered wages the employee would have earned for the purposes of personal emergency leave pay. If the employee is paid the subsidy directly by an entity other than the employer, then the subsidy may not be considered wages that the employee would have earned because they are not wages being paid by the employer. If, however, the subsidy and the hourly rate are a term of the contract of employment with the employer (oral or written, express or implied), then the subsidy amount must be included in the calculation of personal emergency leave pay.

Impact of partial payments by benefit plan providers on PEL pay

Another situation that may arise where the employer has a benefit plan in place that pays benefits to employees when events occur that trigger both an entitlement to benefits under the plan as well as personal emergency leave pay under the ESA 2000. It is Program policy that the employer may take benefit plan payments into account when fulfilling its obligation to provide personal emergency leave pay. What is key is that the employee receives pay for any paid days of leave in accordance with s. 50.

For example, a benefit plan pays a benefit that equals 75% of an employee's wages when the employee takes a day off for personal illness. In order to comply with s. 50(9), the employer would be required to ensure that the employee received their full entitlement to personal emergency leave pay: if the employee missed an entire day of work to take the leave, the employer would be required to pay the additional 25% of the wages that the employee would have earned had they not taken the leave.

Performance-related wages

The amount of personal emergency leave pay for an employee paid fully or partly by a system of wage calculation related to performance is the greater of the employee's "hourly rate, if any" and the minimum wage that would have applied to the employee. "Performance-related wages" can include commission only, commission plus an hourly wage, piece work, or compensation as a flat-rate mechanic. An "hourly rate" refers to an hourly rate set by an employment contract.

Example 1: Employee earns an hourly rate plus commission

- Employee earns $16.00/hour plus 2% commission on sales,
- Employee takes 6.5 hours of personal emergency leave
- PEL Pay: $16.00 x 6.5 = $104.00
- Note that the employee is also entitled to his/her hourly wage for any hours worked + commission earned while working that day, if any

Example 2: Employee paid entirely by commission

- Employee earns 10% commission on all sales
- Employee is scheduled to work eight hours, works five hours and makes sales of $500.00 and then takes three hours of personal emergency leave
- PEL Pay: $Applicable minimum wage rate x 3
- Note that the employee is also entitled to the 10% commission on the $500.00 sales that the employee made that day

Example 3: Employee is a homeworker paid by piece work

- Employee earns $3.50 per phone call answered
- Employee is scheduled to work 8.5 hours, works two hours, answers nine phone calls, and takes 6.5 hours of personal emergency leave
- PEL Pay: $Applicable minimum wage x 6.5
- Note that the employee is also entitled to $3.50 x 9 for actual work performed on the day

Example 4: Employee is a Flat Rate Mechanic

- Employee is scheduled to work nine hours
- Employee is paid a flat book rate of $16.00/hour for tune ups (calculated to take two hours to complete). Employee completes two tune ups in three hours and takes the rest of the shift as personal emergency leave.
- PEL Pay: $Applicable minimum wage x 6
- Note that the employee is also entitled to $16.00 x 4 = $64.00, wages earned on the day)

Personal Emergency Leave Where Higher Rate of Wages – s. 50(10) – REPEALED

Subsection 50(10) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of this provision is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provision was in force.

50(10) If a paid day of leave under this section falls on a day or at a time of day when overtime pay, a shift premium, or both, would be payable by the employer,

(a) the employee is not entitled to more than their regular rate for any leave taken under this section; and

(b) the employee is not entitled to the shift premium for any leave taken under this section.

This section excludes overtime pay or a shift premium (for example, an extra amount paid for working evenings or weekends) from inclusion when calculating personal emergency leave pay. The employee would be entitled to be paid for hours of personal emergency leave using their regular rate of pay, and not for example 1.5 times their regular rate per the overtime provisions of the ESA 2000.

Example 1: Employee scheduled to work overtime hours on a day when personal emergency leave was taken

- Employee is paid $16.00/hour, has already worked 40 hours in a work week and is scheduled to work an additional shift of eight hours on a Saturday.
- Employee does not work any of the scheduled shift and takes personal emergency leave
- Employee would have earned wages for eight hours of work had they not taken the leave (4 of which would have exceeded the overtime threshold of 44 in a week)
- PEL Pay: 8 hours x $16.00/hour = $128.00

Similarly, if an employee is scheduled to work hours that would normally attract a shift premium, if the employee misses all or some of the shift to take personal emergency leave, then personal emergency leave pay will be calculated on the employee's base rate and would not include the shift premium.

Example 2: Employee entitled to shift premium pay on a day where personal emergency leave was taken

- Employee is paid $15.50/hour, plus an additional $2.50/hour for night shifts.

- Employee is scheduled to work a midnight to 8:00am shift, calls in sick and does not work any hours.
- Employee would have earned wages for eight hours of work had they not taken the leave
- PEL Pay: 8 hours x $15.50 = $124.00

Personal Emergency Leave on Public Holiday – s. 50(11) – REPEALED

Subsection 50(11) was repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of this provision is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provision was in force.

50(11) If a paid day of leave under this section falls on a public holiday, the employee is not entitled to premium pay for any leave taken under this section.

Under ESA Part X, Public Holidays, employees who agree to, or are required to work on a public holiday may be entitled to receive premium pay of at least one and one half times their regular rate for hours worked on that day. The effect of this subsection is that – despite the entitlement in s. 50(9) to be paid "the wages the employee would have earned had they not taken the leave" – the employee is not entitled to any premium pay that they would have earned by working on the public holiday had the leave not been taken.

Note that in certain situations, per ESA Part X, Public Holidays, the onus is on the employee to prove that they had "reasonable cause" for not working all or part of a scheduled shift either on a public holiday, or the "first and last" shifts before or after a public holiday. Also note that it is Program policy that if an employee takes personal emergency leave, this will constitute reasonable cause for the purposes of Part X. This is subject to s. 50(13) which prohibits an employer from requiring that the employee provide a certificate from a qualified health practitioner as evidence of an entitlement to PEL. Therefore an employer can only require an employee to provide other evidence "reasonable in the circumstances" per s. 50(12).

Example:

An employee was scheduled to work on a public for nine hours and was going to be paid public holiday pay plus premium pay for the nine hours. The employee worked for three hours and took six hours as personal emergency leave. The employee earns $15.00/hour.

- Entitlement: Premium pay for hours worked on the public holiday: $15.00 x 1.5 x 3 = $67.50
- Personal emergency leave pay: public holiday pay calculated in accordance with s. 24
- Note that the employee is not entitled to premium pay for the six hours taken as PEL

For more information on public holiday entitlements, please see ESA Part X.

Evidence – s. 50(12), Same – s. 50(13) – REPEALED

Subsections 50(12) and (13) were repealed effective January 1, 2019 as a result of the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018. The discussion of these provisions is being maintained in this publication since employees may still have a complaint relating to a situation that arose when the provisions were in force.

50(12) Subject to subsection (13), an employer may require an employee who takes leave under this section to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances that the employee is entitled to the leave.

50(13) An employer shall not require an employee to provide a certificate from a qualified health practitioner as evidence under subsection (12).

Section 50(12) gives an employer some ability to require an employee to provide proof that they are or were entitled to take personal emergency leave, subject to the limitation imposed by subsection (13). The employer can require an employee to provide evidence that is reasonable in the circumstances that they are or were entitled to take the leave.

Evidence of entitlement to personal emergency leave may take many forms. For example, it could be a death certificate, or a note from a daycare provider, school or other care facility. Receipts could also constitute proof of the emergency, e.g., an invoice from a plumber who was called in to deal with a flooded basement.

However, an employee cannot be required to provide a "certificate" (or medical note) from a qualified health practitioner – see s. 50(0.1) for more information on the definition of a qualified health practitioner. Note that s. 50(13) states that an employer "shall not require" a medical certificate from a qualified health practitioner: this prohibition applies to both a single request in relation to a specific absence, or the inclusion of such a requirement in an absenteeism management policy established by an employer. An employee may provide a certificate or medical certificate, but any evidence that an employee was threatened with discipline for failing to provide a note "voluntarily" would contribute to a finding that a reprisal under ESA Part XVIII, s. 74 had occurred.

It may, however, be reasonable in the circumstances for an employee taking personal emergency leave relating to their own illness, injury or medical emergency to be required to provide something other than a certificate or medical note issued by a qualified health practitioner.

What will be reasonable in the circumstances will depend on all of the circumstances in any given situation. In FAG Bearings Ltd. v Francis, 2005 CanLII 35873 (ON LRB) the employer had a disciplinary policy that provided for a four-step progression for any infraction of a company rule or policy. Under the disciplinary policy, an employee's employment would be terminated if there was a fourth disciplinary incident in a rolling twelve-month period. In this case, the third disciplinary incident was a response to the claimant failing to provide a doctor's note when he left work early because of back pain (note that, at the time, the ESA 2000 permitted an employer to require "evidence reasonable in the circumstances" of entitlement to the leave, which could include medical evidence). The employer argued that the discipline was a consequence of the employee's failure to provide a doctor's note within a reasonable period of time following the absence, and not because he had exercised a right to emergency leave under the ESA 2000. The employee argued that he should have been provided with more time to provide a note. The Ontario Labour Relations Board concluded that the requirement to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances contemplates that both the evidence required and the timelines for providing it be reasonable in the circumstances. The Board noted that the right to leave would be defeated if an employee who is legitimately entitled to it could be disciplined for failing to comply with an unreasonable time frame set by their employer. Conversely, the employer's right to verify entitlement to a leave would also be defeated if it could not require the employee to provide the evidence within a reasonable period of time. In this case, the Board found that the time to provide the evidence had been reasonable and the discipline was imposed solely as a consequence of the employee's failure to provide evidence as required under the ESA 2000. On that basis, the Board found the employer had not violated

ESA Part XVIII, s. 74, since the discipline was not related to the exercise of the employee's right to leave under s. 50(1).

Another helpful decision in this regard is Re Tilbury Assembly Ltd. and United Auto Workers, Local 251. This decision also pre-dates the coming into force of subsection (13) and the limit placed on medical evidence. There, an employee with an absenteeism problem had left her shift early complaining of a severe headache. The employer had a policy that this employee was required to provide a physician's note in all cases of absence due to personal illness because of her history of absenteeism. In this instance, the employee did not obtain such a note, but instead bought some extra-strength pain relievers and took them and went to bed in a dark room, which was how she customarily dealt with this type of headache, which she experienced two or three times a year. Although the employee provided a note and receipt from the pharmacist from whom she purchased the pain relievers, the employer disciplined her for the failure to produce a physician's note. The employee grieved. The arbitrator held that the ESA 2000 gives an employer a right to require an employee to produce evidence, but only such evidence as was reasonable in the circumstances. While the employee's record of absences was one circumstance to be taken into account in determining what was reasonable, it was outweighed by the fact that the employee did have a note and receipt from a pharmacist, by the fact that her experience with the type of headache she had indicated that taking the pain relievers and going to bed in a dark room would provide effective treatment and by the fact that employee would likely face a considerable wait in a hospital emergency facility in order to see a doctor for her headache. The arbitrator found that the employer's requirement of a note from a physician was not reasonable in these circumstances and reversed the discipline.

Evidence Reasonable in the Circumstances

Evidence that is reasonable in the circumstances will be fact-specific. The factors and principles that may be relevant when assessing "reasonableness" are:

- The duration of the leave. For example, it may not be reasonable, depending on all of the circumstances, for an employer to require an employee who was away from work for only one day to provide evidence.
- Whether there is a pattern of absences or a record of absenteeism. For example, if an employee claims to need repeated dental work and takes a personal emergency leave every Friday afternoon in the summer, it may be reasonable for the employer to require some proof of the procedures even though the leave is of short duration.
- Whether any evidence is available.
- Where evidence is available, but only with some difficulty, whether it is reasonable to expect the employee to obtain the evidence – see the Re Tilbury Assembly Ltd. and United Auto Workers, Local 251, discussed above, although note that this decision pre-dates subsection (11). Another example might be where an employee took a leave for medical reasons after seeing a doctor or other person who falls into the definition of "qualified health practitioner"; it likely would not be reasonable for the employer to expect the employee to see a non-"qualified health practitioner" in addition for the sole purpose of getting a note.
- The cost of the evidence. For example, it may not be reasonable, depending on all of the circumstances, for an employer to require an employee who earns minimum wage to obtain a copy of a police report for a motor vehicle accident if the police station charges $25 for it.
- The employee had earlier asked for the time off for non-emergency leave reasons for the time at which the absence occurred but was denied.

- The employee had announced plans in advance to miss work.

Evidence relating to court proceedings

In addition, the Youth Criminal Justice Act, SC 2002, c 1("YCJA") prohibits the disclosure of any information that may identify a young person who has committed or is alleged to have committed an offence, a young person who is a victim of the offence, or a young person who is called as a witness in any proceeding in connection with the alleged offence. Employees who take a personal emergency leave because a young person specified in s. 50(2) is involved in a YCJA matter are not obliged to divulge to the employer (or officer) any information regarding the identity of the young person (e.g., the name or their relationship to the employee). Instead, it is Program policy that it would be reasonable in the circumstances that the employee state that a relative was involved in a court proceeding.

Evidence relating to reasonable cause for PEL before, after, or on a public holiday

Note that, in certain situations per ESA Part X, Public Holidays, the onus is on the employee to prove that they had reasonable cause for not working all or part of a scheduled shift either on a public holiday, or the first and last shifts before or after a public holiday. Also note that it is Program policy that if an employee takes personal emergency leave, this will constitute reasonable cause for the purposes of ESA Part X. This is subject to s. 50(13) which prohibits an employer from requiring that the employee provide a certificate from a qualified health practitioner as evidence of an entitlement to PEL. Therefore, an employer can only require an employee to provide other evidence reasonable in the circumstances per s. 50(12).

Evidence relating to return to work requirements

In some circumstances, an employee may be required by an employer to provide evidence that they are fit to return to work after an illness or injury. While s. 50(13) prohibits an employer from requiring an employee to provide a certificate from a qualified health practitioner, this is in relation to determining the employee's eligibility for s. 50 entitlements only. If an employer requires the employee to provide a medical note or certificate only for the purpose of confirming that the employee is capable of performing regular or modified duties before the employee returns to work, this would not be a violation of s. 50(13).

Evidence relating to benefits under a contract of employment that exceed ESA 2000 entitlements

If an employer provides paid sick days in excess of the requirement under the ESA 2000 for two days of personal emergency leave taken in the calendar year to be paid, whether or not the prohibition against requiring a certificate from a qualified health practitioner (a "medical note") applies depends on whether the contract of employment offers a greater right or benefit under ESA Part III, s. 5(2).

If the sick day provisions contained in the employee's contract of employment are a greater right or benefit after all of its features have been compared with the personal emergency leave provisions in the ESA 2000, then the terms of the employment contract will apply and the prohibition contained in ss. 50(13) will not apply to any of the absences. In that case, if the terms include a requirement for the employee to provide a medical note upon request, the employee will be required to do so in accordance with the contract of employment and the prohibition contained in s. 50(13) will not apply.

If the benefit offered by the contract of employment is not a greater right or benefit, then the provisions of the ESA 2000 will apply. Per s. 50(13) the employer cannot require the employee to provide a medical note for the purpose of proving the employee's entitlement to PEL for any of the ten statutory personal emergency leave days – paid or unpaid – to which the employee is entitled. If, however, a contract of employment provides for paid sick days over and above the two days of paid PEL an employee is entitled to under the ESA 2000, the employer is not prohibited from requiring a medical note as a condition for providing pay for those additional paid sick days. The employer may not require the note as evidence that the employee is entitled to take the time off as personal emergency leave.

Consider the example of a contract of employment that offers a benefit of six paid sick days per calendar year. Assume that the contract does not provide a greater right or benefit and that s. 50 therefore applies. If an employee takes their first two days of personal emergency leave in the calendar year for personal illness, the employer would be prohibited from requiring a medical note from the employee and the employee would be entitled to two paid days of personal emergency leave pay (provided they have worked for the employer for one week or longer). If the same employee takes the four more days of personal emergency leave in the same calendar year for personal illness, although the employer is prohibited from requiring a medical note to support the employee's eligibility for the leave, the employer is not prohibited from requiring a medical note to support the employee's contractual entitlement to the pay for the remaining four sick days. Because the pay for the last four sick days are over and above the employee's entitlement to personal emergency leave pay under the ESA 2000, the prohibition in s. 50(13) does not apply to that pay. However, the prohibition in s. 50(13) will continue to apply to the entitlement to take the leave of absence.

Another example is where an employer offers 12 days of personal leave or sick leave under the contract of employment within a calendar year. Assume that the contract does not provide a greater right or benefit and that s. 50 therefore applies. The prohibition applies only to the ten statutory personal emergency leave days the employee is entitled to. The prohibition in s. 50(13) would not apply to the 11th or 12th absences.

ESA Part XIV Section 50.0.1 – Family Responsibility Leave

Family Responsibility Leave – s. 50.0.1(1)

50.0.1 (1) An employee who has been employed by an employer for at least two consecutive weeks is entitled to a leave of absence without pay because of any of the following:

1. The illness, injury or medical emergency of an individual described in subsection (3).

2. An urgent matter that concerns an individual described in subsection (3).

See one section below for the discussion of subsection (2).

Family Members – s. 50.0.1(3)

50.0.1 (3) Subsection (1) applies with respect to the following individuals:

1. The employee's spouse.

2. A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee's spouse.

3. A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.

4. A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or of the employee's spouse.

5. The spouse of a child of the employee.

6. The employee's brother or sister.

7. A relative of the employee who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance.

The family responsibility leave provisions were introduced into the ESA 2000 effective January 1, 2019 by the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018.

Sections 50.0.1(1) and 50.0.1(3) set out the qualifying conditions an employee must meet in order to be entitled to an unpaid family responsibility leave. To qualify, the employee must have been employed by the employer for at least two consecutive weeks, the need for the leave must be because of one of the events specified in subsection (1) and the event must relate to one of the individuals specified in subsection (3).

Note that, pursuant to O Reg 285/01, s. 3, certain employees who meet the qualifying criteria for a family responsibility leave will not be entitled to take it if taking it would constitute an act of professional misconduct or a dereliction of professional duty. Section 3 of O Reg 285/01 reads:

3. Sections 50, 50.0.1 and 50.0.2 of the Act do not apply to any of the following persons in circumstances in which the exercise of the entitlement would constitute an act of professional misconduct or a dereliction of professional duty:

1. A person described in clause 2(1) (a), (c), (d) or (e).

2. A person employed as a registered practitioner of a health profession set out in Schedule 1 to the Regulated Health Professions Act, 1991, including a person described in clause 2(1)(b).

See O Reg 285/01. s. 3 for more information.

What Triggers an Entitlement to Family Responsibility Leave

Sections 50.0.1(1) and 50.0.1(3) list the events, and the people to whom the events must relate, that entitle employees who have been employed for at least two consecutive weeks to take family responsibility leave. The list is exhaustive. If an event or the person to whom the event relates is not listed in ss. 50.0.1(1) and 50.0.1(3), the employee is not entitled to family responsibility leave. If the employee has not been employed for at least two consecutive weeks, the employee is not entitled to family responsibility leave.

Employees can take a family responsibility leave of absence because of the following events:

- Illness,
- Injury,
- Medical emergency, or
- Urgent matter.

The events described in the list above must relate to one of the following people:

- The employee's spouse (which includes a same-sex spouse);
- A parent, step-parent, foster parent, child, step-child, foster child, grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or the employee's spouse (which includes a same-sex spouse);

- The spouse (which includes a same sex spouse) of the employee's child;
- The employee's brother or sister; and
- Any relative of the employee not listed above who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance.

The terms "parent" and "spouse" are defined ESA Part XIV, s. 45.

If the event or person to whom the event relates is not contained in the above list, the employee is not entitled to a family responsibility leave. For example, while an urgent matter in respect of a person specified in s. 50.0.1(3) entitles an employee to family responsibility leave, a personal urgent matter does not.

Illness, Injury or Medical Emergency

In general, the meaning of these terms is self-evident.

One issue that arises with respect to leaves taken because of illness, injury or medical emergency is whether an employee is entitled to take family responsibility leave because their relative has a pre-planned or so-called "elective" surgery. Because the surgery is scheduled ahead of time, it is not a medical emergency. However, because, generally speaking, people undergo surgery for the treatment or prevention of a medical condition, it is Program policy that most surgeries, including those that are pre-planned or elective, that are performed to address or prevent manifestation of a medical condition (e.g., laser eye surgery to correct poor distance vision) are because of an illness or injury. Consequently, an employee is entitled to family responsibility leave if a specified relative of the employee undergoes pre-planned or elective surgery. This does not include medically unnecessary plastic surgeries that are performed for purely cosmetic reasons and that are not related to an underlying illness or injury; these types of surgeries are not because of an illness or injury.

Another issue that arises concerns doctor's appointments. An employee's relative who has an appointment for an annual check-up would generally not trigger an entitlement to leave for the employee unless it has been scheduled in respect of an illness, injury or medical emergency. However, if the relative had regularly scheduled appointments for the treatment or management of a chronic medical condition such as Crohn's disease or diabetes, those appointments would trigger an entitlement for the employee because they are absences related to an illness.

In the case of a relative for whom an employee may take family responsibility leave, the employer's right to request evidence that the employee is eligible to take the leave will be limited. See s. 50.0.1(7) for more details.

For employees who are entitled to family responsibility leave as provided for in s. 50.0.1, questions have arisen as to whether an employee who is absent from work for one of the events listed in s. 50.0.1(1) in relation to a person specified in s. 50.0.1(3) must use one of their three days of family responsibility leave. A discussion of this issue is set out at s. 50.0.1(4) below – see Designating Absences as Family Responsibility Leave.

Urgent Matter

One of the events that entitle an employee to family responsibility leave is an urgent matter that concerns any of the people listed in s. 50.0.1(3). "Urgent matter" is not defined in the ESA 2000. It is Program policy that one of the traits of an urgent matter is that the event be unplanned or out of the employee's control, and raise the possibility of serious negative consequences, including emotional harm, if it is not responded to. For example, it is an urgent matter if:

- An employee's nanny or babysitter calls in sick;
- The basement of an elderly parent floods and the parent is unable to deal with the situation; or
- An employee has an appointment to meet with their child's counselor to discuss behaviour problems at school. The appointment is during the employee's shift, and the appointment could not be rescheduled outside of the employee's working hours.

Some examples of situations that are not an urgent matter include:

- An employee wishing to attend a brother's wedding; or
- An employee wishing to attend a child's play.

While both of these events are out of the employee's control, the employee's inability to attend these events does not raise the possibility of serious negative consequences.

When determining whether an event is an urgent matter, an objective standard is applied. That is, the employee's subjective perception of the urgency of the matter is not determinative. However, subjective factors and circumstances that are particular to the individual employee should be taken into account. The question to ask is, would a reasonable employee in the same circumstances as the employee in question have felt that the matter was an urgent one?

Relative of the Employee Who is Dependent on the Employee for Care or Assistance

Section 50.0.1(1) entitles employees to a family responsibility leave if there is an illness, injury, medical emergency or urgent matter concerning a person specified in paragraphs 1 to 7 of s. 50.0.1(3), including "a relative of the employee who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance".

Relative

The ESA 2000 does not specify how close the familial relationship has to be in order to meet this criterion. The person must only be a "relative". In the absence of a definition of relative, the term must be interpreted in accordance with its plain, ordinary grammatical sense and general acceptance.

Black's Law Dictionary, 10th ed., defines a relative as “a person connected with another by blood or affinity; a person who is kin with another.”

Accordingly, it is Program policy that to be a relative of an employee, the individual should be related through blood or through marriage, adoption or common law relationships between people of the same or opposite sex who are not married. Conversely, it is Program policy that “relative” in s. 50(2), paragraph 7 will not include those individuals who are not connected either by blood or through marriage, adoption or a common law relationship, since including them would be extending the meaning of relative beyond the ordinary, commonly understood meaning.

With respect to common law relationships, the question arises as to how long the individuals have to live together in a conjugal relationship before it can be said that a spousal relationship exists, thus granting relative status to relatives of the employee's spouse. The answer is that there is no minimum amount of time that the individuals must be together in order to qualify as a common law spouse for the purpose of entitlement to personal emergency leave. Unlike the Family Law Act, RSO 1990, c F.3 which, for the purposes of support obligations, limits the definition of unmarried "spouse" to those people who have lived together continuously for three years or are in a relationship of some permanence if they are the birth or adoptive parents of a child, ESA Part XIV, s. 45 requires only that the individuals "live together in a conjugal relationship outside marriage".

Accordingly, it is Program policy that the relationship of relative can be established through a common law relationship between people of the same or opposite sex once there is a conjugal relationship, regardless of how long it has been.

Note that the entitlement to family responsibility leave does not arise solely by virtue of the illness, injury, medical emergency or urgent matter of a relative. If that relative is not in a category specified in paragraphs 1 through 6, that relative must be dependent on the employee for care or assistance before there is an entitlement to family responsibility leave. See the discussion below.

Dependent

An employee is entitled to take family responsibility leave with respect to the illness, injury, medical emergency or urgent matter of an individual not in a category specified in paragraphs 1 through 6, only where that individual is a relative who is "dependent on the employee for care or assistance". The ESA 2000 does not specify how dependent a relative has to be on the employee for this provision to apply. It only requires that there be a dependence for care or assistance. As individuals can be dependent on one another for care or assistance without being entirely dependent on that person, it is Program policy that this provision will apply to any relative who is reliant on the employee to some degree for care or assistance in meeting their basic living needs. The relative does not have to be completely reliant on the employee for all of their needs for this provision to apply.

There is no requirement that the relative be living with the employee for this provision to apply.

The type of event that entitles an employee to a family responsibility leave does not have to relate to the particular type of dependence the relative has on the employee in order to meet this criterion. For example, an employee's great-uncle depends on the employee to purchase his prescriptions and ensure he takes his medication. The employee wants to take family responsibility leave because their great-uncle's house is broken into and he needs assistance. The employee will be entitled to family responsibility leave even though the matter that is being responded to (a break-in) is unrelated to the type of dependence (ensuring that medication is taken).

Same, Limit – s. 50.0.1(2)

50.0.1(2) An employee's is entitlement to leave under this section is limited to a total of three days in each calendar year.

This section provides that where an employee qualifies for a leave under this section, the employee is entitled to take up to three days of family responsibility leave every calendar year. The entitlement is to a total of three days of family responsibility leave per calendar year, not three days per relative.

The ESA 2000 does not place any restrictions with respect to whether the three days have to be taken consecutively or individually. Employees can take family responsibility leave in part days (although see s. 50.0.1(6), which allows employers to deem one day's leave to be taken when an employee takes part of a day off work for family responsibility leave), entire days, or in periods of more than one day.

The question arises as to whether the three-day entitlement should be prorated for employees who are part-time, or who started their employment partway through a calendar year but have been employed for at least two consecutive weeks. There is nothing in the legislation to suggest that employees who are eligible for family responsibility leave should be entitled to less than three days per calendar year in any of these situations. Accordingly, it is Program policy that pro-rating of the three-day entitlement for part-time employees or employees who were hired partway through a calendar year is not permitted.

The ESA 2000 does not provide for the carryover of unused days of family responsibility leave from one calendar year into the next calendar year. In other words, employees do not have a statutory right to "bank" unused family responsibility leave days year over year.

It is Program policy that an employee who quits or is terminated and who is subsequently re-hired by the same employer during the same calendar year is entitled to a new three-day entitlement after two consecutive weeks of employment upon their re-hire. This is the case even if the employee took some family responsibility leave during their first term of employment in that calendar year.

See ESA Part III, s. 5(2) for a discussion of the application of the "greater right or benefit" provision to family responsibility leave. See also the discussion at ss. 50.0.1(8) – (10) for information regarding the interplay between contractual leave entitlements and statutory entitlements to family responsibility leave where the contractual leave does not amount to a greater right or benefit.

Advising Employer – ss. 50.0.1(4) & (5)

50.0.1(4) An employee who wishes to take leave under this section shall advise his or her employer that he or she will be doing so.

50.0.1(5) If the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it.

Advising Employer

Section 50.0.1(4) requires employees to tell their employers ahead of time that they will be taking family responsibility leave. In circumstances where that cannot be done, the employee is required, pursuant to s. 50.0.1(5), to inform the employer as soon as possible after beginning the leave.

The ESA 2000 does not require the employee to advise the employer of the family responsibility leave in writing. Oral notice is sufficient.

The ESA 2000 does not specify any particular method by which the employer is to be advised that the employee will be taking family responsibility leave. Consequently, an employee would be complying with this section whether the employee, for example, advised the employer by phone, left a note on the manager's desk or had a colleague take a message to the employer on their behalf.

Employees do not lose their right to family responsibility leave if they fail to comply with ss. 50.0.1(4) or (5). An employee's entitlement to family responsibility leave arises by virtue of one of a number of "triggering events" arising involving a particular family member, and it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins does not negate that entitlement. This approach has been affirmed in a grievance arbitration decision by the Ontario Labour Relations Board in the context of the former personal emergency leave, which used identical language to subsections (4) and (5) and which had similarly-structured entitlement provisions to those found in family responsibility leave – see International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 115 v The State Group Inc., 2019 CanLII 22129 (ON LRB). In that decision, the Vice-Chair found that notice to the employer is not a prerequisite to exercising the right to the leave. Note that this approach is consistent with the Program's long-standing policy in the pregnancy and parental leave context, where the structure of the entitlement and notice provisions are also similar to these. See ESA Part XIV, s. 46(4) and s. 48(4).

An issue has arisen as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy), where the time off is a family responsibility leave under the ESA 2000. Sections 50.0.1(1) and (3) describe the employee's entitlement, i.e., the triggering event and with respect to which individuals. Section 50.0.1(4) requires the employee taking family responsibility leave to advise the employer that they are taking the leave, and s. 50.0.1(5) provides that "if the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it." It is clear from s. 50.0.1(5) that the ESA 2000 contemplates situations where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of commencing the family responsibility leave. Part of the family responsibility leave entitlement under the ESA 2000 is the right to take the family responsibility leave even if advance notice cannot be given, with the proviso that the employee must advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it.

The failure to give notice in advance of taking leave, when it would have been possible for the employee to do so, can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating ESA Part XVIII, s. 74, the anti-reprisal provision. However, the following points should be considered:

- The employee's failure to give advance notice would not be a lawful basis on which to deprive the employee of the right to take the leave if the qualifying conditions in ss. 50.0.1(1) and (3) have been met. An employer could not, for example, take the position that failure to give advance notice when it would have been possible for the employee to do so will result in the time taken off not being counted as a family responsibility leave day.
- Any discipline for failing to provide notice in situations where such notice is required under s. 50.0.1(4) (i.e., where s. 50.0.1(5) does not apply) would have to be appropriately linked to the failure to give advance notice and must not, in effect penalize the employee for exercising the right to leave. The motive for any discipline that the employer does impose must clearly be the employee's failure to give advance notice and not the taking of the leave itself.

In addition, an employer would be able to impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the family responsibility leaveor if the employee provides notice of the leave so late that one wouldn’t reasonably be able to say that it falls within s. 50.0.1(5). Again, however, the employer's disciplinary action would have to be appropriate, and in no way a penalty or reprisal for the employee having taken the leave, but only for the failure to give notice. In this regard see Ryding-Regency Meat Packers Ltd. v. U.F.C.W., Local 1000A. In that case, the arbitrator concluded that in relation to the former personal emergency leave, the ESA 2000 established an entitlement to leave where a person described under the personal emergency leave provisions was ill. The fact that the employee's grandmother was ill was not disputed. Because the sections of the ESA 2000 that created the entitlement were separate from the notice requirements, the employee could be disciplined for not giving notice that he was taking or had taken leave but did not lose his entitlement to take the leave itself.

Designating Absences as Family Responsibility Leave

For employees who are entitled to family responsibility leave as provided for in s. 50.0.1, questions have arisen as to whether an employee who is absent from work for one of the events listed in s. 50.0.1(1) in relation to a person specified in s. 50.0.1(3) must use one of their three days of family responsibility leave.

Impact of Subsections (8) – (10)

Subsection (8) provides that where an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a leave under s. 50.0.1, the employee is deemed to have taken a leave under s. 50.0.1. Subsections (9) and (10) establish rules that apply to the deemed leave.

Accordingly, if subsections (8) to (10) apply to an absence, i.e. an employee takes paid or unpaid leave under the contract of employment in circumstances in which family responsibility leave could be taken, the employee will be deemed pursuant to ss. 50(8) to have taken ESA family responsibility leave and drawn down against the three-day s. 50.0.1 entitlement. See the discussion under ss. 50 (8) to (10) for more information regarding the impact of contractual entitlements on the statutory right to family responsibility leave.

Result Where Subsections (8) – (10) DO NOT apply

On the other hand, if subsections (8) to (10) do not apply, i.e. an employee who is entitled to family responsibility leave is absent due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50.0.1(1) but does not take a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract for that absence (either because the employee does not have a contractual right or does not exercise it), it is the employee (not the employer) who decides whether to designate the absence as a statutory family responsibility leave.

If the employee who is entitled to family responsibility leave and who is absent from work due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50.0.1(1) wishes to designate the absence as a statutory family responsibility leave, then the absence is a family responsibility leave that draws down against the three-day statutory entitlement and attracts the corresponding reprisal protections and all of the other ancillary rights that attach to statutory leaves that are set out in ESA Part XIV, ss. 51 to 53.1.

In the case where ss. (8) to (10) do not apply, an employee may be entitled to statutory family responsibility leave and be absent from work due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50.0.1(1) in relation to a person specified in s. 50.0.1(3) and decide not to claim the absence as a family responsibility leave day. This is not considered as contracting out of the ESA 2000 if an employee does not take advantage of their leave entitlements; the employee has merely chosen not to exercise them.

If the employee who is entitled to family responsibility leave by virtue of being absent from work due to one of the reasons listed in s. 50.0.1(1) in relation to a person specified in s. 50.0.1(3) does not wish to designate the absence as a family responsibility leave, and the absence cannot be considered an authorized absence on some other ground (e.g., another leave under the ESA 2000 or vacation authorized by the employer), the absence would have no statutory reprisal protection. For this reason, an employee who takes a day off for a reason that would qualify under s. 50.0.1 but who would prefer not to have the day charged against their family responsibility leave allotment may feel effectively forced into designating the day as such a leave. This in itself does not constitute any violation of the ESA 2000: it is not unlawful for an employer to inform an employee that should the employee not designate an absence as a statutory family responsibility leave day, then it would be considered an unexcused absence that will lead to disciplinary action.

Note that if the employee did not know of the right to take family responsibility leave, the default is that the absence is considered to be statutory family responsibility leave with the corresponding reprisal protection. An employee does not lose their right to any of the leaves provided for under the ESA 2000 because they were unaware of their entitlements.

Leave Deemed to be Taken in Entire Days – s. 50.0.1(6)

50.0.1(6) For the purposes of an employee's entitlement under subsection (1), if an employee takes any part of a day as leave under this section, the employer may deem the employee to have taken one day of leave on that day.

Employees may not need an entire work day to attend to the event that gave rise to the family responsibility leave and might only take part of a day off as family responsibility leave. Section 50.0.1(6) allows an employer in this situation to count the part-day off work as an entire day's leave for the purpose of counting the absence against the statutory three-day leave entitlement. This is the only purpose for which the employer can deem the part day off work as an entire day's leave. The employer cannot deem the employee not to have worked at all on the day. Where an employee worked a partial day and took a part-day of family responsibility leave, the employee is entitled to be paid the earnings for the time that was actually worked that day. As well, the hours that were worked will be counted for the purposes of, among other things, determining whether the relevant overtime threshold has been reached, whether the limits on, for example, the daily and weekly hours of work have been reached, and whether the daily, weekly/bi-weekly and in-between shifts rest requirements have been met.

For clarity, this provision does not require employees to take family responsibility leave in full day periods. It simply allows an employer to reduce the employee's three-day entitlement by a day if an employee is on family responsibility leave for only part of a day.

Note that this provision allows the employer to attribute one day's leave to a part-day absence. It does not require the employer to do so.

For example, an employee goes home early from work because their child has the stomach flu. They worked a four-hour day rather than their usual eight hours and takes family responsibility leave. In that case, the employer may consider the employee to have used up one of their three days of family responsibility leave and the employee would be paid their earnings for the four hours they actually worked.

Just because an employer may consider an employee to have used one day of leave due to a part day of absence does not mean that the employee then has the right to take the entire day off if the triggering event did not last the entire day. For example, an employee's shift is from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. They have to meet with their son's school principal on an urgent matter from 10 a.m. to 11 a.m. The employee claims the absence as family responsibility leave. Their employer is entitled to count the absence as an entire day's family responsibility leave, but the employee must nevertheless return to work after the meeting is over. Employees have the right to be away from work under the family responsibility leave provisions of the ESA 2000 only for as long as the need lasts. After the triggering event is over, the employee's normal obligations to attend at work are resumed.

In addition, employers cannot prohibit employees who took a part day of leave from returning to work for the remainder of their shift. This is because, among other reasons, the employer's s. 53 obligation to reinstate the employee at the end of the leave in ESA Part XIV, s. 53 and the prohibition against penalizing employees for having taken a leave in ESA Part XVIII, s. 74.

An issue has arisen as to whether an employer could exercise its discretion and deem a partial day absence as a full day for some employees, but not for others, or whether this might allow employers to selectively punish employees who have too many absences in violation of the reprisal provisions in ESA Part XVIII, s. 74.

The answer will depend on the facts. In particular, why did the employer treat the employees differently? Where an employer deems a full day's absence for some employees, but not for others, it is a question of fact as to whether the employer would be in violation of the ESA 2000.

For instance, an employer counts a three-hour family responsibility leave as a full day's leave for employee A but not for employee B who also takes a three-hour family responsibility leave because the employer considers employee B to be a better worker than employee A. Although this might be unfair as between employee A and B, it would not be a violation of the ESA 2000, as it would not be a reprisal for exercising a right under the ESA 2000.

If, on the other hand, the motivation for the differential treatment was that employee A frequently took family responsibility leave every year of only a few hours, and the employer assigned a full day's absence to these short leaves as a way to ensure employee A used up all of their statutory entitlement as soon as possible because the employer found it inconvenient for the employee to be away for short periods of time, that would be an unlawful reprisal.

As another example, it would also be an unlawful reprisal if the motive for the differential treatment was because employee A made inquiries about ESA rights or refused to agree to average hours for overtime pay purposes.

Evidence – s. 50.0.1(7)

50.0.1(7) An employer may require an employee who takes leave under this section to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances that the employee is entitled to the leave.

Subsection 50.0.1(7) gives an employer an ability to require an employee to provide proof that they are or were entitled to take family responsibility leave. The employer can require an employee to provide evidence that is reasonable in the circumstances that they are or were entitled to take the leave.

Evidence of entitlement to family responsibility leave may take many forms. For example, it could be a note from a daycare provider, school or other care facility. Receipts could also constitute proof, e.g., an invoice from a plumber who was called in to deal with a parent’s flooded basement.

Where the family responsibility leave was for the illness, injury or medical emergency of a person listed in s. 50.0.1(3), the employer cannot require a medical certificate or note in respect of that person – that person is not the employee of the employer and has no obligation to share their medical information. Note that it is different in the family medical leave, family caregiver leave, and critical illness leave contexts. In those cases, the ESA 2000 specifically states that the employee must obtain a medical certificate providing certain information about the family member and provide a copy of the certificate to the employer upon request.

Evidence Reasonable in the Circumstances

Evidence that is reasonable in the circumstances will be fact-specific. The factors and principles that may be relevant when assessing reasonableness are:

- The duration of the leave. For example, it may not be reasonable, depending on all of the circumstances, for an employer to require an employee who was away from work for only one day to provide evidence.

- Whether there is a pattern of absences or a record of absenteeism. For example, if an employee takes a family responsibility leave day only on Fridays before a long weekend, it may be reasonable for the employer to require some proof of entitlement to the leave even though the leave is of short duration.
- Whether any evidence is available. In some circumstances, third parties to whom the leave relates may refuse to provide employees with the evidence the employer has requested.
- Where evidence is available, but only with some difficulty, whether it is reasonable to expect the employee to obtain the evidence – see the Re Tilbury Assembly Ltd. and United Auto Workers, Local 251, although note that this decision was made under the previous personal emergency leave provisions.
- The cost of the evidence. For example, it may not be reasonable, depending on all of the circumstances, for an employer to require an employee who earns minimum wage to obtain a copy of a police report for a motor vehicle accident if the police station charges $25 for it.
- The employee had earlier asked for the time off for non-family responsibility leave reasons for the time at which the absence occurred but was denied.
- The employee had announced plans in advance to miss work.

Note that any evidence the employee provides to support the employee's claim of an entitlement to family responsibility leave is just that – evidence – and is not necessarily determinative of the question of whether the employee had an entitlement. Depending on the circumstances, it may be reasonable for the employer to require additional evidence from the employee.

Evidence relating to court proceedings

The Youth Criminal Justice Act, SC 2002, c 1 ("YCJA") prohibits the disclosure of any information that may identify a young person who has committed or is alleged to have committed an offence, a young person who is a victim of the offence, or a young person who is called as a witness in any proceeding in connection with the alleged offence. Employees who take a family responsibility leave because a young person specified in s. 50.0.1(3) is involved in a YCJA matter are not obliged to divulge to the employer (or employment standards officer) any information regarding the identity of the young person (e.g., the name or their relationship to the employee). Instead, it is Program policy that it would be reasonable in the circumstances that the employee state that a relative was involved in a court proceeding.

Family Responsibility Leave Taken Under Employment Contract – s. 50.0.1(8)

Same, Application of Act to Deemed Leave – s. 50.0.1(9)

Same, Application of Subs. (6) to Deemed Leave – s. 50.0.1(10)

50.0.1(8) If an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which he or she would also be entitled to take a leave under this section, the employee is deemed to have taken the leave under this section.

50.0.1(9) All applicable requirements and prohibitions under this Act apply to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (8).

50.0.1(10) Subsection (6) applies with necessary modifications to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (8).

These provisions, when read together, establish what happens when an employee takes a leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances that would also entitle the employee to a leave under s. 50.0.1.

“Circumstances” refers only to the triggering event that would entitle the employee to statutory family responsibility leave, i.e., the employee is absent because of an event listed in s. 50.0.1(1) and the event relates to a person listed in s. 50.0.1(3).

It is Program policy that “circumstances” does not include the two-week employment eligibility criterion. Accordingly, these provisions will be triggered when an employee takes a leave of absence under an employment contract due to an event listed in s. 50.0.1(1) where the event relates to a person listed in s. 50.0.1(3), even during the first two weeks of employment; this is the case regardless of the fact that the employee does not have the right to take statutory family responsibility leave during this time.

Subsections 8 to 10 codify the long-standing Program policy on the interplay between contractual leave entitlements and statutory leave entitlements where the contractual leave does not amount to a greater right or benefit than statutory family responsibility leave under ESA Part III, s. 5(2).

Note that if a contract does provide a greater right or benefit than the statutory family responsibility leave entitlement – the determination of which includes consideration of reprisal protections and the entitlements under general provisions concerning leaves such as the right to reinstatement – the contractual leave provision applies and s. 50.0.1, including these subsections, does not apply. See the discussion of ESA Part III, s. 5(2) for details.

In general terms, subsections (8) to (10) provide that an employee who claims a contractual benefit for an absence - in circumstances in which the employee would also be entitled to take family responsibility leave - does not have an entitlement to those contractual absences plus an additional three days of family responsibility leave.

Family Responsibility Leave Taken Under Employment Contract

50.0.1(8) If an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which he or she would also be entitled to take a leave under this section, the employee is deemed to have taken the leave under this section.

If an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a leave under s. 50.0.1, the employee is deemed to have taken a day of family responsibility leave and the absence will reduce the employee’s three-day per calendar year family responsibility leave allotment accordingly. Note that this provision must be read in conjunction with subsections (9) and (10), discussed below.

For this provision to apply, the reason for the absence (the triggering event) and the person in respect of whom the absence is related, must qualify for both the contractual leave and the statutory leave.

Some examples:

- An employer offers three paid sick days under a benefit plan which may be used either for the employee or their child. The employee is absent for three days because of a sick child and claims benefits under the plan. Subsection 50(8) deems the employee to have used three ESA family responsibility leave days. As a result, the employee will have no further entitlement to family responsibility leave under the ESA 2000.

- The contract of employment provides the employee with a paid flex day that can be used for any reason. The employee misses a day of work because they are assisting their mother with a flooded basement and uses a flex day to avoid a loss in pay. The employee is deemed to have also taken one day of family responsibility leave.
- If, however, the contract of employment offers a flex day that can be used for any reason, and the employee uses that day to deal with an event that is not set out in s. 50.0.1(1) or to deal with an event that relates to a family member who is not set out in s. 50.0.1(3) , the employee would not be deemed to have taken a day of family responsibility leave pursuant to this provision. For example, an employee uses the flex day to attend their child's dance recital. They will not be deemed to have taken a day of family responsibility leave pursuant to this provision. This is because an employee is not entitled to take family responsibility leave to attend a child's dance recital because attending a dance recital is not an urgent matter Therefore, the contractual leave was not taken in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a family responsibility leave.

This provision only has the potential to deem a statutory leave to be taken when a contractual leave is taken. It does not do the converse: it does not deem a contractual leave to be taken if a statutory leave is taken in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a contractual leave. The question as to whether statutory absences will also draw down against the contractual right is not a matter for the employment standards program.

Application of Act to Deemed Leaves

50.0.1(9) All applicable requirements and prohibitions under this Act apply to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (8).

If an absence has been deemed to be a statutory leave under ss. 50.0.1(8), this provision establishes that all requirements and prohibitions under the ESA 2000 apply to the absence.

This includes all requirements and prohibitions in s. 50.0.1 as well as general rights and obligations found in other sections and parts of the ESA 2000.

Examples include:

- the right to reinstatement,
- maintenance of benefits (if relevant),
- protection from reprisal,
- obligations on the employee with respect to advising the employer of the leave, and
- providing evidence reasonable in the circumstances to demonstrate an entitlement to the leave (where required by the employer).

Application of s. 50.0.1(6) to Deemed Leaves

50.0.1(10) Subsection (6) applies with necessary modifications to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (8).

This provision states that subsection (6) applies, with necessary modifications, to a leave that is deemed to be a family responsibility leave pursuant to subsection (8).

This means that if an employee takes a partial-day leave pursuant to their contract of employment, and that leave is deemed to be a day of family responsibility leave under subsection (8), the employer may deem the absence to be a full day of family responsibility leave and reduce the employee's three-day per calendar year allotment of family responsibility days accordingly.

ESA Part XIV Section 50.0.2 – Bereavement Leave

Bereavement Leave – ss. 50.0.2(1)

50.0.2 (1) An employee who has been employed by an employer for at least two consecutive weeks is entitled to a leave of absence without pay because of the death of an individual described in subsection (3).

See one section below for the discussion of s. 50.0.2 (2).

Family Members – s. 50.0.2(3)

50.0.2 (3) Subsection (1) applies with respect to the following individuals:

1. The employee's spouse.

2. A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee's spouse.

3. A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.

4. A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or of the employee's spouse.

5. The spouse of a child of the employee.

6. The employee's brother or sister.

7. A relative of the employee who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance.

The bereavement leave provisions were introduced into the ESA 2000 effective January 1, 2019 by the Making Ontario Open for Business Act, 2018.

Sections 50.0.2(1) and 50.0.2(3) set out the qualifying conditions an employee must meet in order to be entitled to an unpaid bereavement leave. To qualify, the employee must have been employed by the employer for at least two consecutive weeks, and the need for the leave must be because of the death of an individual specified in subsection (3).

Note that, pursuant to O Reg 285/01, s. 3, certain employees who meet the qualifying criteria for a bereavement leave will not be entitled to take it if taking it would constitute an act of professional misconduct or a dereliction of professional duty. Section 3 of O Reg 285/01 reads:

3. Sections 50, 50.0.1 and 50.0.2 of the Act do not apply to any of the following persons in circumstances in which the exercise of the entitlement would constitute an act of professional misconduct or a dereliction of professional duty:

1. A person described in clause 2(1) (a), (c), (d) or (e).

2. A person employed as a registered practitioner of a health profession set out in Schedule 1 to the Regulated Health Professions Act, 1991, including a person described in clause 2(1)(b).

See O Reg 285/01, s. 3 for more information.

What Triggers an Entitlement to Bereavement Leave

Subsections 50.0.2(1) and 50.0.2(3) lists the event ("because of" a death), and the people to whom the event must relate, that entitle employees who have been employed for at least two consecutive weeks to take bereavement leave. The list of relatives in subsection (3) is exhaustive. If it was not a listed relative who has died, the employee is not entitled to bereavement leave. If the employee has not been employed for at least two consecutive weeks, the employee is not entitled to a bereavement leave.

Employees can take a bereavement leave, without pay, because of the death of certain listed individuals. "Because of" is broad wording and can capture many different reasons for requiring time off work. For example, an employee may need time off work to attend a funeral or memorial service; in the case of an employee who is an estate trustee, the employee may need time off to deal with the estate; or the employee may simply be in mourning.

One issue that arises in respect of bereavement leave taken because of the death of a specified family member or dependent relative is whether the leave days must be taken coincident with the death or can be taken at some later time. Section 50.0.2(1) states that an employee is entitled to the leave because of the death of an individual listed in s. 50.0.2(3). As a result, time off work to attend a burial, interment of ashes or memorial service for the deceased that occurs at any time after the death qualifies as a bereavement leave as it is taken because of the death.

To be entitled to a bereavement leave, the person who died must be listed in subsection (3):

- The employee's spouse (which includes a same-sex spouse);
- A parent, step-parent, foster parent, child, step-child, foster child, grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or the employee's spouse (which includes a same-sex spouse);
- The spouse (which includes a same sex spouse) of the employee's child;
- The employee's brother or sister; and
- Any relative of the employee not listed above who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance.

The terms "parent" and "spouse" are defined in ESA Part XIV, s. 45.

If a person in the list above has not died, or if the person who has died is not found in the above-list, the employee is not entitled to take a bereavement leave.

Relative of the Employee Who is Dependent on the Employee for Care or Assistance

Section 50.0.2(1) entitles employees to a bereavement leave because of the death of a person specified in paragraphs 1 to 7 of s. 50.0.2(3), including "a relative of the employee who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance".

Relative

The ESA 2000 does not specify how close the familial relationship has to be in order to meet this criterion. The person must only be a relative. In the absence of a definition of relative, the term must be interpreted in accordance with its plain, ordinary grammatical sense and general acceptance.

Black's Law Dictionary, 10th ed., defines a relative as “a person connected with another by blood or affinity; a person who is kin with another.”

Accordingly, it is Program policy that to be a relative of an employee, the individual should be related through blood or through marriage, adoption or common law relationships between people of the same or opposite sex who are not married. Conversely, it is Program policy that “relative” in s. 50.0.2(3), paragraph 7 will not include those individuals who are not connected either by blood or through marriage, adoption or a common law relationship, since including them would be extending the meaning of relative beyond the ordinary, commonly understood meaning.

With respect to common law relationships, the question arises as to how long the individuals have to live together in a conjugal relationship before it can be said that a spousal relationship exists, thus granting relative status to relatives of the employee's spouse. The answer is that there is no minimum amount of time that the individuals must be together in order to qualify as a common law spouse for the purpose of entitlement to personal emergency leave. Unlike the Family Law Act, RSO 1990, c F.3 which, for the purposes of support obligations, limits the definition of unmarried "spouse" to those people who have lived together continuously for three years or are in a relationship of some permanence if they are the birth or adoptive parents of a child, ESA Part XIV, s. 45 requires only that the individuals "live together in a conjugal relationship outside marriage".

Accordingly, it is Program policy that the relationship of relative can be established through a common law relationship between people of the same or opposite sex once there is a conjugal relationship, regardless of how long it has been. Note that the entitlement to bereavement leave does not arise solely because of the death of a relative. If that relative is not in a category specified in paragraphs 1 through 6, that relative must have been dependent on the employee for care or assistance before their death in order for there to be an entitlement to bereavement leave. See the discussion below.

Dependent

An employee is entitled to take bereavement leave because of the death of an individual not in a category specified in paragraphs 1 through 6, only where that individual is a relative who is "dependent on the employee for care or assistance". It is Program policy, that in the bereavement leave context, the question to answer is whether the individual is a relative who was dependent on the employee for care or assistance at some point when the relative was alive. The ESA 2000 does not specify how dependent a relative had to have been on the employee for this provision to apply. It only requires that there have been a dependence for care or assistance. As individuals can be dependent on one another for care or assistance without being entirely dependent on that person, it is Program policy that this provision will apply to any relative who had been reliant on the employee to some degree for care or assistance in meeting their basic living needs. The relative did not have to be completely reliant on the employee for all of their needs when they were alive for this provision to apply.

There is no requirement that the deceased relative have previously lived with the employee for this provision to apply.

1. Designating Absences as Bereavement Leave

For employees who are entitled to bereavement leave as provided for in s. 50.0.2, questions have arisen as to whether an employee who is absent from work for the reason listed in s. 50.0.2(1) must use one of their two days of bereavement leave. A discussion of this issue is set out at ss. 50.0.2(4) below – see Designating Absences as Bereavement Leave.

Same, Limit – s. 50.0.2(2)

50.0.2(2) An employee's is entitlement to leave under this section is limited to a total of two days in each calendar year.

This section provides that where an employee qualifies for a leave under this section, the employee is entitled to take up to two days of bereavement leave each calendar year. The entitlement is to a total of two days of bereavement leave per calendar year, not two days per relative.

The ESA 2000 does not place any restrictions with respect to whether the two days have to be taken consecutively or individually. Employees can take bereavement leave in part days (although see s. 50.0.2(6), which allows employers to deem one day's leave to be taken when an employee takes part of a day off work for bereavement leave), entire days, or in periods of more than one day.

The question arises as to whether the two-day entitlement should be prorated for employees who are part-time, or who started their employment partway through a calendar year but have been employed for at least two consecutive weeks. There is nothing in the legislation to suggest that employees who are eligible for bereavement leave should be entitled to less than two days a calendar year in any of these situations. Accordingly, it is Program policy that pro-rating of the two-day entitlement for part-time employees or employees who were hired partway through a calendar year is not permitted.

The ESA 2000 does not provide for the carryover of unused days of bereavement leave from one calendar year over into the next calendar year. In other words, employees do not have a statutory right to "bank" unused bereavement leave days year over year.

It is Program policy that an employee who quits or is terminated and who is subsequently re-hired by the same employer during the same calendar year is entitled to a new two-day entitlement after two consecutive weeks of employment upon their re-hire. This is the case even if the employee took some bereavement leave during their first term of employment in that calendar year.

See ESA Part III, s. 5(2) for a discussion of the application of the greater right or benefit provision to bereavement leave. See also the discussion at ss. 50.0.2(8) to (10) for information regarding the interplay between contractual leave entitlements and statutory entitlements to bereavement leave where the contractual leave does not amount to a greater right or benefit.

Advising Employer – ss. 50.0.2(4) & (5)

50.0.2(4) An employee who wishes to take a leave under this section shall advise his or her employer that he or she will be doing so.

50.0.2(5) If the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it.

Advising Employer

Section 50.0.2(4) requires employees to tell their employers ahead of time that they will be taking a bereavement leave. In circumstances where that cannot be done, the employee is required, pursuant to s. 50.0.2(5), to inform the employer as soon as possible after beginning the leave.

The ESA 2000 does not require the employee to advise the employer of the bereavement leave in writing. Oral notice is sufficient.

The ESA 2000 does not specify any particular method by which the employer is to be advised that the employee will be taking bereavement leave. Consequently, an employee would be complying with this section whether the employee, for example, advised the employer by phone, left a note on the manager's desk or had a colleague take a message to the employer on their behalf.

Employees do not lose their right to bereavement leave if they fail to comply with ss. 50.0.2(4) or (5). An employee's entitlement to bereavement leave arises by virtue of one of a number of particular family members having died and the employee taking leave because of the death; it is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins does not negate that entitlement. This approach has been affirmed in a grievance arbitration decision by the Ontario Labour Relations Board in the context of the former personal emergency leave, which used identical language to subsections (4) and (5) and which had similarly-structured entitlement provisions to those found in bereavement leave – see International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 115 v The State Group Inc., 2019 CanLII 22129 (ON LRB). In that decision, the Vice-Chair found that notice to the employer is not a prerequisite to exercising the right to the leave. Note that this approach is consistent with the Program's long-standing policy in the pregnancy and parental leave context, where the structure of the entitlement and notice provisions are also similar to these. See ESA 2000 Part XIV, s. 46(4) and s. 48(4).

An issue has arisen as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that they will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy), where the time off is a bereavement leave under the ESA 2000. Sections 50.0.2(1) and (3) describe the employee's entitlement (i.e., that the employee takes a leave because of the death of a particular family member). Section 50.0.2(4) requires the employee taking bereavement leave to advise the employer that they are taking the leave, and s. 50.0.2(5) provides that "if the employee must begin the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it." It is clear from s. 50.0.2(5) that the ESA 2000 contemplates situations where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of commencing the bereavement leave. Part of the bereavement leave entitlement under the ESA 2000 is the right to take bereavement leave even if advance notice cannot be given, with the proviso that the employee must advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it.

The failure to give notice in advance of taking leave, when it would have been possible for the employee to do so, can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating ESA Part XVIII, s. 74, the anti-reprisal provision. However, the following points should be considered:

- The employee's failure to give advance notice would not be a lawful basis on which to deprive the employee of the right to take the leave if the qualifying conditions in ss. 50.0.2(1) and (3) have been met. An employer could not, for example, take the position that failure to give advance notice when it would have been possible for the employee to do so will result in the time taken off not being counted as a bereavement leave day.

- Any discipline for failing to provide notice in situations where such notice is required under s. 50.0.2(4) (i.e., where s. 50.0.2(5) does not apply) would have to be appropriately linked to the failure to give advance notice and must not, in effect penalize the employee for exercising the right to leave. The motive for any discipline that the employer does impose must clearly be the employee's failure to give advance notice and not the taking of the leave itself.

In addition, an employer would be able to impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the bereavement leave, or if the employee provides notice of the leave so late that one wouldn't reasonably be able to say that it falls within s. 50.0.2(5). Again, however, the employer's disciplinary action would have to be appropriate, and in no way a penalty or reprisal for the employee having taken the leave, but only for the failure to give notice. In this regard see Ryding-Regency Meat Packers Ltd. v. U.F.C.W., Local 1000A. In that case, the arbitrator concluded that in relation to the former personal emergency leave, the ESA established an entitlement to leave where a person described under the personal emergency leave provisions was ill. The fact that the employee's grandmother was ill was not disputed. Because the sections of the ESA that created the entitlement were separate from the notice requirements, the employee could be disciplined for not giving notice that he was taking or had taken leave but did not lose his entitlement to take the leave itself.

Designating Absences as Bereavement Leave

For employees who are entitled to bereavement leave as provided for in s. 50.0.2, questions have arisen as to whether an employee who is absent from work because of the death of a family member listed in ss. (3) must use one of their two days of bereavement leave.

Impact of Subsections (8) – (10)

Subsection (8) provides that where an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a leave under s. 50.0.2, the employee is deemed to have taken a leave under s. 50.0.2. Subsections (9) and (10) establish rules that apply to the deemed leave.

Accordingly, if subsections (8) to (10) apply to an absence, i.e. an employee takes paid or unpaid leave under the contract of employment in circumstances in which bereavement leave could be taken, the employee will be deemed pursuant to ss. 50(8) to have taken ESA bereavement leave and drawn down against the two-day s. 50.0.2 entitlement. See the discussion under ESA Part XIV, ss. 50(8) to 10) for more information regarding the impact of contractual entitlements on the statutory right to bereavement leave.

Result Where Subsections (8) to (10) Do Not Apply

On the other hand, if subsections (8) to (10) do not apply, i.e., an employee who is entitled to bereavement leave is absent because of the death of a family member who is listed in ss. (3) but does not take a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract for that absence (either because the employee does not have a contractual right or does not exercise it), it is the employee (not the employer) who decides whether to designate the absence as a statutory bereavement leave.

If the employee who is entitled to bereavement leave and who is absent from work because of the death of a family member who is listed in ss. (3) wishes to designate the absence as a statutory bereavement leave, then the absence is a bereavement leave that draws down against the two-day statutory entitlement and attracts the corresponding reprisal protections, and all of the other ancillary rights that attach to statutory leaves that are set out in ESA Part XIV, ss. 51 to 53.1.

In the case where ss. (8) to (10) do not apply, an employee may be entitled to statutory bereavement leave and be absent from work because of the death of a family member listed in ss. (3) and decide not to claim the absence as a bereavement leave day. This is not considered as contracting out of the ESA 2000 if an employee does not take advantage of their leave entitlements; the employee has merely chosen not to exercise them.

If the employee who is entitled to bereavement leave by virtue of being absent from work because of the death of a family member listed in ss. (3) does not wish to designate the absence as a bereavement leave, and the absence cannot be considered an authorized absence on some other ground (e.g., another leave under the ESA 2000 or vacation authorized by the employer), the absence would have no statutory reprisal protection. For this reason, an employee who takes a day off for a reason that would qualify under s. 50.0.2 but who would prefer not to have the day charged against their bereavement leave allotment may feel effectively forced into designating the day as such a leave. This in itself does not constitute any violation of the ESA 2000: it is not unlawful for an employer to inform an employee that should the employee not designate an absence as a statutory bereavement leave day, then it would be considered an unexcused absence that will lead to disciplinary action.

Note that if the employee did not know of the right to take bereavement leave, the default is that the absence is considered to be statutory bereavement leave with the corresponding reprisal protection. An employee does not lose their right to any of the leaves provided for under the ESA 2000 because they were unaware of their entitlements.

Leave Deemed to be Taken in Entire Days – s. 50.0.2(6)

50.0.2(6) For the purposes of an employee's entitlement under subsection (1), if an employee takes any part of a day as leave under this section, the employer may deem the employee to have taken one day of leave on that day.

Employees may not need an entire day off work because of the death of a listed relative. As such, an employee may take only part of a day off as bereavement leave. Section 50.0.2(6) allows an employer in this situation to count the part-day off work as an entire day's leave for the purpose of counting the absence against the statutory two-day leave entitlement. This is the only purpose for which the employer can deem the part day off work as an entire day's leave. The employer cannot deem the employee not to have worked at all on the day. Where an employee worked a partial day and took a part-day of bereavement leave, the employee is entitled to be paid the earnings for the time that was actually worked that day. As well, the hours that were worked will be counted for the purposes of, among other things, determining whether the relevant overtime threshold has been reached, whether the limits on, for example, the daily and weekly hours of work have been reached, and whether the daily, weekly/bi-weekly and in-between shifts rest requirements have been met.

For clarity, this provision does not require employees to take bereavement leave in full day periods. It simply allows an employer to reduce the employee's two-day entitlement by a day if an employee is on bereavement leave for only part of a day.

Note that this provision allows the employer to attribute one day's leave to a part day of absence. It does not require the employer to do so.

For example, the employee may find out in the afternoon that their sister has died and consequently leave work early that day. If the employee worked a four-hour day rather than their usual eight hours and takes bereavement leave, their employer may consider the employee to have used up one of the employee's two days of bereavement leave and the employee would be paid their earnings for the four hours they actually worked.

In addition, employers cannot prohibit employees who took a part day of leave from returning to work for the remainder of their shift. This is because, among other reasons, the employer's obligation to reinstate the employee at the end of the leave under ESA Part XIV, s. 53 and the prohibition against penalizing employees for having taken a leave under ESA Part XVIII, s. 74.

Evidence – s. 50.0.2(7)

50.0.2(7) An employer may require an employee who takes leave under this section to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances that the employee is entitled to the leave.

Subsection 50.0.2(7) gives an employer an ability to require an employee to provide proof that they are or were entitled to take bereavement leave. The employer can require an employee to provide evidence that is reasonable in the circumstances that they are or were entitled to take the leave.

Evidence of entitlement to bereavement leave may take different forms, including a copy of a death certificate or statement from a funeral home, a published obituary, printed program from a memorial service or proof of an appointment with a funeral director or lawyer.

Evidence Reasonable in the Circumstances

Evidence that is reasonable in the circumstances will be fact-specific. The factors and principles that may be relevant when assessing reasonableness are:

- Whether any evidence is available.
- Where evidence is available, but only with some difficulty, whether it is reasonable to expect the employee to obtain the evidence – see the Re Tilbury Assembly Ltd. and United Auto Workers, Local 251, although note that this decision was made under the previous personal emergency leave provisions.
- The cost of the evidence. For example, it may not be reasonable, depending on all of the circumstances, for an employer to require an employee who earns minimum wage to obtain a note supporting attendance at a meeting with a lawyer on estate matters if the lawyer charges $25 for it.
- The employee had earlier asked for the time off for non-bereavement leave reasons for the time at which the absence occurred but was denied.
- The employee had announced plans in advance to miss work.

Bereavement Leave Taken Under Employment Contract – s. 50.0.2(8)

Same, Application of Act to Deemed Leave – s. 50.0.2(9)

Same, Application of Subs. (6) to Deemed Leave – s. 50.0.2(10)

50.0.2(8) If an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which he or she would also be entitled to take a leave under this section, the employee is deemed to have taken the leave under this section.

50.0.2(9) All applicable requirements and prohibitions under this Act apply to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (8).

50.0.2(10) Subsection (6) applies with necessary modifications to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (8).

These provisions, when read together, establish what happens when an employee takes a leave of absence under an employment contract (which includes a collective agreement) in circumstances that would also entitle the employee to a leave under s. 50.0.2.

"Circumstances" refers only to the triggering event that would entitle the employee to statutory bereavement leave, i.e., the employee is absent because of the death of an individual listed in s. 50.0.2(3).

It is Program policy that "circumstances" does not include the two-week employment eligibility criterion. Accordingly, these provisions will be triggered when an employee takes a leave of absence under an employment contract because of the death of an individual listed in s. 50.0.2(3), even during the first two weeks of employment; this is the case regardless of the fact that the employee does not have the right to take statutory bereavement leave during this time.

Subsections (8) to (10) codify the long-standing Program policy on the interplay between contractual leave entitlements and statutory leave entitlements where the contractual leave does not amount to a greater right or benefit than statutory bereavement leave under ESA Part III, s. 5(2).

Note that if a contract does provide a greater right or benefit than the bereavement leave entitlement – the determination of which includes consideration of reprisal protections and the entitlements under general provisions concerning leaves such as the right to reinstatement – the contractual leave provision applies and s. 50.0.2, including these subsections, does not apply. See the discussion of ESA Part III, s. 5(2) for details.

In general terms, subsections (8) to (10) provide that an employee who claims a contractual benefit for an absence – in circumstances in which the employee would also be entitled to take bereavement leave – does not give the employee an entitlement to those contractual absences plus an additional two days of bereavement leave.

Bereavement Leave Taken Under Employment Contract

50.0.2(8) If an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which he or she would also be entitled to take a leave under this section, the employee is deemed to have taken the leave under this section.

If an employee takes a paid or unpaid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a leave under s. 50.0.2, the employee is deemed to have taken a day of bereavement leave and the absence will reduce the employee's two-day per calendar year bereavement leave allotment accordingly. Note that this provision must be read in conjunction with subsections (9) and (10), discussed below.

For this provision to apply, the reason for the absence (i.e., the "triggering event") and the person in respect of whom the absence is related, must qualify for both the contractual leave and the statutory leave.

Some examples:

- An employer offers two flex days that employees can use at their discretion. The employee is absent for two days because of the death of their sister and claims benefits under the employer's plan. Subsection (8) deems the employee to have used two ESA bereavement days. As a result, the employee will have no further entitlement to bereavement leave under the ESA 2000.
- If, however, the contract of employment offers a flex day that can be used for any reason, and the employee uses that day to attend the memorial service of their great-aunt (who had not been dependent on the employee for care or assistance) the employee would not be deemed to have taken a day of bereavement leave pursuant to this provision. This is because a great-aunt is not a listed relative for whom a leave can be taken in s. 50.0.2 and, therefore, the contractual leave was not taken in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a bereavement leave.

This provision only has the potential to deem a statutory leave to be taken when a contractual leave is taken. It does not do the converse: it does not deem a contractual leave to be taken if a statutory leave is taken in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a contractual leave. The question as to whether statutory absences will also draw down against the contractual right is not a matter for the employment standards program.

Application of Act to Deemed Leaves

50.0.2(9) All applicable requirements and prohibitions under this Act apply to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (8).

If an absence has been deemed to be a statutory leave under ss. 50.0.2(8), this provision establishes that all requirements and prohibitions under the ESA 2000 apply to the absence.

This includes all requirements and prohibitions in s. 50.0.2 as well as general rights and obligations found in other sections and parts of the ESA 2000.

Examples include: the right to reinstatement, maintenance of benefits (if relevant), protection from reprisal, obligations on the employee with respect to advising the employer of the leave and providing evidence reasonable in the circumstances to demonstrate an entitlement to the leave (where required by the employer).

Application of s. 50.0.2(6) to Deemed Leaves

50.0.2(10) Subsection (6) applies with necessary modifications to a leave deemed to have been taken under subsection (8).

This provision states that subsection (6) applies, with necessary modifications, to a leave that is deemed to be a bereavement leave pursuant to subsection (8).

This means that if an employee takes a partial-day leave pursuant to their contract of employment, and that leave is deemed to be a day of bereavement leave under subsection (8), the employer may deem the absence to be a full day of bereavement leave and reduce the employee's two-day per calendar year allotment of bereavement leave days accordingly.

Section 50.1 was amended effective March 19, 2020 by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Infectious Disease Emergencies), 2020 to expand emergency leave to cover infectious disease emergencies. Prior to the amendment, this section only addressed declared emergencies.

Although the amendment was effective on March 19, 2020, employees' entitlements to infectious disease emergency leave for Coronavirus (COVID-19) for reasons set out in subclauses (i)-(vi) of s. 50.1(1.1) are, by virtue of O. Reg. 228/20 (and initially by virtue of O. Reg. 66/20, which was later revoked and replaced by O. Reg. 228/20), retroactive to January 25, 2020.

Entitlement to infectious disease emergency leave where an employer temporarily reduces or eliminates a non-unionized employee's hours of work for COVID-19 related reasons as prescribed pursuant to subclause (vii) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b) is retroactive to March 1, 2020 and applies during the defined COVID-19 period – see below for details.

Note: During the declared emergency for COVID-19 (which commenced March 17, 2020 and terminated July 24, 2020), orders were issued under the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act (EMCPA) that may have limited some employees' rights to take declared emergency leave, infectious disease emergency leave or any other statutory leave. Upon the termination of the declared emergency for COVID-19 on July 24, 2020, those emergency orders ceased to be orders under the EMCPA and instead continued as time-limited orders under the Reopening Ontario (A Flexible Response to COVID-19) Act, 2020. These orders, including the period of time to which they relate, can be found by visiting the Reopening Ontario (A Flexible Response to COVID-19) Act, 2020 on the Ontario government's e-laws website and then selecting the "Regulations under this Act" tab.

ESA Part XIV Section 50.1 – Emergency Leave: Declared Emergencies and Infectious Disease Emergencies

Section 50.1 was amended effective March 19, 2020 by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Infectious Disease Emergencies), 2020 to expand emergency leave to cover infectious disease emergencies. Prior to the amendment, this section only addressed declared emergencies.

Although the amendment was effective on March 19, 2020, employees' entitlements to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave for Coronavirus (COVID-19) for reasons set out in subclauses (i)-(vi) of s. 50.1(1.1) are, by virtue of O. Reg. 228/20 (and initially by virtue of O. Reg. 66/20, which was later revoked and replaced by O. Reg. 228/20), retroactive to January 25, 2020.

Entitlement to infectious disease emergency leave where an employer temporarily reduces or eliminates a non-unionized employee's hours of work for COVID-19 related reasons as prescribed in section 4 of O.Reg. 228/20 is retroactive to March 1, 2020 and applies during the defined COVID-19 period – see below for details.

Entitlement to infectious disease emergency leave pursuant to the prescribed reason in ss. 3.1(1) of O. Reg. 228/20 (i.e. an order made under s. 7.0.2 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act (EMCPA) that is continued under the Reopening Ontario (A Flexible Response to COVID-19) Act, 2020 (ROA), or any amendment to such an order, that relates to the designated infectious disease applies to the employee) is retroactive to July 24, 2020. See the discussion later in this chapter for details.

Section 50.1 was amended on April 29, 2021 by the COVID-19 Putting Workers First Act, 2021 to provide employees with an additional entitlement of up to three paid days of infectious disease emergency leave in certain circumstances related to a designated infectious disease. Although the amendment came into force on April 29, 2021, employees' entitlements to paid infectious disease emergency leave are retroactive to April 19, 2021. Entitlements to paid infectious disease emergency leave were originally set to end on September 25, 2021 but were subsequently extended to December 31, 2021. The ESA was also amended on April 29, 2021 to provide that an eligible employer is entitled to be reimbursed the amount of infectious disease emergency leave pay that they paid to their employees, up to $200 per employee per day taken. Eligible employers make their application for reimbursement to the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board – see the discussion of s. 50.1.1 for details.

Note: During the declared emergencies for COVID-19, orders were issued under the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act (EMCPA) that may have limited some employees' rights to take declared emergency leave, infectious disease emergency leave or any other statutory leave. Some of those emergency orders continued as time-limited orders under the Reopening Ontario (A Flexible Response to COVID-19) Act, 2020 (ROA). These orders, including the period of time to which they relate, were published as regulations and can be found by visiting the Ontario government's e-laws website.

Emergency Leave: Declared Emergencies and Infectious Disease Emergencies – s. 50.1(1)

50.1 (1) In this section,

"board of health" has the same meaning as in the Health Protection and Promotion Act;

"designated infectious disease" means an infectious disease designated by the regulations for the purposes of this section;

"public health official" means,

(a) within the meaning of the Health Protection and Promotion Act,

(i) the Chief Medical Officer of Health or Associate Chief Medical Officer of Health,

(ii) a medical officer of health or an associate medical officer of health, or

(iii) an employee of a board of health, or

(b) a public health official of the Government of Canada;

"qualified health practitioner" means,

(a) a person who is qualified to practise as a physician or nurse under the laws of the jurisdiction in which care or treatment is provided to the employee or an individual described in subsection (8), or

(b) in the prescribed circumstances, a member of a prescribed class of health practitioners.

Subsection 50.1(1) contains definitions of some of the terms that are used in s. 50.1.

These terms are used only in the infectious disease emergency leave context. See the discussion of the infectious disease emergency leave provisions for information on the meaning of these terms.

Interpretation, treatment – s. 50.1 (1.0.1)

50.1(1.0.1) For greater certainty, in this section, a reference to treatment related to a designated infectious disease includes receiving a vaccine for the designated infectious disease and recovery from associated side-effects.

This subsection clarifies that references to "treatment related to a designated infectious disease" in s. 50.1 includes receiving a vaccine for the disease and recovery from side-effects of the vaccine.

This is relevant for the eligibility criteria for both unpaid and paid infectious disease emergency leave. (See ss. 50.1(1.1)(a)(i) in respect of unpaid infectious disease emergency leave and ss. 50.1(1.2), para. 1 in respect of paid infectious disease emergency leave). These eligibility criteria state that an employee is eligible for the leave if the employee will not be performing the duties of his or her position because, among other reasons, "the employee is under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment related to the designated infectious disease".

This subsection means that employees are eligible for unpaid and paid infectious disease emergency leave if they are not performing the duties of their position because they are receiving a vaccine and/or because they are experiencing side effects of the vaccine.

Leave of Absence Without Pay – s. 50.1(1.1)

50.1(1.1) An employee is entitled to a leave of absence without pay if the employee will not be performing the duties of his or her position,

(a) because of an emergency declared under section 7.0.1 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act and,

- i. because of an order that applies to him or her made under section 7.0.2 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act;
- ii. because of an order that applies to him or her made under the Health Protection and Promotion Act;
- iii. because he or she is needed to provide care or assistance to an individual referred to in subsection (8); or
- iv. because of such other reasons as may be prescribed; or

(b) because of one or more of the following reasons related to a designated infectious disease:

(i) The employee is under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment related to the designated infectious disease.

(ii) The employee is acting in accordance with an order under section 22 or 35 of the Health Protection and Promotion Act that relates to the designated infectious disease.

(iii) The employee is in quarantine or isolation or is subject to a control measure (which may include, but is not limited to, self-isolation), and the quarantine, isolation or control measure was implemented as a result of information or directions related to the designated infectious disease issued to the public, in whole or in part, or to one or more individuals, by a public health official, a qualified health practitioner, Telehealth Ontario, the Government of Ontario, the Government of Canada, a municipal council or a board of health, whether through print, electronic, broadcast or other means.

(iv) The employee is under a direction given by his or her employer in response to a concern of the employer that the employee may expose other individuals in the workplace to the designated infectious disease.

(v) The employee is providing care or support to an individual referred to in subsection (8) because of a matter related to the designated infectious disease that concerns that individual, including, but not limited to, school or day care closures.

(vi) The employee is directly affected by travel restrictions related to the designated infectious disease and, under the circumstances, cannot reasonably be expected to travel back to Ontario.

(vii) Such other reasons as may be prescribed.

Subsection (1.1) establishes the eligibility criteria for both declared emergency leave and unpaid infectious disease emergency leave, in clauses (a) and (b) respectively. (The eligibility criteria for paid infectious disease emergency leave are set out in subsection 50.1(1.2).)

These are dealt with separately below.

DECLARED EMERGENCY LEAVE ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA – ss. 50.1(1.1)(a)

On June 30, 2006, the Employment Standards Act, 2000 was amended by the Emergency Management Statute Law Amendment Act, 2006, SO 2006, c 13, to create a new unpaid leave called, "emergency leave, declared emergencies", which the Program refers to as "declared emergency leave".

Declared emergency leave is available only if the Premier or Lieutenant Governor in Council declares an emergency under section 7.0.1 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act (and only if the eligibility criteria set out in clause 50.1(1.1)(a) are then met).

The Lieutenant Governor in Council declared an emergency because of COVID-19 on March 17, 2020. That emergency declaration was terminated on July 24, 2020. A second emergency was declared because of COVID-19 on January 12, 2021 and terminated on February 9, 2021. A third emergency was declared because of COVID-19 on April 7, 2021 and terminated on June 2, 2021.

Employees who will not be performing the duties of their position because of the declared emergency and because of certain specified circumstances related to the declared emergency are entitled to an unpaid, job-protected declared emergency leave.

Clause (a) of ss. 50.1(1.1) establishes the qualifying criteria that must be met in order for an employee to be entitled to an unpaid declared emergency leave of absence. To qualify, both of the following conditions must be met:

Condition 1: The employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because of the emergency that was declared under s. 7.0.1 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act, RSO 1990 c E.9 ("EMCPA"); and

Condition 2: The employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because of one of the following reasons:

1. an order that applies to the employee made under s. 7.0.2 of the EMCPA;
2. an order that applies to the employee made under the Health Protection and Promotion Act, RSO 1990, c H.7 ("HPPA");
3. the employee is needed to provide care or assistance to an individual referred to in s. 50.1(8); or
4. such other reasons as may be prescribed. (At the time of writing, no other reasons have been prescribed.)

As noted, both conditions 1 and 2 above must be met before the entitlement to declared emergency leave arises: an employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because of a declared emergency AND because of one of the reasons listed in (i), (ii), (iii), or (iv) above. These conditions are discussed below.

Condition 1: Employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because of the emergency that was declared under section 7.0.1 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act (EMCPA):

Section 7.0.1 of the EMCPA gives the Lieutenant Governor in Council or, in certain circumstances, the Premier, the ability to declare that an emergency exists throughout Ontario or in any part of Ontario.

The first qualifying criterion for declared emergency leave is that there is a causal connection between the reason that the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position and the emergency that has been declared under s. 7.0.1 of the EMPCA.

Condition 2: Employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because of one of the following reasons:

i. An order that applies to the employee made under s. 7.0.2 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act (subclause (i))

During a declared emergency, the Lieutenant Governor in Council, in certain circumstances and with certain limitations, may make orders under s. 7.0.2 of the EMCPA that it believes are necessary and essential in the circumstances to prevent, reduce or mitigate serious harm to persons or substantial damage to property.

The condition in subclause (i) of s. 50.1(1.1)(a) will be met if an order made under s. 7.0.2 of the EMCPA applies to the employee and there is a causal connection between the order and the employee not performing the duties of the employee's position.

The Program considers an order to "appl[y] to" an employee only if the order is directed at the employee, i.e., where the employee, either individually or as part of a group, is the subject of the requirement, prohibition or other direction made in the order.

In other words, this condition is not satisfied if an employee is only indirectly affected by the order or by the consequences of someone else complying with the order.

For example, an order that requires restaurants to close "applies to" the owners of restaurants. It does not apply to the employees of restaurants, even though they are affected by the closure.

ii. An order that applies to the employee made under the Health Protection and Promotion Act (HPPA) (subclause (ii))

Under the HPPA, orders can be issued by a medical officer of health or the courts requiring individuals or classes of persons to take or refrain from taking any action specified in the order. For example, under the communicable disease order provisions in s. 22 of the HPPA, an order can be issued requiring individuals to isolate themselves.

The condition in subclause (ii) of s. 50.1(1.1)(a) will be met if an order made under the HPPA applies to the employee (see the discussion of subclause (i) for the meaning of "applies to" the employee) and there is a causal connection between the order and the employee not performing the duties of the employee's position.

This subclause is engaged only if the instrument that was made under the HPPA was an "order". For example, "directives" may also be issued under the HPPA but "directives" do not satisfy this condition. (Note that an employee who is affected by a "directive" under the HPPA may, depending on all the circumstances, be entitled to an infectious disease emergency leave pursuant to s. 50.1(1.1)(b)(iii) or s.50.1(1.2), para. 3. See the discussion of that provision for more information.)

iii. The employee is needed to provide care or assistance to an individual referred to in s. 50.1(8) (subclause (iii))

An employee is entitled to declared emergency leave under subclause (iii) of s. 50.1(1.1)(a) if there is a causal connection between the need to provide care or assistance to an individual listed in s. 50.1(8) and the declared emergency.

The employee can be providing the care or assistance in Ontario or in another province, territory, or country and be eligible for declared emergency leave.

Section 50.1(8) was amended effective March 19, 2020 to include more individuals. However, because the first declared emergency relating to COVID-19 was made on March 17, 2020, the list of individuals to whom an employee is needed to provide care or assistance in order to be eligible for declared emergency leave is different on March 17 and 18 than it is from March 19 onwards, as follows:

For absences on March 17 or 18, 2020, the employee will meet the condition under subclause (iii) if, because of the declared emergency, the employee is needed to provide care or assistance to any of these individuals:

- The employee's spouse (which includes a same-sex spouse).
- A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee's spouse.
- A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.
- A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or of the employee's spouse.
- The spouse (which includes a same-sex spouse) of a child of the employee.
- The employee's brother or sister.
- A relative of the employee who is dependent on the employee for care or assistance.

For absences on or after March 19, 2020, the employee will meet the condition under subclause (iii) if, because of the declared emergency, the employee is needed to provide care or assistance to any of these individuals:

1. The employee's spouse (which includes a same-sex spouse).
2. A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee's spouse.
3. A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.
4. A child who is under legal guardianship of the employee or the employee's spouse.
5. A brother, step-brother, sister or step-sister of the employee.
6. A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or the employee's spouse.
7. A brother-in-law, step-brother-in-law, sister-in-law or step-sister-in-law of the employee.
8. A son-in-law or daughter-in-law of the employee or the employee's spouse.
9. An uncle or aunt of the employee or the employee's spouse.
10. A nephew or niece of the employee or the employee's spouse.
11. The spouse of the employee's grandchild, uncle, aunt, nephew or niece.
12. A person who considers the employee to be like a family member, provided the prescribed conditions, if any, are met.
13. Any individual prescribed as a family member for the purposes of this section. (At the time of writing, no individuals were prescribed.)

"Spouse" includes married same-sex couples, married opposite-sex couples, and couples of the same or opposite sex who live together in a conjugal relationship outside of marriage – see the definition of spouse and the discussion at ESA Part XIV, s. 45

With respect to "a person who considers the employee to be like a family member, provided the prescribed conditions, if any, are met" in paragraph 13: at the time of writing there were no prescribed conditions that had to be met.

The declared emergency entitlement is for providing care or assistance. This includes, for example, looking after minor children, providing psychological or emotional support to the family member, assisting the family member with regular household chores (e.g., housekeeping, laundry, shopping) as well as arranging for care by a third party provider, and directly providing or participating in the personal care of the family member. Care or assistance also includes assisting the family member to get their affairs in order, where, for example, the family member is at risk of death.

Note that other leaves of absence in the ESA (infectious disease emergency leave, family medical leave, family caregiver leave, critical illness leave) have eligibility criteria relating to an employee "providing care or support" to specified individuals, while declared emergency leave uses the language "providing care or assistance". It is Program policy that the same interpretation applies to both phrases. In the context of leave entitlements, where the legislative language is given a broad and liberal interpretation, the types of activities that would fall under a broad view of "support" and a broad view of "assistance" are the same.

Examples of situations where, in the Program's view, this condition would be met during the COVID-19 declared emergency include:

- An employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because the employee is needed to provide care or assistance to his elderly mother who lives in another city and is in self-isolation due to the COVID-19 declared emergency.
- An employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because the employee needs to stay at home with his 5-year old child because the child's school has been temporarily closed as a result of the COVID-19 declared emergency.
- An employee has been buying groceries and picking up medication for her elderly aunt for several years. The employee works six days a week and would normally do the shopping on her day off on Monday. Because of the COVID-19 declared emergency, grocery stores have reduced their hours and are now closed on Mondays and during the employee's off-hours on working days. If the employee takes time from work to do the shopping, she would be eligible for declared emergency leave during that time.

Situations where, in the Program's view, this condition would not be met during the COVID-19 declared emergency include:

- An employee lives with her brother who has a compromised immune system. The brother has been advised by his doctor to remain at home. The brother is self-sufficient and does not need his sister for care or assistance. The employee wants to self-isolate to reduce the risk of exposing her brother to COVID-19.

  The employee is not eligible for declared emergency leave under this subclause.

  The employee satisfies the first condition for declared emergency leave: she is not performing the duties of her position because of the COVID-19 declared emergency (i.e., to avoid making her brother sick). However, she does not satisfy the second condition under this clause: while self-isolating may be a caring action in this situation, it does not constitute "providing care or assistance".

iv. Because of such other reasons as may be prescribed

At the time of writing, there are no prescribed reasons.

UNPAID INFECTIOUS DISEASE EMERGENCY LEAVE ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA – ss. 50.1(1.1)(b)

Start Dates of Eligibility

On March 19, 2020, the Employment Standards Act, 2000 was amended by the Employment Standards Amendment Act (Infectious Disease Emergencies), 2020 to expand unpaid emergency leave to cover infectious disease emergencies, which the Program refers to as Infectious Disease Emergency Leave. (That Act also repealed the SARS Assistance and Recovery Strategy Act, 2003, which provided leave entitlements relating to SARS.)

Although the amendment that expanded emergency leave to include infectious disease emergencies was effective on March 19, 2020, employees' entitlements to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave for COVID-19 for reasons set out in clauses (i)-(vi) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b) are, by virtue of O. Reg. 228/20 (and initially by virtue of O. Reg. 66/20, which was later revoked and replaced by O. Reg. 228/20) retroactive to January 25, 2020.

Entitlement to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave where an employer temporarily reduces or eliminates a non-unionized employee's hours of work for COVID-19 related reasons as prescribed in ss. 4(1), para. 1 of O. Reg. 228/20 pursuant to clause (vii) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b) is retroactive to March 1, 2020 and applies during the defined COVID-19 period in ss. 1(1) of O. Reg. 228/20. When the conditions set out in ss. 4(1), para. 1 of O. Reg. 228/20 are met, the employee is automatically deemed to be on unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.

Entitlement to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave where an order made under section 7.0.2 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act that is continued under the Reopening Ontario (A Flexible Response to COVID-19) Act, 2020 (or any amendment to such an order) that relates to COVID-19 applies to the employee arose effective July 24, 2020 – see s. 3.1(1), para. 1 of O. Reg. 228/20.

See the end of this chapter for information on the implications of the retroactive application of this unpaid leave.

Which Diseases Create Eligibility

Employees have the right to take unpaid job-protected infectious disease emergency leave if they will not be performing the duties of their position because of certain specified reasons related to a designated infectious disease.

The diseases that have been designated as infectious diseases are set out in section 2 of O. Reg. 228/20.

At the time of writing, diseases caused by a novel coronavirus, including Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS), Middle East Respiratory Syndrome (MERS) and coronavirus (COVID-19) have been designated as infectious diseases.

O. Reg. 228/20 establishes the start dates for the entitlement to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave for the different reasons for which the leave may be taken. At the time of writing, COVID-19 was the only infectious disease for which there were start dates. Accordingly, the only disease for which unpaid infectious disease emergency leave may be taken at this time is COVID-19.

End Dates of Eligibility

Regarding end dates for the entitlement to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave, note that:

- an employee's entitlement to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave because of a reason set out in subclauses 50.1(1.1(b)(i) to (vi) is not time-limited. An amendment would be required to O.

Reg. 228/20 in order to extinguish the entitlement to take infectious disease emergency leave for COVID-19 under those subclauses.

- an employee's entitlement where an employer temporarily reduces or eliminates a non-unionized employee's hours of work for COVID-19 related reasons as prescribed in ss. 4(1), para. 1 of O. Reg. 228/20 pursuant to clause (vii) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b) applies only during the defined COVID-19 period in ss. 1(1) of O. Reg. 228/20, which ends January 1, 2022.
- an employee's entitlement where an order made under section 7.0.2 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act is continued under the Reopening Ontario (A Flexible Response to COVID-19) Act, 2020 (ROA) (or any amendment to such an order) that relates to COVID-19 applies to the employee as prescribed in ss. 3.1(1), para. 1 of O. Reg. 228/20 pursuant to clause (vii) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b) is also not time limited. However, there is only an entitlement for as long as the relevant ROA order is in force.

Clause (b) of ss. 50.1(1.1) establishes the qualifying criteria that must be met in order for an employee to be entitled to an unpaid infectious disease emergency leave of absence. (See ss. 50.1(1.2) for the qualifying criteria for paid infectious disease emergency leave.)

Employees who will not be performing the duties of their position because of one or more of the following reasons related to a designated infectious disease are entitled to an unpaid infectious disease emergency leave:

(i) The employee is under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment related to the designated infectious disease.

(ii) The employee is acting in accordance with an order under section 22 or 35 of the Health Protection and Promotion Act that relates to the designated infectious disease.

(iii) The employee is in quarantine or isolation or is subject to a control measure (which may include, but is not limited to, self-isolation), and the quarantine, isolation or control measure was implemented as a result of information or directions related to the designated infectious disease issued to the public, in whole or in part, or to one or more individuals, by a public health official, a qualified health practitioner, Telehealth Ontario, the Government of Ontario, the Government of Canada, a municipal council or a board of health, whether through print, electronic, broadcast or other means.

(iv) The employee is under a direction given by his or her employer in response to a concern of the employer that the employee may expose other individuals in the workplace to the designated infectious disease.

(v) The employee is providing care or support to an individual referred to in subsection (8) because of a matter related to the designated infectious disease that concerns that individual, including, but not limited to, school or day care closures.

(vi) The employee is directly affected by travel restrictions related to the designated infectious disease and, under the circumstances, cannot reasonably be expected to travel back to Ontario.

(vii) Such other reasons as may be prescribed.

These eligibility criteria are discussed individually below.

Employees have the right to be on unpaid infectious disease emergency leave only for as long as the event that triggered the entitlement to the leaves lasts. After the triggering event is over, the employee's normal obligations to be at work are resumed.

ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA FOR UNPAID INFECTIOUS DISEASE EMERGENCY LEAVE – Clauses (i) – (vii)

(i) The employee is under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment related to the designated infectious disease (subclause (i))

Employees who will not be performing the duties of their position because they are under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment (including for mental health) related to the designated infectious disease are eligible for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.

The Act does not impose any restrictions with respect to where the medical investigation, supervision or treatment has to be undertaken in order for this eligibility criterion to be met. The investigation, supervision or treatment can be in Ontario, another province or territory, or another country.

Subsection 50.1(1.0.1), which was introduced into the Act on April 29, 2021, codifies previous Program policy that "treatment related to the designated infectious disease" in subclause "i" includes receiving a vaccine for the designated infectious disease and recovery from side effects of that vaccine. (The Program policy was based on the term "treatment" including preventative treatment, and was consistent with the definition of "treatment" in the Health Care Consent Act.) As such, employees who are not performing the duties of their position because they are getting vaccinated against the designated infectious disease or are experiencing side effects from the vaccine - whether or not the employee is under the care of a medical practitioner with respect to those side effects - are eligible for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.

(ii) The employee is acting in accordance with an order under section 22 or 35 of the Health Protection and Promotion Act that relates to the designated infectious disease (subclause (ii))

Employees who will not be performing the duties of their position because they are acting in accordance with an order under s. 22 or s. 35 of the Health Protection and Promotion Act (HPPA) that relates to the designated infectious disease are eligible for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave. This criterion is met only if the order is, in whole or in part, directed at the employee or a class of persons that the employee fits into.

Section 22 of the HPPA authorizes a medical officer of health to require individuals or classes of persons to take or refrain from taking any action specified in the order in relation to a communicable disease. Orders may include actions such as requiring the person to whom the order is directed to isolate himself or herself, to place himself or herself forthwith under the care and treatment of a physician, or to conduct himself or herself in such a manner as not to expose anyone else to infection.

Section 35 of the HPPA authorizes a judge of the Ontario Court of Justice to issue orders when someone has failed to comply with certain orders that were issued by a medical officer of health in respect of a communicable disease that is a virulent disease. (Note that not all designated infectious diseases are necessarily designated as virulent diseases). Orders issued under s. 35 may, for example, require that someone be taken into custody and admitted and detained in a hospital.

(iii) The employee is in quarantine or isolation or is subject to a control measure (which may include, but is not limited to, self-isolation), and the quarantine, isolation or control measure was implemented as a result of information or directions related to the designated infectious disease issued to the public, in whole or in part, or to one or more individuals, by a public health official, a qualified health practitioner, Telehealth Ontario, the Government of Ontario, the Government of Canada, a municipal council or a board of health, whether through print, electronic, broadcast or other means (subclause (iii))

Under this subclause, an employee is eligible for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave if the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because:

1. The employee is in quarantine, isolation, or is subject to a control measure (whether voluntarily or involuntarily),

   To qualify for this leave under subclause (iii), the employee must not be performing the duties of his or her position because the employee is in quarantine, isolation, or is subject to a control measure (whether voluntarily or involuntarily).

   It is the Program's position that "in quarantine", "in isolation", or "is subject to a control measure" is a step or an action implemented as the result of information or directions related to the designated infectious disease issued to the public, to a part of the public, or to one or more individuals by an entity listed in the provision (see below for more information). Depending on the circumstances, quarantine, isolation or a control measure may be initiated by an employee, initiated by an employer and agreed to by an employee, or imposed on an employee in response to the information or direction.

   With respect to "subject to a control measure": take an example where, in the context of a designated infectious disease outbreak, the Chief Medical Officer of Health issues a public statement or directive providing that employees who come in close contact with an at-risk population while at work should avoid working at other jobs that involve significant contact with the general population, in order to decrease the chances of spreading the disease to the at-risk population. An employee has two jobs - one that requires close contact with an at-risk population and one that involves significant contact with the general population. If the employee stops performing the duties at one of her jobs as a result of the information or direction provided by the Chief Medical Officer of Health, the employee is considered to be subject to a control measure and therefore meets the eligibility criteria under subclause (iii). As such, she would be entitled to take an infectious disease emergency leave from the workplace where she is no longer performing her duties. (This is the case whether it was the employee who decided which workplace to stop performing duties at, or if it happened at the direction of one of the employers.)

AND

2. The quarantine, isolation or control measure was implemented as a result of information or directions related to a designated infectious disease that was issued to the public in whole or in part or to one or more people by:

   a) a "public health official". This term is defined in ss. 50.1(1) and means:

i. within the meaning of the Health Protection and Promotion Act:

- the Chief Medical Officer of Health or Associate Chief Medical Officer of Health,
- a medical officer of health or an associate medical officer of health, or
- an employee of a board of health,

ii. a public health official of the Government of Canada

b) a "qualified health practitioner". This term is defined in s. 50.1(1) and means, "a person who is qualified to practice as a physician or nurse under the laws of the jurisdiction in which care or treatment is provided to the employee or an individual described in subsection (8)".

The qualified health practitioner can be in Ontario, or in another province, territory or another country.

So long as the information or direction provided by the qualified health practitioner is related to the designated infectious disease, this condition will be satisfied if the physician or nurse has provided care or treatment to the employee, whether or not the care or treatment was related to the designated infectious disease. For example, an employee who has an immune deficiency and who was told by his physician to self-isolate and not go to work during the COVID-19 outbreak is eligible for infectious disease emergency leave.

c) Telehealth Ontario

d) The Government of Ontario or of Canada.

It is the Program's position that where information is provided or directions are issued by the Premier of Ontario or the Prime Minister of Canada, this is done in their capacity as representatives of the Government of Ontario and the Government of Canada, respectively.

One question that has arisen is whether direction obtained through the Ontario.ca website COVID-19 self-assessment tool amounts to directions related to COVID-19 issued to an individual "by the Government of Ontario". It is the Program's position that it does. As such, if an employee completes the assessment questionnaire on the Ontario.ca website with the relevant information specific to the employee's symptoms and/or risk factors and receives direction that she or he is to self-isolate for a set number of days, then the employee is entitled to take infectious disease emergency leave for the duration of the self-isolation.

Another question that has arisen is whether orders issued under the federal Quarantine Act amount to direction related to COVID-19 issued to an individual "by the Government of Canada". It is the Program's position that it does.

Similarly, it is the Program's position that orders under the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act (EMCPA) or the Reopening Ontario (A Flexible Response to COVID-19) Act, 2020 (ROA) amount to a "direction" issued "by the Government of Ontario".

For example, an order was issued under the EMCPA (and continued under the ROA when it ceased to be an order under the EMCPA on July 24, 2020) prohibiting employees who perform work in a long-term care home from performing work at more than one long-term care home location, and from performing work both at a long-term care home and in a retirement home or at a long-term care home and for any other health service provider. (A similar order applies to employees who perform work at a retirement home.) An employee who, for example, has two jobs – one at a long-term care home and one at a retirement home – and stops performing the duties at one of the homes as a result of the order is considered to be subject to a control measure implemented as a result of directions related to a designated infectious disease that was issued to the public in whole or in part or to one or more people by the Government of Ontario and therefore meets the eligibility criteria under subclause (iii). As such, she would be entitled to take an infectious disease emergency leave from the job where she is no longer performing her duties.

(Note that O. Reg. 228/20 was amended on August 24, 2020 to explicitly state that, retroactive to July 24, 2020, an employee is entitled to take infectious disease emergency leave where the employee is not performing the duties of his or her position because the employee is subject to an order that relates to COVID-19 under the ROA - see s. 3.1 of O. Reg. 228/20. From the Program's perspective, this amendment provides greater certainty that employees in this situation are entitled to infectious disease emergency leave.)

e) A municipal council in Ontario

It is the Program's position that where information is provided or directions are issued by the Mayor of a particular municipality in Ontario, this is done in the Mayor's capacity as a representative of that municipality's municipal council.

f) A board of health.

Subclause (iii) provides that the information or direction may be communicated "whether through print, electronic, broadcast or other means". All methods of communication are captured, including, for example, in-person, telephone, e-mail, the internet, radio, television, newspapers, text message alerts, terminal screens (e.g., at airports, train stations, in subway stations), billboards and signs.

(iv) The employee is under a direction given by his or her employer in response to a concern of the employer that the employee may expose other individuals in the workplace to the designated infectious disease (subclause (iv))

Under this subclause, an employee is eligible for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave if the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position in response to the employer's concern that the employee may expose others in the workplace to the designated infectious disease. Some examples include:

- An employer is concerned that an employee who recently travelled or attended a public gathering may expose others in the workplace to a designated infectious disease. In response, the employer orders the employee to stay away from the workplace for a certain period of time.
- An employer is concerned that an employee whose wife is in self-isolation for the designated infectious disease directs the employee to stay away from the workplace out of a concern that the employee may have the disease and expose others in the workplace to it.
- An employer is concerned that an employee who is displaying symptoms of the designated infectious disease has the disease and directs the employee to stay away from the workplace until the employee provides a doctor's note stating that the employee does not have the disease. This example would apply even if the employee stated the symptoms were caused by something unrelated to the infectious disease, such as severe allergies.
- An employer provides a general direction to all employees in the context of the designated infectious disease outbreak that if they feel ill they should not come to work. An employee who then stays home because the employee is experiencing symptoms that have been associated with the designed infectious disease is eligible for leave under subclause (iv).
- An employer chooses to make a policy about COVID-19 vaccination and tells an employee not to come to work until the employee has been vaccinated against the designated infectious disease, out of a concern that unvaccinated employees may have the disease and expose others in the workplace to it. An employee who stays home until vaccinated is eligible for leave under subclause (iv).

This subclause does not create authority for employers to direct employees to stay away from the workplace and not perform the duties of their position in response to a concern about exposing others to a designated infectious disease. This subclause is simply providing that if the employer does that, the employee is eligible for an infectious disease emergency leave. The ESA does not address issues about health and safety in the workplace or employers' authority to exclude employees from the workplace. As such, the question of whether the employers' actions described in the examples above are appropriate or lawful under other laws is not a matter for the ES Program.

Note also there is no requirement that the employer's concern that the employee may expose other individuals in the workplace to the designated infectious disease be well-founded in order for an entitlement to arise under this subclause. For example, an employee has an allergy that makes the employee's skin blotchy. Although blotchy skin is not a symptom of a designated infectious disease, the employer is misinformed and is genuinely concerned that the employee may expose others to a designated infectious disease. If the employer therefore directs the employee to stay away from the workplace and not perform the duties of the employee's position, the employee will be eligible for infectious disease emergency leave.

Note as well that s. 4(1) of O. Reg. 228/20 prescribes an additional reason for which employees are entitled to infectious disease emergency leave: the employee's hours of work are temporarily reduced or temporarily eliminated by the employer for reasons related to COVID-19 during the defined COVID-19 period. O. Reg. 228/20 then deems employees to be on unpaid infectious disease emergency leave any time the employee is not performing the duties of his or her position for that reason. Although it may be argued that s. 4(1) of O. Reg. 228/20 should apply during the COVID-19 period to the situation where the employer temporarily reduced or eliminated an employee's hours of work out of a concern that the employee may expose others in the workplace to COVID-19 rather than this subclause, it is Program policy that where employees are not performing the duties of their position because they are under a direction given by their employer in response to a concern of the employer that they may expose other individuals in the workplace to the designated infectious disease, the employee is eligible for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave under clause (iv) of s. 51.1(1.1)(b) or may, depending on the circumstances, have an entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave under paragraph 4 of s. 50.1(1.2). (It may matter to an employee which provision the entitlement arises under because s. 4 of O. Reg. 228/01 establishes exemptions to the rules regarding continued participation in certain benefit plans during a deemed leave.)

(v) The employee is providing care or support to an individual referred to in subsection (8) because of a matter related to the designated infectious disease that concerns that individual, including, but not limited to, school or day care closures (subclause (v))

Under this subclause, an employee is eligible for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave if the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because the employee is providing care or support to an individual contained in the list in subsection (8) because of a matter related to the designated infectious disease that concerns that individual.

The employee can be providing the care or support in Ontario or in another province, territory country and be eligible for infectious disease emergency leave.

The individuals with respect to whom an employee can take this leave are listed in subsection (8) as follows:

1. The employee's spouse.
2. A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee's spouse.
3. A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.
4. A child who is under legal guardianship of the employee or the employee's spouse.
5. A brother, step-brother, sister or step-sister of the employee.
6. A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or the employee's spouse.
7. A brother-in-law, step-brother-in-law, sister-in-law or step-sister-in-law of the employee.
8. A son-in-law or daughter-in-law of the employee or the employee's spouse.
9. An uncle or aunt of the employee or the employee's spouse.
10. A nephew or niece of the employee or the employee's spouse.
11. The spouse of the employee's grandchild, uncle, aunt, nephew or niece.
12. A person who considers the employee to be like a family member, provided the prescribed conditions, if any, are met.
13. Any individual prescribed as a family member for the purposes of this section. (At the time of writing, no individuals were prescribed.)

"Spouse" includes married same-sex couples, married opposite-sex couples, and couples of the same or opposite sex who live together in a conjugal relationship outside of marriage – see the definition of spouse and the discussion at ESA Part XIV, s. 45.

With respect to "a person who considers the employee to be like a family member, provided the prescribed conditions, if any, are met" in paragraph 13: at the time of writing there were no prescribed conditions that had to be met.

“Providing Care or Support”

The designated infectious disease entitlement is for providing care or support. This includes, for example, looking after minor children, providing psychological or emotional support to the family member, assisting the family member with regular household chores (e.g., housekeeping, laundry, shopping) as well as arranging for care by a third party provider, and directly providing or participating in the personal care of the family member. Care or support also includes assisting the family member to get their affairs in order, where, for example, the family member is at risk of death.

Example of situations where, in the Program’s view, an employee would not be eligible for an infectious disease emergency leave under subclause (v) include:

- An employee lives with her brother who has a compromised immune system. The brother has been advised by his doctor to remain at home during an outbreak of a designated infectious disease. The brother is self-sufficient and does not need his sister for care or support. The employee wants to self-isolate to reduce the risk of exposing her brother to the designated infectious disease.

The employee is not eligible for infectious disease emergency leave under this subclause.

Although the employee would not be performing the duties of her position because of the designated infectious disease (i.e. to avoid making her brother sick), she would not be “providing care or support”. While self-isolating may be a caring action in this situation, it does not constitute “providing care or support”.

“Matter related to the designated infectious disease”

For a matter to be related to the designated infectious disease, there must be a causal connection between the “matter” in question and the designated infectious disease.

Closures of schools and day cares that are related to the designated infectious disease are specifically stated in subclause (v) as matters that are related to the designated infectious disease. So for example, an employee who will not be performing the duties of the employee’s position because the employee is providing care to his 5-year old child whose school has been temporarily closed because of the designated infectious disease is eligible for infectious disease emergency leave.

Where daycares or schools have reopened, it is Program policy that an employee who is concerned that the child will come into contact with COVID-19 at the daycare or school and as a result does not send the child to daycare or school is entitled to infectious disease emergency leave in order to provide care to the child. (This is because the situation falls squarely within the wording of subclause (v): the employee will be providing care to the child, and the reason the care is being provided is because of a matter related to COVID-19 that concerns the child, i.e. the matter is that the child is not going to daycare or school because of fears of coronavirus exposure.)

Similarly, an employee who is providing care or support to an elderly parent who had been living in a long-term care home but who left the home due to fears of catching COVID-19 is entitled to infectious disease emergency leave.

It is also Program policy that the cancellation of summer day camps because of COVID-19 also constitutes a matter related to the designated infectious disease. For example, an employee who will not be performing the duties of his position because he is providing care to his child who otherwise would have been at a day camp for five weeks in the summer that was cancelled because of COVID-19 is eligible for infectious disease emergency leave for those five weeks.

Other examples of situations where, in the Program's view, an employee is eligible for infectious disease emergency leave under subclause (v) include:

- An employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because the employee is providing care or support to his elderly mother who lives in another city and is in self-isolation due to the designated infectious disease.
- An employee has been buying groceries and picking up medication for her elderly aunt for several years. The employee works six days a week and would normally do the shopping on her day off on Monday. Because of a pandemic of the designated infectious disease, grocery stores have reduced their hours and are now closed on Mondays and during the employee's off-hours on working days. If the employee takes time from work to do the shopping, she would be eligible for infectious disease emergency leave during that time.

(vi) The employee is directly affected by travel restrictions related to the designated infectious disease and, under the circumstances, cannot reasonably be expected to travel back to Ontario (subclause (vi))

Under this subclause, an employee is eligible for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave if the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because the employee is directly affected by travel restrictions that are related to the designated infectious disease and the employee cannot, under the circumstances, reasonably be expected to travel back to Ontario.

For example, this would include an employee who is on a cruise ship that is not permitted to dock in any country because of the concern that passengers are infected by a designated infectious disease.

There may be some situations where an employee is affected by travel restrictions (for example where there are no international commercial airline flights available) but the employee has other options available to travel back to Ontario. This condition will be met if it would not be reasonable to expect the employee to use alternative options.

What is reasonable will depend on the circumstances. For example, an employee was vacationing in Mexico City when Canada banned all flights from Mexico for two weeks. The employee could rent a car or take a series of buses and trains to return to Ontario but that would not be a reasonable expectation in the circumstances.

This provision applies only where the employee is directly affected by the travel restrictions. In other words, it applies only where the employee's travel back to Ontario is affected.

This provision applies only when the employee is caught by travel restrictions while outside of Ontario.

(vii) Such other reasons as may be prescribed (subclause vii)

O. Reg. 228/20, which was filed on May 29, 2020 and amended August 24, 2020, prescribes two additional reasons.

1. Subsection 4(1) of O. Reg. 228/20 prescribes an additional reason for which non-unionized employees are eligible for infectious disease emergency leave during the "defined COVID-19 period": the employee's hours of work are temporarily reduced or temporarily eliminated by the employer for reasons related in whole or in part to the designated infectious disease.

   Subsection 4(2) of O. Reg. 228/20 deems employees who are not performing the duties of their position because of the prescribed reason to be on the leave in respect of any time they are not performing their duties for this reason during the "COVID-19 period", which is defined in O. Reg. 228/20 to be the period beginning on March 1, 2020 and ending January 1, 2022.

2. Subsection 3.1(1) of O. Reg. 228/20 prescribes an additional reason, retroactive to July 24, 2020: an order made under s. 7.0.2 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act (EMCPA) that is continued under the Reopening Ontario (A Flexible Response to COVID-19) Act, 2020 (ROA), or any amendment to such an order, that relates to the designated infectious disease applies to the employee.

   Note that prior to this reason being prescribed, it was Program policy that employees who were not performing the duties of their position because an EMCPA order that was continued under the ROA applied to them were eligible for infectious disease emergency leave based on subclause (iii) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b): these employees were considered to be subject to a control measure on the basis of a direction issued by the Government of Ontario. From the Program's perspective, the addition of s. 3(1) to O. Reg. 228/20 provides greater certainty that employees in this situation are entitled to infectious disease emergency leave.

   See the discussion of the prescribed reasons in the discussion of O. Reg. 228/20.

Leave of Absence With Pay - ss. 50.1(1.2)

(1.2) In addition to any entitlement under subsection (1.1), an employee is entitled to a paid leave of absence if the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because of one or more of the following reasons related to a designated infectious disease:

1. The employee is under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment related to the designated infectious disease.

2. The employee is acting in accordance with an order under section 22 or 35 of the Health Protection and Promotion Act that relates to the designated infectious disease.

3. The employee is in quarantine or isolation or is subject to a control measure (which may include, but is not limited to, self-isolation), and the quarantine, isolation or control measure was implemented as a result of information or directions related to the designated infectious disease issued to the public, in whole or in part, or to one or more individuals, by a public health official, a qualified health practitioner, Telehealth Ontario, the Government of Ontario, the Government of Canada, a municipal council or a board of health, whether through print, electronic, broadcast or other means.

4. The employee is under a direction given by his or her employer in response to a concern of the employer that the employee may expose other individuals in the workplace to the designated infectious disease.

5. The employee is providing care or support to an individual referred to in subsection (8) because,

   i. the individual is under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment related to the designated infectious disease, or

   ii. the individual is in quarantine or isolation or is subject to a control measure (which may include, but is not limited to, self-isolation), and the quarantine, isolation or control measure was implemented as a result of information or directions related to the designated infectious disease issued to the public, in whole or in part, or to one or more individuals, by a public health official, a qualified health practitioner, Telehealth Ontario, the Government of Ontario, the Government of Canada, a municipal council or a board of health, whether through print, electronic, broadcast or other means.

Subsection 50.1(1.2) was introduced into the ESA by the COVID-19 Putting Workers First Act, 2021 (CPWFA) on April 29, 2021.

The amendments made by the CPWFA provide employees with an entitlement of up to three paid days of infectious disease emergency leave in certain circumstances related to a designated infectious disease. These entitlements are in addition to the entitlement to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.

Although the amendments came into force on April 29, 2021, employees' entitlements to paid infectious disease emergency leave are retroactive to April 19, 2021. Entitlements to paid infectious disease emergency leave end on September 25, 2021 or such later date as may be prescribed. At the time of writing, December 31, 2021 was the prescribed end date (see O. Reg. 228/20, s. 11.) .

The CPWFA also amended the ESA to provide that eligible employers are entitled to be reimbursed the amount of infectious disease emergency leave pay that they paid to their employees, up to $200 per employee per day taken. Eligible employers make their application for reimbursement to the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board – see the discussion of s. 50.1.1 for details.

Subsection 50.1(1.2) establishes qualifying criteria that must be met in order for an employee to be entitled to paid infectious disease emergency leave of absence. These criteria are a narrower subset of the reasons that entitle employees to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave. (See ss. 50.1(1.1)(b) for the qualifying criteria for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.)

Subsection 50.1(1.2) must be read in conjunction with the rest of the section, including new subsections 50.1(1.3) – (1.13). Briefly, those subsections provide:

- ss. (1.3): the entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave is limited to three days.
- ss. (1.4) - (1.5): the three day entitlement is reduced by the number of days – if any – an employee was entitled to paid leave under an employment contract on April 19, 2021 in any of the circumstances for which an employee would also be entitled to paid infectious disease emergency leave, but only where the contract required the employer to pay the employee at least as much as the employee would be entitled to be paid under ss. 50.1(1.11) of the ESA.

- ss. (1.6): the employer may deem an employee who takes any part of a day as paid infectious disease emergency leave to have used up one full day of the employee's ESA allotment.
- ss. (1.7) - (1.10): An employee is entitled to take their paid leave before the unpaid leave. An employee who is entitled to paid infectious disease emergency leave may elect to take the leave as unpaid infectious disease emergency leave, but only if the employee provides the employer written notice of that election by a specified deadline. (Employees who took unpaid infectious disease emergency leave between April 19, 2021 and April 28, 2021 inclusive were able to elect to be paid for that leave if they met the eligibility criteria and advised the employer in writing by May 12, 2021.)
- ss. (1.11) - (1.13): these subsections establish the manner of calculating the amount of infectious disease emergency leave pay an employee on paid infectious disease emergency leave is entitled to, with a cap of $200 per day.

Employees have the right to be on paid infectious disease emergency leave only for as long as the event that triggered the entitlement to the leave lasts. After the triggering event is over, the employee's normal obligations to be at work are resumed.

Employees who will not be performing the duties of their position because of one or more of the reasons set out in ss. 50.1(1.2) related to a designated infectious disease are entitled to a paid infectious disease emergency leave. Each reason is dealt with separately below.

1. The employee is under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment related to the designated infectious disease.

This eligibility criterion for paid infectious disease emergency leave is the same as the eligibility criterion for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave in subclause (i) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b). As such, an employee who meets this eligibility criterion but has no remaining ESA paid infectious disease emergency leave days, or who elects to opt-out of the paid leave in accordance with ss. (1.8), will be entitled to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.

Employees who will not be performing the duties of their position because they are under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment (including for mental health) related to the designated infectious disease are eligible for paid infectious disease emergency leave.

The Act does not impose any restrictions with respect to where the medical investigation, supervision or treatment has to be undertaken in order for this eligibility criterion to be met. The investigation, supervision or treatment can be in Ontario, another province or territory, or another country.

Subsection 50.1(1.0.1), which was introduced into the Act on April 29, 2021 at the same time that paid infectious disease emergency leave was introduced, codified previous Program policy in the unpaid infectious disease emergency leave context that "treatment related to the designated infectious disease" in subclause "i" of ss. 50.1(1.1)(b) includes receiving a vaccine for the designated infectious disease and recovery from side effects of that vaccine. (The pre-April 29, 2021 Program policy was based on the term "treatment" including preventative actions, and was consistent with the definition of "treatment" in the Health Care Consent Act.) As such, employees who are not performing the duties of their position because they are getting vaccinated against the designated infectious disease or are experiencing side effects from the vaccine - whether or not the employee is under the care of a medical practitioner with respect to those side effects - are eligible for paid infectious disease emergency leave.

2. The employee is acting in accordance with an order under section 22 or 35 of the Health Protection and Promotion Act that relates to the designated infectious disease

This eligibility criterion for paid infectious disease emergency leave is the same as the eligibility criterion for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave in subclause (ii) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b). As such, an employee who meets this eligibility criterion but has no remaining ESA paid infectious disease emergency leave days, or who elects to opt-out of the paid leave in accordance with ss. (1.8), will be entitled to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.

Employees who will not be performing the duties of their position because they are acting in accordance with an order under s. 22 or s. 35 of the Health Protection and Promotion Act (HPPA) that relates to the designated infectious disease are eligible for paid infectious disease emergency leave. This criterion is met only if the order is, in whole or in part, directed at the employee or a class of persons that the employee fits into.

Section 22 of the HPPA authorizes a medical officer of health to require individuals or classes of persons to take or refrain from taking any action specified in the order in relation to a communicable disease. Orders may include actions such as requiring the person to whom the order is directed to isolate himself or herself, to place himself or herself forthwith under the care and treatment of a physician, or to conduct himself or herself in such a manner as not to expose anyone else to infection.

Section 35 of the HPPA authorizes a judge of the Ontario Court of Justice to issue orders when someone has failed to comply with certain orders that were issued by a medical officer of health in respect of a communicable disease that is a virulent disease. (Note that not all designated infectious diseases are necessarily designated as virulent diseases). Orders issued under s. 35 may, for example, require that someone be taken into custody and admitted and detained in a hospital.

3. The employee is in quarantine or isolation or is subject to a control measure (which may include, but is not limited to, self-isolation), and the quarantine, isolation or control measure was implemented as a result of information or directions related to the designated infectious disease issued to the public, in whole or in part, or to one or more individuals, by a public health official, a qualified health practitioner, Telehealth Ontario, the Government of Ontario, the Government of Canada, a municipal council or a board of health, whether through print, electronic, broadcast or other means

This eligibility criterion for paid infectious disease emergency leave is the same as the eligibility criterion for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave in subclause (iii) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b). As such, an employee who meets this eligibility criterion but has no remaining ESA paid infectious disease emergency leave days, or who elects to opt-out of the paid leave in accordance with ss. (1.8), will be entitled to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.

Under this paragraph, an employee is eligible for paid infectious disease emergency leave if the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because:

A. The employee is in quarantine, isolation, or is subject to a control measure (whether voluntarily or involuntarily),

To qualify for this leave under paragraph 3, the employee must not be performing the duties of his or her position because the employee is in quarantine, isolation, or is subject to a control measure (whether voluntarily or involuntarily).

It is the Program's position that "in quarantine", "in isolation", or "is subject to a control measure" is a step or an action implemented as the result of information or directions related to the designated infectious disease issued to the public, to a part of the public, or to one or more individuals by an entity listed in the provision (see below for more information). Depending on the circumstances, quarantine, isolation or a control measure may be initiated by an employee, initiated by an employer and agreed to by an employee, or imposed on an employee in response to the information or direction.

With respect to "subject to a control measure": take an example where, in the context of a designated infectious disease outbreak, the Chief Medical Officer of Health issues a public statement or directive providing that employees who come in close contact with an at-risk population while at work should avoid working at other jobs that involve significant contact with the general population, in order to decrease the chances of spreading the disease to the at-risk population. An employee has two jobs - one that requires close contact with an at-risk population and one that involves significant contact with the general population. If the employee stops performing the duties at one of her jobs as a result of the information or direction provided by the Chief Medical Officer of Health, the employee is considered to be subject to a control measure and therefore meets the eligibility criteria under paragraph 3. As such, she would be entitled to take a paid infectious disease emergency leave from the workplace where she is no longer performing her duties. (This is the case whether it was the employee who decided which workplace to stop performing duties at, or if it happened at the direction of one of the employers.)

AND

B. The quarantine, isolation or control measure was implemented as a result of information or directions related to a designated infectious disease that was issued to the public in whole or in part or to one or more people by:

a. a "public health official". This term is defined in ss. 50.1(1) and means:

   i. within the meaning of the Health Protection and Promotion Act:

      1. the Chief Medical Officer of Health or Associate Chief Medical Officer of Health,

      2. a medical officer of health or an associate medical officer of health, or

      3. an employee of a board of health,

   ii. a public health official of the Government of Canada

b. a "qualified health practitioner". This term is defined in s. 50.1(1) and means, "a person who is qualified to practice as a physician or nurse under the laws of the jurisdiction in which care or treatment is provided to the employee or an individual described in subsection (8)".

The qualified health practitioner can be in Ontario, or in another province, territory or another country.

So long as the information or direction provided by the qualified health practitioner is related to the designated infectious disease, this condition will be satisfied if the physician or nurse has provided care or treatment to the employee, whether or not the care or treatment was related to the designated infectious disease. For example, an employee who has an immune deficiency and who was told by his physician to self-isolate and not go to work during the COVID-19 outbreak is eligible for paid infectious disease emergency leave.

c. Telehealth Ontario

d. The Government of Ontario or of Canada.

It is the Program's position that where information is provided or directions are issued by the Premier of Ontario or the Prime Minister of Canada, this is done in their capacity as representatives of the Government of Ontario and the Government of Canada, respectively.

One question that has arisen is whether direction obtained through the Ontario.ca website COVID-19 self-assessment tool amounts to directions related to COVID-19 issued to an individual "by the Government of Ontario". It is the Program's position that it does. As such, if an employee completes the assessment questionnaire on the Ontario.ca website with the relevant information specific to the employee's symptoms and/or risk factors and receives direction that she or he is to self-isolate for a set number of days, then the employee is entitled to paid infectious disease emergency leave (and to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave if the employee runs out of ESA paid infectious disease emergency leave entitlements or has those entitlements but elects to take unpaid leave in accordance with ss. 50.1(1.8)).

Another question that has arisen is whether orders issued under the federal Quarantine Act amount to direction related to COVID-19 issued to an individual "by the Government of Canada". It is the Program's position that it does.

Similarly, it is the Program's position that orders under the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act (EMCPA) or the Reopening Ontario (A Flexible Response to COVID-19) Act, 2020 (ROA) amount to a "direction" issued "by the Government of Ontario".

For example, a ROA order prohibits employees who perform work in a long-term care home from performing work at more than one long-term care home location, and from performing work both at a long-term care home and in a retirement home or at a long-term care home and for any other health service provider. (A similar order applies to employees who perform work at a retirement home.) An employee who, for example, has two jobs – one at a long-term care home and one at a retirement home – and stops performing the duties at one of the homes as a result of the order is considered to be subject to a control measure implemented as a result of directions related to a designated infectious disease that was issued to the public in whole or in part or to one or more people by the Government of Ontario and therefore meets the eligibility criteria under subclause (iii). As such, she would be entitled to paid infectious disease emergency leave from the job where she is no longer performing her duties (and to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave if she runs out of ESA paid infectious disease emergency leave entitlements or has those entitlements but elects to take unpaid leave in accordance with ss. (1.8)).

(Note that O. Reg. 228/20 was amended on August 24, 2020 to explicitly state that, retroactive to July 24, 2020, an employee is entitled to take unpaid infectious disease emergency leave where the employee is not performing the duties of his or her position because the employee is subject to an order that relates to COVID-19 under the ROA - see s. 3.1 of O. Reg. 228/20. From the Program's perspective, this amendment provided greater certainty that employees in this situation are entitled to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave, and that even though there is no corresponding provision that applies with respect to paid infectious disease emergency leave, it is the Program's position that this eligibility criterion for paid infectious disease emergency leave is met where the employee is not performing the duties of his or her position because the employee is subject to an order that relates to COVID-19 under the ROA .)

e. A municipal council in Ontario

It is the Program's position that where information is provided or directions are issued by the Mayor of a particular municipality in Ontario, this is done in the Mayor's capacity as a representative of that municipality's municipal council.

f. A board of health.

Subclause (iii) provides that the information or direction may be communicated "whether through print, electronic, broadcast or other means". All methods of communication are captured, including, for example, in-person, telephone, e-mail, the internet, radio, television, newspapers, text message alerts, terminal screens (e.g., at airports, train stations, in subway stations), billboards and signs.

4. The employee is under a direction given by his or her employer in response to a concern of the employer that the employee may expose other individuals in the workplace to the designated infectious disease

This eligibility criterion for paid infectious disease emergency leave is the same as the eligibility criterion for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave in subclause (iv) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b). As such, an employee who meets this eligibility criterion but has no remaining ESA paid infectious disease emergency leave days, or who elects to opt-out of the paid leave in accordance with ss. (1.8), will be entitled to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.

Under this paragraph, an employee is eligible for paid infectious disease emergency leave if the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position in response to the employer's concern that the employee may expose others in the workplace to the designated infectious disease. Some examples include:

- An employer is concerned that an employee who recently travelled or attended a public gathering may expose others in the workplace to a designated infectious disease. In response, the employer orders the employee to stay away from the workplace for a certain period of time.
- An employer is concerned that an employee whose wife is in self-isolation for the designated infectious disease directs the employee to stay away from the workplace out of a concern that the employee may have the disease and expose others in the workplace to it.
- An employer is concerned that an employee who is displaying symptoms of the designated infectious disease has the disease and directs the employee to stay away from the workplace until the employee provides a doctor's note stating that the employee does not have the disease. This example would apply even if the employee stated the symptoms were caused by something unrelated to the infectious disease, such as severe allergies.
- An employer provides a general direction to all employees in the context of the designated infectious disease outbreak that if they feel ill they should not come to work. An employee who then stays home because the employee is experiencing symptoms that have been associated with the designed infectious disease is eligible for leave under paragraph 4.
- An employer chooses to make a policy about COVID-19 vaccination and tells an employee not to come to work until the employee has been vaccinated against the designated infectious disease, out of a concern that unvaccinated employees may have the disease and expose others in the workplace to it. An employee who stays home until vaccinated is eligible for leave under paragraph 4.

This paragraph does not create authority for employers to direct employees to stay away from the workplace and not perform the duties of their position in response to a concern about exposing others to a designated infectious disease. This paragraph is simply providing that if the employer does that, the employee is eligible for a paid infectious disease emergency leave. The ESA does not address issues about health and safety in the workplace or employers' authority to exclude employees from the workplace. As such, the question of whether the employers' actions described in the examples above are appropriate or lawful under other laws is not a matter for the ES Program.

Note also there is no requirement that the employer's concern that the employee may expose other individuals in the workplace to the designated infectious disease be well-founded in order for an entitlement to arise under this paragraph. For example, an employee has an allergy that makes the employee's skin blotchy. Although blotchy skin is not a symptom of a designated infectious disease, the employer is misinformed and is genuinely concerned that the employee may expose others to a designated infectious disease. If the employer therefore directs the employee to stay away from the workplace and not perform the duties of the employee's position, the employee will be eligible for infectious disease emergency leave.

5. The employee is providing care or support to an individual referred to in subsection (8) because,

i. the individual is under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment related to the designated infectious disease, or

ii. the individual is in quarantine or isolation or is subject to a control measure (which may include, but is not limited to, self-isolation), and the quarantine, isolation or control measure was implemented as a result of information or directions related to the designated infectious disease issued to the public, in whole or in part, or to one or more individuals, by a public health official, a qualified health practitioner, Telehealth Ontario, the Government of Ontario, the Government of Canada, a municipal council or a board of health, whether through print, electronic, broadcast or other means.

This eligibility criterion for paid infectious disease emergency leave is a narrower subset of the eligibility criterion regarding providing care or support to certain relatives for unpaid infectious disease emergency leave in subclause (v) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b). As such, an employee who meets this eligibility criterion but has no remaining ESA paid infectious disease emergency leave days, or who elects to opt-out of the paid leave in accordance with ss. (1.8), will be entitled to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.

Under this paragraph, an employee is eligible for paid infectious disease emergency leave if the employee will not be performing the duties of the employee's position because the employee is providing care or support to an individual contained in the list in subsection (8) because of the reasons set out in subclause (i) or (ii).

The employee can be providing the care or support in Ontario or in another province, territory country and be eligible for paid infectious disease emergency leave.

The individuals with respect to whom an employee can take this leave are listed in subsection (8) as follows:

- The employee's spouse.
- A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee's spouse.
- A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.
- A child who is under legal guardianship of the employee or the employee's spouse.
- A brother, step-brother, sister or step-sister of the employee.
- A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or the employee's spouse.
- A brother-in-law, step-brother-in-law, sister-in-law or step-sister-in-law of the employee.
- A son-in-law or daughter-in-law of the employee or the employee's spouse.
- An uncle or aunt of the employee or the employee's spouse.
- A nephew or niece of the employee or the employee's spouse.
- The spouse of the employee's grandchild, uncle, aunt, nephew or niece.
- A person who considers the employee to be like a family member, provided the prescribed conditions, if any, are met.
- Any individual prescribed as a family member for the purposes of this section. (At the time of writing, no individuals were prescribed.)

"Spouse" includes married same-sex couples, married opposite-sex couples, and couples of the same or opposite sex who live together in a conjugal relationship outside of marriage – see the definition of spouse and the discussion at ESA Part XIV, s. 45.

With respect to "a person who considers the employee to be like a family member, provided the prescribed conditions, if any, are met" in paragraph 13: at the time of writing there were no prescribed conditions that had to be met.

“Providing Care or Support”

The designated infectious disease entitlement is for providing care or support. This includes, for example, looking after minor children, providing psychological or emotional support to the family member, assisting the family member with regular household chores (e.g., housekeeping, laundry, shopping) as well as arranging for care by a third party provider, and directly providing or participating in the personal care of the family member. Care or support also includes assisting the family member to get their affairs in order, where, for example, the family member is at risk of death.

An employee is entitled to paid infectious disease emergency leave if the employee is providing care or support to an individual listed in subsection (8) if:

i. the individual is under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment related to the designated infectious disease, or

ii. the individual is in quarantine or isolation or is subject to a control measure (which may include, but is not limited to, self-isolation), and the quarantine, isolation or control measure was implemented as a result of information or directions related to the designated infectious disease issued to the public, in whole or in part, or to one or more individuals, by a public health official, a qualified health practitioner, Telehealth Ontario, the Government of Ontario, the Government of Canada, a municipal council or a board of health, whether through print, electronic, broadcast or other means.

With respect to subclause (i):

Employees who will not be performing the duties of their position because an individual listed in subsection 51.1(8) is under individual medical investigation, supervision or treatment (including for mental health) related to the designated infectious disease are eligible for paid infectious disease emergency leave.

The Act does not impose any restrictions with respect to where the medical investigation, supervision or treatment has to be undertaken in order for this eligibility criterion to be met. The investigation, supervision or treatment can be in Ontario, another province or territory, or another country.

Subsection 50.1(1.0.1), which was introduced into the Act on April 29, 2021 at the same time that paid infectious disease emergency leave was introduced, codified previous Program policy in the unpaid infectious disease emergency leave context that “treatment related to the designated infectious disease” in subclause “i” includes receiving a vaccine for the designated infectious disease and recovery from side effects of that vaccine. (The Program policy was based on the term “treatment” including preventative actions, and was consistent with the definition of “treatment” in the Health Care Consent Act.) As such, employees who are not performing the duties of their position because they are providing care or support to an individual listed in subsection (8) is getting vaccinated for the designated infectious disease or is experiencing side effects from the vaccine - whether or not the individual is under the care of a medical practitioner with respect to those side effects - are eligible for paid infectious disease emergency leave.

With respect to subclause (ii): this is same as the eligibility criterion under paragraph 3 of this subsection (except under paragraph 3 it is the employee him or herself who is in quarantine, isolation or subject to a control measure and here the employee is providing care or support to an individual listed in subsection (8) who is in quarantine, isolation or is subject to a control measure). See the discussion under paragraph 3 above for information on this eligibility criterion.

Limit, number of days – ss. 50.1(1.3)

(1.3) Subject to subsection (1.4), an employee is entitled to take a total of three paid days of leave under subsection (1.2).

This subsection provides that an employee is entitled to take up to three days of paid infectious disease emergency leave.

The Act does not place any restrictions on whether the three days have to be taken consecutively or individually.

Employees can take paid infectious disease emergency leave in entire days or part days (although see ss. 50.1(1.6), which allows employers to deem one day's leave to be taken when an employee takes part of a day off work for paid infectious disease emergency leave).,

The entitlement to three days of paid leave is subject to ss. 50.1(1.4) and (1.5), which provide that an employee's entitlement to three days of paid infectious disease emergency leave may be reduced or eliminated in certain circumstances where the employee had an entitlement to paid leave under their employment contract on April 19, 2021. See below for details.

Paid leave taken under employment contract – ss. 50.1(1.4), (1.5)

(1.4) If, on April 19, 2021, an employee is entitled to take paid leave under an employment contract in any of the circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a leave under subsection (1.2), the employee's entitlement under subsection (1.3) is reduced by the employee's entitlement under the contract.

(1.5) Subsection (1.4) applies only if the employer is required under the employment contract to pay the employee for the paid leave an amount that is equal to or greater than what the employee would be entitled to under subsection (1.11).

These subsections provide that an employee's entitlement to three days of paid infectious disease emergency leave as set out in ss. 50.1(1.3) is reduced or eliminated in circumstances where the employee had certain entitlements to paid leave under an employment contract on April 19, 2021.

An employee's entitlement to three days of paid infectious disease emergency leave is reduced only where all of these criteria are met on April 19, 2021:

1. an employee's employment contract provides entitlements to a paid leave for one or more of the same reasons that paid infectious disease emergency leave can be taken under the ESA,

2. the employee had paid leave entitlements under their employment contract remaining on April 19, 2021 (i.e. the employee had not used up all of the contractual leave that meet criterion 1 before April 19, 2021),

3. the amount the employer is required to pay the employee for paid leave under the employment contract on April 19, 2021 is at least as much as the employee would be entitled to under the formula set out in ss. 50.1(1.11), and
4. the contract does not impose conditions on taking the contractual leave that are more onerous than what is set out in the ESA to take paid infectious disease emergency leave.

Each of these criteria is discussed below.

Criterion 1: an employee's employment contract provides entitlements to a paid leave for one or more of the same reasons that paid infectious disease emergency leave can be taken under the ESA

An employee's entitlement to three days of paid infectious disease emergency leave can be reduced only if the employee's contract of employment provides the employee with paid leave for one or more reasons that paid infectious disease emergency leave can be taken. The reasons for which leave can be taken under the contract do not have to exactly match the reasons that paid infectious disease emergency leave can be taken under the ESA for the reduction to apply.

Some examples:

- a contract provides three days of paid leave for the employee's personal illness and can be taken by the employee if the employee is sick from COVID-19. Because being sick from COVID-19 is one the reasons for which an employee can take paid infectious disease emergency leave, this criterion is met. If criteria 2 - 4 are also met with respect to the contractual sick days, and the employee has all three days of contractual leave available to her on April 19, 2021, the three days of contractual leave reduce the employee's three-day entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave to zero days.
- a contract provides an employee with two paid "floater days" that can be taken for any reason. Because this would be available for the same reasons for which an employee can take paid infectious disease emergency leave, this criterion is met. If criteria 2 - 4 are also met with respect to the floater days, and the employee has not taken either floater day by April 19, 2021, the two days of contractual leave reduce the employee's three-day entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave to one day.
- A contract provides an employee with three paid "family responsibility days" that could be used to provide care or support to immediate family members who are sick with COVID-19. Because this would be available for some of the reasons for which the employee can take paid infectious disease emergency leave, this criterion is met. If criteria 2 - 4 are also met with respect to the family responsibility days, and the employee has all three days of contractual leave available to her on April 19, 2021, the three days of contractual leave reduce the employee's three-day entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave to zero days.

Criterion 2: the employee had paid leave entitlements under their employment contract remaining on April 19, 2021

Criterion 1 dealt with the question of the reasons for which an employee has an entitlement to paid leave under their contract and how many days of leave the contract provides.

Criterion 2 deals with the question of the amount of leave entitlements the employee had remaining on April 19, 2021.

.

An employee's three-day paid infectious disease emergency leave entitlement is reduced only if the employee had not used up all of the contractual leave entitlements that met Criterion 1 on April 19, 2021 (and only if criteria 3 and 4 are also met).

For example:

- a contract provides an employee with two paid sick days and one "floater day" that meet the criteria in criteria 1.
- the employee took the two contractual paid sick days in January 2021, so had zero contractual paid sick days available on April 19, 2021.
- the employee had not used the "floater" day before April 19, 2021, so that day remained available to the employee.
- in this example, the employee has one day of paid leave that meets the conditions in criterion 1 available on April 19, 2021. That one day reduces the employee's three-day entitlement by one day (assuming criteria 3 and 4 are also met).
- This employee is therefore entitled to two paid days of infectious disease emergency leave under the ESA.

Criterion 3: the amount the employer is required to pay the employee for paid leave under the employment contract on April 19, 2021 is at least as much as the employee would be entitled to under the formula set out in ss. 50.1(1.11)

Contractual leave entitlements that meet criteria 1 and 2 will only reduce an employee's three-day paid infectious disease leave entitlement if the employer is required under the contract to pay the employee for the paid contractual leave an amount that is equal to or greater than what the employee would be entitled to under the infectious disease emergency leave pay formula set out in ss. 50.1(1.11) of the ESA. (In very general terms, the formula provides that employees are entitled to the lesser of $200 and the wages the employee would have earned had the employee not taken the leave, excluding overtime pay, a shift premium and premium pay on a public holiday, and with a special rule for employees who receive performance-related wages. See the discussion of ss. 50.1(1.11) for details.)

For example: an employee is entitled under the contract to salary continuance when the employee is away for personal illness. Because this provides an amount that is equal to or greater than what the formula for infectious disease emergency leave pay would provide, this criterion is met.

Because the analysis as to whether this criterion is met is performed with respect to the contractual entitlement on April 19, 2021, any changes to the employees' contractual entitlements after April 19, 2021 do not factor into the analysis. For example, an employee who earns $200 a day has a contract that provides three days of leave for personal illness with pay of $150 per day. This contractual entitlement does not meet Criterion 3 (it would have to provide $200 per day to satisfy this criterion) so will not reduce the three-day paid infectious disease emergency leave entitlement. This is the case even if the employer makes changes to increase the employee's contractual pay for leave for personal illness to $200 per day after April 19, 2021. However, see the heading at the end of the discussion of this subsection titled "Whether taking a paid infectious disease emergency leave day draws down the employee's contractual entitlement".

In some situations it may not be possible to make a determination in advance of the leave being taken as to whether, on April 19, 2021, the contractual entitlement meets this criterion. For example, the contract provides that an employee who takes a family leave is entitled to 75% of the wages the employee would have earned while on the leave. Whether or not this criterion is met depends on future events that happen after April 19, 2021 – i.e. the length of any leave the employee takes and the employee's wage rate at the time. In this situation – where there is uncertainty as to whether this criterion is met on April 19, 2021 because it depends on future events - the employer may engage in a two-step analysis: one on April 19, 2021 (this would be the point at which the employer would realize that, in the case of the specific contractual language and the specific employee's wage rate, that the results of the analysis will vary depending on the length of the employee's leave) and then a second review after the leave occurs (it would only be at this point at which the employer would be able to assess whether criterion 3 applies). After the second review, any necessary adjustments against the ESA's 3-day allotment of paid infectious disease emergency leave could be made when it is known whether the contractual pay entitlement is at least as much as the employee would be entitled to receive under the ESA.

For example:

- an employee is entitled under the contract to 75% of the employee's hourly rate while the employee is on contractual family leave.
- The employee earns $50 per hour and works eight hour shifts.

- If the employee takes a contractual family leave for a full day, the employee would be entitled to $300 under the contract (8 x $50 x 75%). The formula in the ESA for infectious disease emergency leave pay would entitle the employee to $200. Criterion 3 would be met in this case.
- However, if this employee takes a contractual family leave for only 5 hours in a day, criterion 3 would not be met. This is because the formula in the ESA for infectious disease emergency leave pay results in an entitlement of $200 (the lesser of $200 and 5 x $50) while the entitlement under the contract is for $187.50 (5 x $50 x 75%). Since the contractual pay is less than what the employee would be entitled to receive as infectious disease emergency leave pay under the ESA, criterion 3 would not be met in this case.
- Under this example, the employer in this case will only be able to reduce the ESA allotment of three paid infectious disease emergency leave after the employee has taken the leave of absence and would only be able to do so in the first scenario where the employee took the full day of contractual leave. The employer would not be able to reduce the ESA allotment if the employee took the contractual leave for only 5 hours.

Criterion 4: the contract does not impose conditions on taking the contractual leave that are more restrictive than what is set out in the ESA to take paid infectious disease emergency leave

Because ss. 50.1(1.4) says that the reduction can happen only if an employee is "entitled to take paid leave under an employment contract in any of the circumstances for which employees would also be entitled to take a leave under subsection (1.2)", contractual leave entitlements that meet criteria 1, 2, and 3 will only reduce an employee's three-day paid infectious disease leave entitlement if the conditions for taking paid contractual leave are no more restrictive than what is set out in the ESA for taking paid infectious disease emergency leave, including that the employee's employment contract incorporates all of the ESA's general provisions concerning leaves (as set out in ss. 51-53.1) and the ESA's anti-reprisal provisions.

Some examples of when there are more restrictive conditions for taking paid leave under the employment contract are:

- under the ESA, an employer cannot require an employee to provide a note from a doctor as evidence of the employee's entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave. If the contract requires the production of note from a doctor in order for the employee to take the paid leave under the contract, this criterion would not be met.

- although the ESA requires an employee to advise their employer ahead of time that the employee will be taking a leave (or as soon as possible after starting it if advance notice is not possible), the employee does not lose the right to paid infectious disease emergency leave if the employee fails to provide the notice. But, if getting paid leave under the contract is conditional on the employee providing advance notice to the employer, this criterion would not be met.

As with Criterion 3, in some situations it may not be possible to make a determination as to whether, on April 19, 2021, the contractual entitlement meets Criterion 4. For example, a contract provides an employee with ten fully paid days of leave for personal illness per calendar year and the employee had not used any of them as of April 19, 2021. These contractual entitlements meet Criteria 1, 2 and 3. However, the contract requires employees to provide a medical note - which is not permitted in the ESA for paid infectious disease emergency leave - when the employee has three or more consecutive days of absence for personal illness. Whether or not Criterion 4 is met depends on events that happen after April 19, 2021 (the date the determination is made) – i.e. whether the employee takes a contractual leave for personal illness in single days, two consecutive days, or 3 or more consecutive days. In this situation – where there is uncertainty as to whether this criterion is met on April 19, 2021 because it depends on future events- the employer may engage in a two-step analysis: one on April 19, 2021 and the second when the future event happens and make the necessary adjustments to the results of the analysis.

Where All Four Criteria Are Met

If, on April 19, 2021, the employee's contractual leave entitlements meet all four criteria (or, where a two-step analysis is done as described under Criteria 3 and 4 that results in the contractual leave entitlements meeting all four criteria), the employee's three-day entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave under the ESA is reduced by the amount of leave available to the employee under the employee's employment contract that meets all four of these criteria.

Differences from how contractual entitlements are treated under other leaves

Note that the provision establishing the approach to "drawing down" is very different in the context of paid infectious disease emergency leave as compared to the sick leave, family responsibility leave and bereavement leave provisions of the ESA.

In the paid infectious disease emergency leave context, the analysis about contractual entitlements happens on April 19, 2021 – not when the employee is absent. The analysis involves a comparison of the reasons for the leave entitlements that are available to the employee under the contract with the reasons for paid infectious disease emergency leave available under the ESA.

It is important to note that the reasons for leave under the contract and the reasons for leave under the Act do not have to match perfectly in order for the contract to reduce the employee's three-day ESA entitlement. If a reason for leave under the contract is also one of the reasons the paid leave is available under the Act, the three-day entitlement under the Act is reduced (assuming the contractual leave meets all the other conditions described above). This means that there can be situations where an employee will not have the right to paid leave under either the contract or the ESA when the employee is, after April 19, 2021, away for a reason that the ESA sets out as a qualifying reason for a paid infectious disease leave entitlement. (Although note that in this situation, the employee would have a right to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave under the Act.)

For example, the only paid leave an employee has a contractual entitlement to is to three fully paid "family days". These days could be used to care for a specified individual who contracted COVID-19. These are therefore contractual days that could be used for one or more of the reasons for which paid infectious disease emergency leave can be taken. As such, if the employee has three of these days available under his contract on April 19, 2021 and all of the other conditions described above are met, the employee would not be entitled to any days of paid infectious disease emergency leave under the ESA. If the employee wanted paid time off to get tested for COVID-19 or to get vaccinated against COVID-19, the employee would not have a right to that paid leave under the contract or under the ESA (though the employee would have an entitlement to take that time as unpaid infectious disease emergency leave).

Here are some additional examples of how the rule about contractual entitlements work in the paid infectious disease emergency leave context:

Scenario 1: An employee has paid sick days under the employment contract, and used all of them prior to April 19, 2021.

Example: Denise has a contractual entitlement to ten fully paid sick days each calendar year. These are the only days of paid leave available to her under her contract of employment. There are no conditions attached to the contractual entitlements that are more onerous than those required in the ESA. Denise had a back injury in February and used all ten of her paid sick days.

Denise had no paid leave available to her under her employment contract on April 19, 2021. She is therefore entitled to three days of paid infectious disease emergency leave.

Scenario 2: An employee has paid leave under the employment contract, and has some of it left on April 19, 2021.

Example 1: Anthony has a contractual entitlement to five fully paid sick days each calendar year. This is the only paid leave available under his contract of employment. There are no conditions attached to the contractual entitlements that are more onerous than those required in the ESA. He took three of the five paid sick days in January 2021. On April 19, 2021, Anthony had two paid days remaining under his contract.

Anthony is therefore entitled to one (3 ESA days minus 2 contractual days remaining) paid infectious disease emergency leave day under the ESA. This is because on April 19, 2021, Anthony had two employer-paid days of leave available under his contract that could be taken for one or more of the reasons for which paid infectious disease emergency leave can be taken and which meet the minimum pay requirements.

Example 2: Quim has a contractual entitlement to five fully paid sick days each calendar year. This is the only paid leave available under his contract of employment. There are no conditions attached to the contractual entitlements that are more onerous than those required in the ESA. Quim took two of the five days in February 2021. On April 19, 2021, Quim had three paid days remaining under the contract.

Quim is therefore entitled to zero (3 ESA days minus 3 contractual days remaining) paid infectious disease emergency leave days under the ESA. This is because on April 19, 2021, Quim had three employer-paid days of leave available under his contract that could be taken for one or more of the reasons for which paid infectious disease emergency leave can be taken and which meet the minimum pay requirements.

Example 3: There is no requirement that the paid leave under the employment contract be for a full workday in order to meet the four criteria. For example, Alexander has a contractual entitlement to four hours of paid leave to receive a COVID-19 vaccine. This is the only paid leave available under his employment contract. There are no conditions attached to the contractual entitlement that are more onerous than those required in the ESA. Alexander did not use the leave before April 19, 2021. On April 19, 2021, Alexander had four hours of leave remaining under the contract.

Alexander is therefore entitled to three days less four hours of paid infectious disease emergency leave under the ESA. This is because on April 19, 2021, he had four hours of employer-paid leave available under his contract that could be taken for one or more of the reasons for which paid infectious disease emergency leave can be taken and which meet the minimum pay requirements.

Scenario 3 : An employee is hired after April 19, 2021

Example: Kristy is hired on May 1, 2021 and has five paid family days under her employment contract. This is the only paid leave available under her contract of employment. There are no conditions attached to the contractual entitlements that are more onerous than those required in the ESA. Given that she did not have any contractual entitlement to paid leave on April 19, 2021 - since she was not employed by the employer at that time - she is entitled to three days of paid infectious disease emergency leave.

Scenario 4 : An employee's contractual paid leave bank "refreshes" after April 19, 2021

Example: Nicholos has a contractual entitlement to five fully paid sick days each year. This is the only paid leave available under his contract of employment. There are no conditions attached to the contractual entitlements that are more onerous than those required in the ESA. These paid sick days are renewed every year on Nicholos's employment anniversary date, which is May 1st. On April 19, 2021 Nicholos had used up all his paid sick days under his contract of employment. As such, he is entitled to three paid infectious disease emergency leave. This is the case even though his paid contractual sick day bank will be renewed on May 1, 2021.

* * *

It is the employee's decision as to whether to claim paid infectious disease emergency leave

A question may arise in the situation where an employee has entitlements to both contractual leave and paid infectious disease emergency leave and the employee is absent for a reason that entitles the employee to the leave under both the contract and the ESA. The question is which entitlement - the contractual leave entitlement or the statutory leave entitlement – must be taken first. (This may be relevant for several reasons, including for purposes of tracking the employee's remaining contractual and statutory entitlements and because employers are eligible to be reimbursed only for payments made for statutory paid infectious disease emergency leave).

The ESA does not dictate which entitlement must be taken first in this situation. As is the case with other statutory leaves, it is the policy of the Employment Standards program that employees decide whether or not to claim a statutory paid infectious disease emergency leave when the employee is absent for a reason that qualifies for that leave.

* * *

Whether taking a paid infectious disease emergency leave day draws down the employee's contractual entitlement

Another question that may arise is whether an employee taking a paid infectious disease emergency leave under the ESA affects the employee's contractual entitlements. In general, whether or not a contractual entitlement is also simultaneously reduced when an employee takes paid infectious disease emergency leave under the ESA is not a matter for the ES Program; it is a contractual matter and will depend on the contractual arrangement. There is, however, one exception that applies in the situation where an employee has entitlements to both contractual leave and statutory paid infectious disease emergency leave and the employee is absent for a reason that entitles the employee to take a leave under both. In that situation, where the employee claims the absence as statutory paid infectious disease emergency leave, it is the policy of the Employment Standards program that the employer cannot simultaneously reduce a contractual leave that met the qualifying conditions in ss. 50.1(1.4) that was used to reduce any of the employee's three-day entitlement to statutory paid infectious disease emergency leave.

(The reason that the exception applies in this situation is that unlike other leaves of absence under the ESA, an employee's statutory entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency is dependent on whether the employee has certain contractual entitlements. Because contractual leaves that meet the qualifying conditions in ss. 50.1(1.4) are incorporated into the statutory scheme and are relevant for establishing the employee's statutory entitlement (i.e. how many days of statutory paid infectious disease emergency leave an employee is entitled to), how they are administered is considered a matter for the Employment Standards program to the extent that the employer cannot reduce the contractual leave when an employee takes a statutory paid infectious disease emergency leave. If a reduction of the contractual leave was permitted in this situation, it would result in an employee who chooses to take, for example, one day of their statutory entitlement before taking their contractual entitlement losing two days of leave entitlement for the absence (i.e. the statutory day and a contractual day).

An employee who chooses to take their statutory entitlement before their contractual entitlement will lose one of their 3 days of leave.

* * *

Leave deemed to be taken in entire days – ss. 50.1(1.6)

(1.6) If an employee takes any part of a day as paid leave under subsection (1.2), the employer may deem the employee to have taken one paid day of leave on that day for the purposes of subsection (1.3).

Employees may not need an entire work day to attend to the event that gave rise to the paid infectious disease emergency leave and might only take part of a day off work. Subsection (1.6) allows an employer in this situation to count a part-day off work as an entire day of paid infectious disease emergency leave for the purpose of counting the absence against the statutory allotment of days. This is the only purpose for which the employer can deem the part day off work as an entire day's leave. The employer cannot deem the employee not to have worked at all on the day. Where an employee worked a partial day and took a part-day of paid infectious disease emergency leave, the employee is entitled to be paid the earnings for the time that was actually worked that day (in addition to the infectious disease emergency leave pay). As well, the hours that were worked will be counted for the purposes of, among other things, determining whether the relevant overtime threshold has been reached, whether the limits on, for example, the daily and weekly hours of work have been reached, and whether the daily, weekly/bi-weekly and in-between shifts rest requirements have been met.

For clarity, this provision does not require employees to take paid infectious disease emergency leave in full day periods. It simply allows an employer to reduce the employee's statutory paid infectious disease emergency leave entitlement by a day if an employee is on paid infectious disease emergency leave for only part of a day. (Note that pursuant to subsection 50.1 (1.8), an employee may elect to "opt out" of paid infectious disease emergency leave for a particular absence and can instead take the leave as unpaid infectious disease emergency.)

Note that this provision allows the employer to attribute one day's leave to a part day of absence. It does not require the employer to do so.

For example, an employee left work early to get vaccinated against COVID-19. The employee worked a five-hour day rather than her usual eight hour shift and takes paid infectious disease emergency leave. In that case, the employer may consider the employee to have used up one of her statutory days of infectious disease emergency leave and the employee would be paid infectious disease emergency leave pay for the three hours of leave in accordance with the formula set out in ss. (1.11)-(1.13) plus her earnings for the five hours that she actually worked.

Just because an employer may consider an employee to have used one day of paid infectious disease emergency leave due to a part day of absence does not mean that the employee then has the right to take the entire day off if the triggering event did not last the entire day. For example, an employee's shift is from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. The employee has an appointment to get a vaccine at 9 a.m. at a location one hour away from the workplace. The employee claims the absence as paid infectious disease emergency leave. The employer is entitled to reduce the employee's paid infectious disease emergency leave entitlement by one day, but if the employee does not experience any immediate side-effects from the vaccine, the employee must return to work after the appointment is over. Employees have the right to be away from work under the infectious disease emergency leave provisions of the ESA 2000 only for as long as the event that triggered the entitlement lasts. After the triggering event is over, the employee's normal obligations to attend at work are resumed.

In addition, employers cannot prohibit employees who took a part day of leave from returning to work for the remainder of their shift. This is because of, among other reasons, the employer's obligation to reinstate the employee at the end of the leave in ESA Part XIV and the prohibition against penalizing employees for having taken a leave in ESA Part XVIII, s. 74.

An issue has arisen as to whether an employer could exercise its discretion and deem a partial day absence as a full day for some employees, but not for others, or whether this might allow employers to selectively punish employees who have too many absences in violation of the reprisal provisions of the ESA 2000.

The answer will depend on the facts. In particular, why did the employer treat the employees differently? Where an employer deems a full day's absence for some employees, but not for others, it is a question of fact as to whether the employer would be in violation of the ESA 2000.

For instance, an employer counts a three-hour paid infectious disease emergency leave as a full day's leave for employee A but not for employee B, who also takes a three-hour leave because the employer considers employee B to be a better worker than employee A. Although this might be unfair as between employee A and B, it would not be a violation of the ESA 2000, as it would not be a reprisal for exercising a right under the ESA 2000.

If, on the other hand, the motivation for the differential treatment was that employee A frequently took ESA leaves such as sick leave, family responsibility leave or paid infectious disease emergency leave of only a few hours, and the employer assigned a full day's absence to these short leaves as a way to ensure employee A used up all of their statutory entitlement as soon as possible because the employer found it inconvenient for the employee to be away for many short periods of time, that would be an unlawful reprisal.

As another example, it would also be an unlawful reprisal if the motive for the differential treatment was because employee A made inquiries about ESA rights or refused to agree to average hours for overtime pay purposes.

Paid days first – ss. 50.1(1.7); Same, election re: unpaid days – ss. 50.1(1.8)

(1.7) Subject to subsections (1.8) and (1.9), an employee is entitled to take the three paid days of leave before any of the unpaid days of leave.

(1.8) If an employee is entitled to both paid leave and unpaid leave under this section, the employee may elect to take one or more days or parts of a day of leave as unpaid leave only if the employee advises the employer in writing, before the end of the pay period in which the leave occurs, that the employee has elected to take that time as unpaid leave.

Together, these two subsections provide that where an employee who is entitled to paid infectious disease emergency leave takes infectious disease emergency leave between April 29, 2021 and December 31, 2021, that leave is treated as paid infectious disease emergency leave rather than unpaid infectious disease emergency leave. (See ss. (1.9) and (1.10) below for the rule that applies to infectious disease emergency leaves taken between April 19, 2021 and April 28, 2021, inclusive.)

In effect, these provisions provide that the “default” is that the paid infectious disease emergency leave days are used (and the employer is required to pay the employee infectious disease emergency leave pay in accordance with ss. (1.11)-(1.13)) before unpaid infectious disease emergency leave is taken. There is no requirement for an employee to request payment for the first days’ leave; the entitlement to infectious disease emergency leave pay flows automatically from the ESA.

The only exception is where the employee provides the employer with written notice that the employee elects to take the leave as unpaid infectious disease emergency leave. The written notice has to be provided to the employer before the end of the pay period in which the leave was taken in order for the leave to be considered unpaid. (An employee may choose to take unpaid infectious disease emergency leave rather than a paid leave because, for example, receiving paid infectious disease emergency leave may affect an employee’s eligibility for, or amount of, benefits under federal programs.)

An employee does not lose their paid infectious disease emergency leave entitlements if they choose to treat the absence as unpaid infectious disease emergency leave; the entitlements are just deferred to the next infectious disease emergency leave absence.

Same – ss. 50.1(1.9), (1.10)

(1.9) If, between April 19, 2021 and the day the COVID-19 Putting Workers First Act, 2021 receives Royal Assent, an employee takes unpaid leave under subsection (1.1) in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a leave under subsection (1.2), the employee may elect to be paid for that leave only if the employee advises the employer in writing before the day that is 14 days after the COVID-19 Putting Workers First Act, 2021 receives Royal Assent, that the employee has elected to take the leave as paid leave, and the employee is deemed to have taken the leave under subsection (1.2).

(1.10) Despite subsection 11 (1), if an employee elects to take paid leave under subsection (1.9), the employer shall pay the employee the amount to which the employee is entitled no later than the pay day for the pay period in which the employee made the election.

The COVID-19 Putting Workers First Act, 2021 received Royal Assent and amended the ESA to introduce paid infectious disease emergency leave on April 29, 2021. However, ss. 50.1(5.2) provides that an employee's entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave is deemed to have started on April 19, 2021.

Subsection 50.1(1.9) provides that employees who took an unpaid infectious disease emergency leave between April 19, 2021 and April 28, 2021, inclusive, for a reason for which paid leave can be taken as per ss. (1.2), can retroactively elect to take those unpaid days as paid infectious disease emergency leave instead (if they have an entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave entitlements as per ss. (1.3)).

To make this election, employees must have advised their employer in writing no later than the day before the day that is 14 days after April 29, 2021 – i.e. no later than May 12, 2021.

Subsection 50.1(1.10) provides that where an employee makes an election under ss. 50.1(1.9), the employer shall pay the employee the infectious disease emergency leave pay the employee is entitled to receive no later than the pay day for the pay period in which the employee made the election. This "deadline" for payment overrides the deadline for payment of wages in ss. 11(1) of the ESA, which may have been missed (through no fault of the employer) due to the retroactive nature of the employee's election.

Paid leave – ss. 50.1(1.11)

(1.11) Subject to subsections (1.12) and (1.13), if an employee takes paid leave under subsection (1.2), the employer shall pay the employee the lesser of $200 per day and,

(a) either,

(i) the wages the employee would have earned had they not taken the leave, or

(ii) if the employee receives performance-related wages, including commissions or a piece work rate, the greater of the employee's hourly rate, if any, and the minimum wage that would have applied to the employee for the number of hours the employee would have worked had they not taken the leave; or

(b) if some other manner of calculation is prescribed, the amount determined using that manner of calculation.

This subsection sets out the manner of calculating the amount of infectious disease emergency leave pay an employer must pay an employee who takes paid infectious disease emergency leave.

Subject to ss. 50.1(1.12) and (1.13), the employer must pay the employee the lesser of $200 and either:

- the wages the employee would have earned had the employee not taken paid infectious disease emergency leave, and
- if the employee receives performance-related wages, such as commissions or a piece work rate, the greater of the employee's hourly rate, if the employee has one, and the minimum wage that would have applied to the employee for the number of hours the employee would have worked had they not taken the leave

At the time of writing, no other manner of calculating infectious disease emergency leave pay has been prescribed.

If an employee takes any part of a day as paid infectious disease emergency leave and the employer deems the employee to have taken one day of leave in accordance with ss. 50.1(1.6), the employer is required to pay infectious disease emergency leave pay for the time taken as infectious disease emergency leave (i.e., when the employee is absent) plus any wages the employee earns while working during the day in question.

This provision is read subject to ss. 50.1(1.12) and (1.13). Per ss. 50.1(1.12), overtime pay and shift premium amounts are not to be included in infectious disease emergency leave pay even if the employee "would have earned" these if the employee worked. Subsection 50.1(1.13) provides that if a day of paid infectious disease emergency leave falls on a public holiday, the employee is not entitled to premium pay for any paid infectious disease emergency leave taken.

Depending on how much leave is taken during a work day, infectious disease emergency leave pay for a work day can be any amount from less than a single hour's pay to an entire day of wages. But in no case does it exceed $200.

Calculating Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay

In order to determine how much infectious disease emergency leave pay an employee is entitled to, two things need to be established:

1. How much paid infectious disease emergency leave was taken, or the number of hours in a "work day" minus the number of hours worked, if any, and
2. Whether the formula in subclause (i) or (ii) will be used:

    i. The wages the employee would have earned had they not taken the leave, or
    ii. If the employee receives performance-related wages in whole or in part, the employee's hourly rate – if there is one – or the applicable minimum wage if there isn't.

1. How much Paid Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Taken

Determining length of employee's work day on the day leave was taken:

If the employee:

- works a regular work day, with set hours, this is the length of the day for the purpose of calculating infectious disease emergency leave pay.
- Is scheduled to work a particular number of hours on the day on which infectious disease emergency leave is taken, the length of the work day will be what was scheduled, even if the employee regularly works a set number of hours that is different from the scheduled shift.

The situation may arise when an employee may be required to report to work at a particular time, but does not have a shift or work period of a specified length. In that case, when assessing the amount of wages an employee would have earned had they not taken paid infectious disease emergency leave in order to determine the amount of infectious disease emergency leave pay owing, the employer must make a reasonable estimate of how long the employee would have worked on that day. For example, it could be reasonable for an employer to take an average of the number of hours worked by all the employees in the same position as the employee who took paid infectious disease emergency leave on the day, or if another employee was called in to replace the employee on the day, it could be reasonable to refer to the length of that employee's shift.

When an employment standards officer is investigating a claim from an employee who believes they received less infectious disease emergency leave pay than the ESA requires (perhaps because the employer took the position that the business was not busy on that particular day and the employer intended to send the employee home early) the officer makes a determination on whether the amount paid by the employer was reasonable. Evidence may include direct evidence from other employees, receipts, point of sale records, customer or production logs, or the staff schedule from the day in question. If the employer has a staff rotation policy and employees are sent home early in a particular order when the business is not busy, was the employee the next person on the list?

Determining how much paid infectious disease emergency leave was taken:

The length of infectious disease emergency leave taken on a single day is calculated by deducting the number of hours actually worked, if any, from the total number of hours in the work day. For example, if it is determined that the employee was scheduled to work nine hours on the day, and they took five hours of paid infectious disease emergency leave to get a COVID-19 vaccine, they would be entitled five hours of infectious disease emergency leave pay (plus the wages they earned during the four hours at work). If the same employee missed the entire day, they would be entitled to nine hours of infectious disease emergency leave pay.

2. Whether the formula in subclause (i) or (ii) will be used

A. Subclause (i) – "the wages the employee would have earned had they not taken the leave"

Employees who do not receive any wages that are performance-related are entitled to the "wages the employee would have earned had they not taken the leave", as set out in subclause (i), subject to the $200 limit.

Here are examples of how the formula in subclause (i) applies in different scenarios:

a. Hourly Wage (Non-Salaried Employees)

If the employee is paid by an hourly wage, the amount of infectious disease emergency leave pay is the lesser of $200 and the amount obtained by multiplying the number of hours of infectious disease emergency leave x the hourly rate.

Example 1: Employee with a single rate of pay

- Employee's wage rate is $17.25 per hour.
- Employee normally works 8.5 hours in a day. The employee left work to take paid infectious disease emergency leave after working 1.5 hours

Entitlement:

- Employee normally works 8.5 hours per day, but worked 1.5 hours and took paid infectious disease emergency leave for the rest of the day = 7 hours of paid infectious disease emergency leave
- Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay: 7 hours x $17.25 = $120.75

- Note that the employee is also entitled to wages they earned while working on the same day = 1.5 hours x $17.25)
- Note: if the employee's infectious disease emergency leave pay had resulted an amount greater than $200.00, the employee would be entitled to receive $200.00 and not the calculated amount. This $200.00 maximum applies only to the infectious disease emergency leave pay, not to the employee's total wages for the day.

Example 2: Employee with more than one rate of pay

- Employee is paid $16.00/hour for Job "A" and $17.50/hour for Job "B"
- Employee is scheduled to work 10 hours: first five hours on Job "A" and second five hours on Job "B"

Entitlement:

- The employee worked for the first three hours doing Job A, and took the rest of the day as paid infectious disease emergency leave: 10 hours – 3 hours = 7 hours
- Of the 7 hours of infectious disease emergency leave, 2 were Job A and 5 were Job B
- Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay: (2 hours x $16.00 = $32.00) + (5 hours x $17.50 = $87.50) = $119.50
- Note that the employee is also entitled to wages they earned while working: 3 hours x $16.00 = $48.00.
- Note: if the employee's infectious disease emergency leave pay had resulted an amount greater than $200.00, the employee would be entitled to receive $200.00 and not the calculated amount. This $200.00 maximum applies only to the infectious disease emergency leave pay, not to the employee's total wages for the day.

Example 3: $200 Limit Applies

- Employee's wage rate is $30/hour
- Employee is scheduled to work 10 hours. The employee took the entire day as paid infectious disease emergency leave

Entitlement:

- The employee is entitled to the lesser of $200 and the wages the employee would have earned had the employee not taken paid infectious disease emergency leave, which is $300 ($30/hour x 10 hours)
- Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay: $200

b. Salaried employees

If the employee is paid by salary and has a regular number of days within a pay period and regular hours, the amount of infectious disease emergency leave pay is:

- If the employee took a full day or shift as infectious disease emergency leave, the lesser of $200 and employee's daily rate (salary ÷ number of days in a pay period)

- If the employee took part of a day or shift as infectious disease emergency leave, the lesser of $200 and the employee's hourly rate (salary ÷ number of hours in a pay period) x number of hours of infectious disease emergency leave

This is, in effect, salary continuance. If an employer pays an employee with a fixed salary the normal amount of pay for a week with a day of full or partial infectious disease emergency leave in it, the infectious disease emergency leave pay provisions of the ESA 2000 will be satisfied.

Examples: Salaried employees with regular number of days and hours within pay period

Example 1:

An employee is paid $1500.00 per bi-weekly pay period and works a five-day week. One day of paid infectious disease emergency leave is taken. Infectious disease emergency leave pay = $1500.00 ÷ 10 = $150.00.

Note: if the employee's infectious disease emergency leave pay had resulted an amount greater than $200.00, the employee would be entitled to receive $200.00 and not the calculated amount.

Example 2:

An employee is paid $1500.00 per bi-weekly pay period and works a 40 hour week. The employee takes four hours of paid infectious disease emergency leave. Hourly rate: $1500.00 ÷ 80 = $18.75/hour. Infectious disease emergency leave pay: $18.75 x 4 = $75.00. Note that the employee is also entitled to wages earned for the part of the day that the employee worked.

Note: if the employee's infectious disease emergency leave pay had resulted an amount greater than $200.00, the employee would be entitled to receive $200.00 and not the calculated amount. This $200.00 maximum applies only to the infectious disease emergency leave pay, not to the employee's total wages for the day.

Impact of top-ups on the Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay calculations

A situation may arise where the employee receives a "top-up" or subsidy from a third party in addition to an hourly rate of pay or salary. For example, an employee who works in a daycare centre may be paid $16.00/hour plus $2.00/hour as part of a municipal or provincial government initiative to raise wages for workers in the sector. Depending on how the subsidy is structured, it may or may not be considered wages the employee would have earned for the purposes of infectious disease emergency leave pay. If the employee is paid the subsidy directly by an entity other than the employer, then the subsidy may not be considered wages that the employee would have earned because they are not wages being paid by the employer. If, however, the subsidy and the hourly rate are a term of the contract of employment with the employer (oral or written, express or implied), then the subsidy amount must be included in the calculation of infectious disease emergency leave pay.

B. Subclause (ii) – Where an employee earns performance-related wages

The amount of infectious disease emergency leave pay for an employee paid fully or partly by a system of wage calculation related to performance is the lesser of $200 and the greater of the employee's hourly rate, if any and the minimum wage that would have applied to the employee.

"Performance-related wages" can include, for example, commission only, commission plus an hourly wage, piece work, or compensation as a flat-rate mechanic.

An "hourly rate" refers to an hourly rate set by an employment contract.

Here are examples of how the formula in subclause (ii) applies in different scenarios:

Example 1: Employee earns an hourly rate plus commission

- Employee earns $16.00/hour plus 2% commission on sales,
- Employee takes 6.5 hours of paid infectious disease emergency leave
- Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay: $16.00 x 6.5 = $104.00
- Note that the employee is also entitled to his/her hourly wage for any hours worked + commission earned while working that day, if any
- Note: if the employee's infectious disease emergency leave pay had resulted an amount greater than $200.00, the employee would be entitled to receive $200.00 and not the calculated amount. This $200.00 maximum applies only to the infectious disease emergency leave pay, not to the employee's total wages for the day.

Example 2: Employee paid entirely by commission

- Employee earns 10% commission on all sales
- Employee is scheduled to work eight hours, works five hours and makes sales of $500.00 and then takes three hours of paid infectious disease emergency leave
- Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay: Applicable minimum wage rate x 3
- Note that the employee is also entitled to the 10% commission on the $500.00 sales that the employee made that day
- Note: if the employee's infectious disease emergency leave pay had resulted an amount greater than $200.00, the employee would be entitled to receive $200.00 and not the calculated amount. This $200.00 maximum applies only to the infectious disease emergency leave pay, not to the employee's total wages for the day.

Example 3: Employee is a homeworker paid by piece work

- Employee earns $3.50 per phone call answered
- Employee is scheduled to work 8.5 hours, works two hours, answers nine phone calls, and takes 6.5 hours of paid infectious disease emergency leave
- Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay: Applicable minimum wage x 6.5
- Note that the employee is also entitled to $3.50 x 9 for actual work performed on the day
- Note: if the employee's infectious disease emergency leave pay had resulted an amount greater than $200.00, the employee would be entitled to receive $200.00 and not the calculated amount. This $200.00 maximum applies only to the infectious disease emergency leave pay, not to the employee's total wages for the day.

Example 4: Employee is a Flat Rate Mechanic

- Employee is scheduled to work nine hours
- Employee is paid a flat book rate of $16.00/hour for tune ups (calculated to take two hours to complete). Employee completes two tune ups in three hours and takes the rest of the shift as paid infectious disease emergency leave.

- Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay: Applicable minimum wage x 6
- Note that the employee is also entitled to $16.00 x 4 = $64.00, for actual work performed on the day
- Note: if the employee's infectious disease emergency leave pay had resulted an amount greater than $200.00, the employee would be entitled to receive $200.00 and not the calculated amount. This $200.00 maximum applies only to the infectious disease emergency leave pay, not to the employee's total wages for the day

Paid leave where higher rate of wages – ss. 50.1(1.12)

50.1(1.2) If a paid day of leave under subsection (1.2) falls on a day or at a time of day when overtime pay, a shift premium or both would be payable by the employer,

(a) the employee is not entitled to more than the employee's regular rate for any leave taken under subsection (1.2); and

(b) the employee is not entitled to the shift premium for any leave taken under subsection (1.2).

This subsection excludes overtime pay and shift premiums (for example, an extra amount paid for working evenings or weekends) from inclusion when calculating infectious disease emergency leave pay. As such, an employee would be entitled to be paid for hours of paid infectious disease emergency leave using their regular rate of pay, and not, for example 1.5 times their regular rate per the overtime provisions of the ESA if the leave was taken during a time the employee would have earned overtime pay had the leave not been taken.

Here are some examples illustrating the application of this subsection:

Example 1: Employee was scheduled to work overtime hours on a day when paid infectious disease emergency leave was taken

- Employee is paid $16.00/hour, has already worked 40 hours in a work week and is scheduled to work an additional shift of eight hours on a Saturday.
- Employee does not work any of the scheduled shift and takes paid infectious disease emergency leave.
- Employee would have earned wages for eight hours of work had the leave not been taken (4 of which would have exceeded the overtime threshold of 44 in a week)
- Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay: 8 hours x $16.00/hour = $128.00
- Note: if the employee's infectious disease emergency leave pay had resulted an amount greater than $200.00, the employee would be entitled to receive $200.00 and not the calculated amount.

Similarly, if an employee is scheduled to work hours that would normally attract a shift premium, if the employee misses all or some of the shift to take paid infectious disease emergency leave, then infectious disease emergency leave pay will be calculated on the employee's base rate and would not include the shift premium.

Example 2: Employee entitled to shift premium pay on a day where paid infectious disease emergency leave was taken

- Employee is paid $15.50/hour, plus an additional $2.50/hour for night shifts.
- Employee is scheduled to work a midnight to 8:00am shift, but takes a paid infectious disease emergency leave for the entire day.
- Employee would have earned wages for eight hours of work had the leave not been taken.
- Infectious Disease Emergency Leave Pay: 8 hours x $15.50 = $124.00
- Note: if the employee's infectious disease emergency leave pay had resulted an amount greater than $200.00, the employee would be entitled to receive $200.00 and not the calculated amount.

Paid leave on public holiday – ss. 50.1(1.13)

50.1(1.13) If a paid day of leave under subsection (1.2) falls on a public holiday, the employee is not entitled to premium pay for any leave taken under subsection (1.2).

Under ESA Part X, Public Holidays, employees who agree to, or are required to, work on a public holiday may be entitled to receive premium pay of at least one and one half times their regular rate for hours worked on that day. The effect of this subsection is that – despite the entitlement in s. 50(1.11) to be paid "the wages the employee would have earned had they not taken the leave" – the employee is not entitled to any premium pay that the employee would have earned by working on the public holiday had the leave not been taken.

Note that in certain situations, per ESA Part X, Public Holidays, the onus is on the employee to prove that the employee had "reasonable cause" for not working all or part of a scheduled shift either on a public holiday, or the "first and last" shifts before or after a public holiday. Also note that it is Program policy that if an employee takes paid infectious disease emergency leave, this will constitute reasonable cause for the purposes of Part X. Note that s. 50.1(4.1) prohibits an employer from requiring that the employee provide a certificate from a qualified health practitioner as evidence of an entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave. Therefore, an employer can only require an employee to provide other evidence "reasonable in the circumstances at a time that is reasonable in the circumstances", per s. 50.1(4.1).

Example:

An employee was scheduled to work on a public holiday for ten hours and was going to be paid public holiday pay plus premium pay for the ten hours. The employee worked for six hours and took four hours as paid infectious disease emergency leave. The employee earns the liquor servers minimum wage.

Entitlements:

1. Entitlements from the Public Holidays part of the ESA:
   - Public holiday pay calculated in accordance with the public holiday rules of the ESA
   - Premium pay for the hours worked on the public holiday in accordance with the public holiday rules of the ESA (liquor server's minimum wage x 1.5 x 6 hours)

2. Entitlements from the Paid Infectious Disease Emergency Leave part of the ESA:
   - No additional amount as infectious disease emergency leave pay

   Note that per ss. 50.1(1.13) the employee is not entitled to premium pay for the four hours taken as paid infectious disease emergency leave.

Explanation:

Infectious disease emergency leave pay generally provides that employees do not lose wages for the time they are not working when on paid infectious disease emergency leave, up to a maximum of $200 per day.

In the case of this employee who takes paid infectious disease emergency leave on a public holiday where the employee was scheduled to work and to earn premium pay plus public holiday pay, the employee's entitlements under the public holiday rules in the Act already provide that the employee earns the amount the employee would have earned (except for premium pay as provided for in ss. 50.1(1.13)) had the employee not taken the leave. As such, in this situation, the employee is not entitled to receive any amount in infectious disease emergency leave pay over and above the employee's public holiday entitlements.

Note: The public holiday pay and premium pay that the employee is entitled to under the Act's public holiday rules is not infectious disease emergency leave pay. This is important because it means that the amount the employee is entitled to receive for the public holiday is not subject to the $200 daily infectious disease emergency leave pay maximum. Similarly, an employer is not eligible to be reimbursed this amount through the employer reimbursement scheme (since the amount the employer paid is what the employer owed the employee under the Act's public holiday rules, regardless of the leave of absence).

Advising Employer – s. 50.1(2), (3)

50.1(2) An employee who takes leave under this section shall advise his or her employer that he or she will be doing so.

(3) If the employee begins the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it.

Section 50.1(2) requires employees to tell their employers in advance that they will be taking declared emergency leave or infectious disease emergency leave (unpaid and paid). In situations where this cannot be done, the employee is required, pursuant to s. 50.1(3), to inform the employer as soon as possible after beginning the leave. The notice need not be in writing; oral notice of the leave is sufficient.

An employee does not lose their right to declared emergency leave or infectious disease emergency leave if the employee fails to comply with ss. 50.1(2) or (3). An employee's entitlement to the leave arises where an employee meets the eligibility criteria of the leave. It is the Program's position that the failure to advise the employer before or as soon as possible after the leave begins does not negate that entitlement. This approach has been affirmed in a grievance arbitration decision by the Ontario Labour Relations Board in the context of the former personal emergency leave, which used identical language to subsections (2) and (4) and which had similarly-structured entitlement provisions to those found in these two leaves – see International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 115 v The State Group Inc., 2019 CanLII 22129 (ON LRB). In that decision, the Vice-Chair found that notice to the employer is not a prerequisite to exercising the right to the leave. Note that this approach is also consistent with the Program's long-standing policy in the pregnancy and parental leave context, where the structure of the entitlement and notice provisions are also similar to these. See ESA Part XIV, s. 46(4) and s. 48(4).

An issue has arisen as to whether an employer can penalize an employee for failing to give advance notice that the employee will be absent from work (as may be required under an employer policy), where the time off is a declared emergency leave or infectious disease emergency leave under the ESA 2000. Section 50.1(1.1) and (1.2) describes the employee's eligibility for these leaves. Section 50.1(2) requires the employee taking one of these leaves to advise the employer that the employee is taking the leave, and s. 50.1(3) provides that "if the employee begins the leave before advising the employer, the employee shall advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it." It is clear from s. 50.1(3) that the ESA 2000 contemplates situations where the employee would be unable to advise the employer in advance of commencing declared emergency leave or infectious disease emergency leave. Part of the leave entitlement under the ESA 2000 is the right to take the leave even if advance notice cannot be given, with the proviso that the employee must advise the employer of the leave as soon as possible after beginning it. The failure to give notice in advance of taking leave, when it would have been possible for the employee to do so, can be the subject of disciplinary action by the employer without violating section 74. However, the following points should be considered:

- The employee's failure to give advance notice would not be a lawful basis on which to deprive the employee of the right to take the leave if the qualifying conditions in subsections 50.1(1.1) or (1.2) have been met. An employer could not, for example, take the position that failure to give advance notice when it would have been possible for the employee to do so will result in the time taken off not be considered as declared emergency leave or infectious disease emergency leave.
- Any discipline for failing to provide notice in situations where such notice is required under section 50.1(2) (i.e., where section 50.1(3) does not apply) would have to be appropriately linked to the failure to give advance notice and must not, in effect penalize the employee for exercising the right to leave. The motive for any discipline that the employer does impose must clearly be the employee's failure to give advance notice and not the taking of the leave itself.

  In addition, an employer would be able to impose discipline if an employee fails to provide any notice of the leave (before or after the leave), or if the employee provides notice of the leave so late that one wouldn't reasonably be able to say that it falls within s. 50.1(3). However, the employer's disciplinary action would have to be appropriate, and in no way a penalty or reprisal for the employee having taken the leave, but only for the failure to give notice.

Employees who are deemed to be on infectious disease emergency leave by virtue of ss. 4(2) of O. Reg. 228/20 are, pursuant to ss. 4(4) of that regulation, exempt from the requirement to provide notice of the leave. See the discussion in O. Reg. 228/20.

Note that where an employee qualifies for both paid and unpaid infectious disease emergency leave, the employee does not need to specify in the notice whether they are taking paid or unpaid infectious disease emergency leave. Per ss. (1.7), where an employee who is entitled to paid infectious disease emergency leave takes infectious disease emergency leave between April 29, 2021 and December 31, 2021, that leave is treated as paid infectious disease emergency leave rather than unpaid infectious disease emergency leave. This is subject to ss. 50.1(1.8) that allows the employee to "opt out" of paid infectious disease emergency leave for a particular absence by providing the required written notice to the employer before the end of the pay period in which the leave was taken. Subsection 50.1(1.9) provides that employees who took an unpaid infectious disease emergency leave between April 19, 2021 and April 28, 2021, inclusive, for a reason for which paid leave can be taken as per ss. (1.2), can retroactively elect to take those unpaid days as paid infectious disease emergency leave instead (if they have an entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave entitlements as per ss. (1.3)). To make this retroactive election, employees must have advised their employer in writing by May 12, 2021.

Evidence of Entitlement, Declared Emergency – s. 50.1(4)

50.1(4) An employer may require an employee who takes leave under clause (1.1)(a) to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances, at a time that is reasonable in the circumstances, that the employee is entitled to the leave.

Employers can require an employee who takes declared emergency leave to provide proof that the employee is or was entitled to take declared emergency leave. The employer can require an employee to provide evidence that is "reasonable in the circumstances" that the employee is or was entitled to take the leave at a time that is "reasonable in the circumstances."

Depending on the circumstances, such evidence could include:

- A note from an employee's daycare provider indicating that the childcare centre was closed because of a declared emergency,
- A copy of an order that applies to the employee made under the HPPA,
- A copy of an order that applies to the employee made under section 7.0.2 of the EMCPA.

Evidence of Entitlement, Infectious Disease Emergency – s. 50.1(4.1)

50.1(4.1) An employer may require an employee who takes leave under clause (1.1)(b) or subsection (1.2) to provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances, at a time that is reasonable in the circumstances, that the employee is entitled to the leave, but shall not require an employee to provide a certificate from a qualified health practitioner as evidence.

Employers can require an employee who takes unpaid or paid infectious disease emergency leave to provide proof that the employee is or was entitled to take the leave. The employer can require an employee to provide evidence that is "reasonable in the circumstances" that the employee is or was entitled to take the leave at a time that is "reasonable in the circumstances."

The employer cannot require an employee to provide a certificate from a qualified health practitioner [which is defined in ss. 50.1(1) as a person who is qualified to practise as a physician or nurse under the laws of the jurisdiction in which care or treatment is provided to the employee or an individual described in subsection (8)].

Depending on the circumstances, evidence reasonable in the circumstances could include:

- a copy of the information issued to the public by a public health official advising of quarantine or isolation (for example, a print out, screen shot or recording of the information)
- a copy of an order to isolate that was issued to the employee under s. 22 or s. 35 of the Health Protection and Promotion Act
- an email from a pharmacy or from a public health department indicating the employee's appointment date and time to receive a COVID-19 vaccination.

Subsection (4.1) provides that employers can only require the evidence at a time that is reasonable in the circumstances. What is considered reasonable in the circumstances will depend on all of the facts of the situation.

For example, if an employee is in isolation or in quarantine due to the designated infectious disease, it will not be reasonable to require the employee to provide the evidence during the quarantine or isolation period if the employee would have to leave home to obtain the evidence.

However, if the employee has electronic evidence that can be sent from home, it may be reasonable to require the employee to send it during the isolation or quarantine period.

Where an employee takes unpaid and/or paid infectious disease emergency leave to provide care or assistance to an individual listed in subsection (8), the employer cannot require the employee to give details of the relative's medical condition. The employer is prohibited from requiring the employee to provide a medical note with respect to the relative's illness. The employer may only require the employee to disclose the name of the relative, the relative's relationship to the employee, and a statement that the absence was required because of the relative's illness and that there is a connection between the illness and the designated infectious disease.

Note that the evidence provisions in other ESA leaves do not explicitly state that the "reasonable in the circumstances" standard applies to the timeframe in which evidence may be required (i.e. the provisions in those other leaves only state that employers can require employees to "provide evidence reasonable in the circumstances" – see for example, ss. 50(6), 50.0.1(7) and 50.0.2(7).) Nonetheless, the Program has always considered - and continues to consider - the phrase "reasonable in the circumstances" in those other leaves to apply both to the evidence itself as well as to the timeframe within which it is being required. The explicit inclusion of the phrase "reasonable in the circumstances" with respect to the timeframe in infectious disease emergency leave is to clearly signal to employers that what is reasonable in the context of an infectious disease emergency might differ significantly from what would be a reasonable timeframe within which to require the production of evidence from an employee in other contexts and does not change the interpretation of the evidence provisions in other leaves.

Limit, Declared Emergency – ss. 50.1(5), (6)

50.1(5) An employee is entitled to take a leave under clause (1.1)(a) for as long as he or she is not performing the duties of his or her position because of an emergency declared under section 7.0.1 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act and a reason referred to in subclauses (1.1) (a)(i) to (iv), but, subject to subsection (6), the entitlement ends on the day the emergency is terminated or disallowed.

(6) If an employee took leave because he or she was not performing the duties of his or her position because of an emergency that has been terminated or disallowed and because of an order made under subsection 7.0.2(4) of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act and the order is extended under subsection 7.0.8 (4) of that Act, the employee's entitlement to leave continues during the period of the extension if he or she is not performing the duties of his or her position because of the order.

Section 50.1(5) means that, subject to ss. (6), an employee is entitled to declared emergency leave only for as long as the employee meets the eligibility conditions (i.e., the employee is not performing the duties of his or her position because of the declared emergency and because of one of the reasons set out in s. 50.1(a)). This means, among other things, that once a declared emergency has been terminated or disallowed, subject to s. 50.1(6), the entitlement to declared emergency leave will also end.

Pursuant to ss. (6), the right to take declared emergency leave continues past the end date of the declared emergency if an employee was on declared emergency leave because of an order under s. 7.0.2(4) of the EMCPA and the EMCPA order is extended beyond the date the emergency is terminated or disallowed and the employee is not performing the duties of the employee's position because of that order.

The first declared emergency for COVID-19, which began March 17, 2020, was terminated on July 24, 2020. Orders under s. 7.0.2(4) of the EMCPA related to COVID-19 that were made during the first declared emergency for COVID-19 ceased to be orders under the EMCPA on July 24, 2020. As such, entitlement to declared emergency leave because of the first COVID-19 declared emergency ended on July 24, 2020. Note, however, that employees may have had entitlements to other leaves for COVID-19 related reasons beyond July 24, 2020, unpaid infectious disease emergency leave in particular.

The second declared emergency for COVID-19 began January 12, 2021 and ended on February 9, 2021. Note, however, that employees may have had entitlements to other leaves for COVID-19 related reasons beyond January 12, 2021, unpaid infectious disease emergency leave in particular.

The third declared emergency for COVID-19 began on April 7, 2021 and ended on June 2, 2021.

The Act does not specify an upper limit on the number of days an employee may take declared emergency leave. Employees may take the leave in part days, single days, and/or consecutive days or weeks. The Act does not place any restrictions in this regard. Employees may take a leave whenever they meet the eligibility criteria.

Background information re: EMCPA

According to s. 7.0.7 of the EMPCA, a declared emergency is terminated at the end of the 14th day following its declaration unless it is terminated on an earlier date. The declared emergency may be extended for one period of no more than 14 days by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. Then, it is the Legislative Assembly, on the recommendation of the Premier, which may extend the emergency for additional periods of up to 28 days.

The Legislative Assembly also has the power to disallow the declaration of emergency under s. 7.0.9 of the EMCPA. If the Assembly passes a resolution disallowing the declaration of emergency or the extension of one, any order made under s. 7.0.2(4) is revoked as of the day the resolution passes. Should this occur, an employee's entitlement, subject to s. 50.1(6), to declared emergency leave would also come to an end.

Generally, and unless an employee is exercising the right to declared emergency leave under s. 50.1(1.1)(iii) (i.e. in order to provide care or assistance to an individual referred to in subsection 50.1(8)), an employee's entitlement to declared emergency will also end where the order under the EMCPA is revoked or the order under the HPPA is no longer in effect, even though an emergency may still be declared.

In other words, unless the employee is needed to provide care or assistance to an individual referred to in subsection 50.1(8), the employee's right to leave turns on not being able to perform their duties both because there is a declared emergency under s. 7.01 of the EMCPA and because there is an order under the EMCPA or HPPA that applies to the employee. However, section 50.1(6) deals with the situation where despite the termination or disallowance of the declared emergency, the effective period of an order that had been made under s. 7.0.2 of the EMCPA may be extended. In this situation, an employee's leave entitlement continues during the period of extension if the employee is not performing the duties of their position because of the order.

Further, s. 141(2.3) of the ESA 2000 allows the Lieutenant Governor in Council to make a regulation to extend the entitlement of an employee to declared emergency leave beyond the day on which the entitlement would otherwise have ended if the employee is still not performing the duties of the employee's position because of the effects of the emergency and because of a reason referred to in s. 50.1(1.1)(a). This means that the government is able to extend the declared emergency leave entitlement for employees who are, for one of the reasons specified in s. 50.1(1.1)(a), not returning to work because of the prolonged effects of the declared emergency.

Limit, Infectious Disease Emergency – ss. 50.1(5.1)

(5.1) An employee is entitled to take a leave under clause (1.1) (b) starting on the prescribed date and for as long as,

(a) he or she is not performing the duties of his or her position because of a reason referred to in subclauses (1.1) (b) (i) to (vii); and

(b) the infectious disease is designated by the regulations for the purposes of this section. 2020, c. 3, s. 4 (2).

Subsection 50.1(5.1) means that employees are entitled to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave as long as they meet the eligibility criteria (i.e., they are not performing the duties of their positions because of one of the reasons set out in s. 50.1(1.1)(b) (i) to (vii), the reason is related to a designated infectious disease per O. Reg. 228/20 (initially O. Reg. 66/20 before that regulation was revoked and replaced on May 29, 2020 by O. Reg. 228/20), and there is a prescribed start date for that designated infectious disease in O. Reg. 228/20 (also initially set out in O. Reg. 66/20).

In other words, the Act does not specify an upper limit on the number of days an employee may take unpaid infectious disease emergency leave.

Employees may take the leave in part days, single days, and/or consecutive days or weeks. The Act does not place any restrictions in this regard. Employees may take a leave whenever they meet the eligibility criteria.

Note: entitlement to the leave for the reason prescribed in s. 4 of O. Reg. 228/20 applies only during the "COVID-19 period", which is defined to be the period beginning on March 1, 2020 and ending on January 1, 2022. See the discussion in O. Reg. 228/20.

Same, Paid Leave – ss. 50.1(5.2); Same (5.3)

(5.2) An employee's entitlement to paid leave under subsection (1.2) is deemed to have started on April 19, 2021 and ends on September 25, 2021 or such later date as may be prescribed.

(5.3) If the regulations so provide, an employee is entitled to paid leave under subsection (1.2) for such additional periods as may be prescribed.

These subsections provide the start and end date to paid infectious disease emergency leave entitlements.

Per these subsections, the entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave – which was introduced into the Act on April 29, 2021 - is retroactive and deemed to have started on April 19, 2021. The entitlement ends on September 25, 2021 or such later date as may be prescribed. At the time of writing, December 31, 2021 was the prescribed end date (see O. Reg. 228/212, s. 11.)

Additionally, if a different period is prescribed, paid infectious disease emergency leave would also be available during the prescribed period. At the time of writing no additional periods had been prescribed.

Protecting a Sustainable Public Sector for Future Generations Act, 2019 – ss. 50.1(7)

50.1(7) This section applies despite the Protecting a Sustainable Public Sector for Future Generations Act, 2019, and payments made in accordance with subsection (1.11) are not an increase to existing compensation entitlements or new compensation entitlements for the purposes of that Act.

This subsection was introduced into the ESA by the COVID-19 Putting Workers First Act, 2021 (CPWFA) effective April 29, 2021, at the same time the CPWFA introduced the entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave into the ESA.

This subsection provides that the paid infectious disease emergency leave provisions apply despite the Protecting a Sustainable Public Sector for Future Generations Act, 2019 (PSPSFGA) and that payments of infectious disease emergency leave pay are neither an increase to existing compensation entitlements nor new compensation entitlements for purposes of the PSPSFGA.

The PSPSFGA caps public sector compensation increases. The effect of this subsection is that infectious disease emergency leave pay payments are not counted towards the PSPSFGA's limit on compensation increases.

Care, Assistance, Support - Specified Individuals– s. 50.1(8)

(8) Subclauses (1.1) (a) (iii) and (1.1) (b) (v) apply with respect to the following individuals:

1. The employee's spouse.

2. A parent, step-parent or foster parent of the employee or the employee's spouse.

3. A child, step-child or foster child of the employee or the employee's spouse.

4. A child who is under legal guardianship of the employee or the employee's spouse.

5. A brother, step-brother, sister or step-sister of the employee.

6. A grandparent, step-grandparent, grandchild or step-grandchild of the employee or the employee's spouse.

7. A brother-in-law, step-brother-in-law, sister-in-law or step-sister-in-law of the employee.

8. A son-in-law or daughter-in-law of the employee or the employee's spouse.

9. An uncle or aunt of the employee or the employee's spouse.

10. A nephew or niece of the employee or the employee's spouse.

11. The spouse of the employee's grandchild, uncle, aunt, nephew or niece.

12. A person who considers the employee to be like a family member, provided the prescribed conditions, if any, are met.

13. Any individual prescribed as a family member for the purposes of this section.

Section 50.1(8) lists the individuals with respect to whom an employee may take declared emergency leave or infectious disease emergency leave as referred to in subclauses (1.1) (a) (iii),(1.1) (b) (v) and paragraph 5 of (1.2), respectively. See the discussions above for an explanation of the individuals listed in subsection (8).

s. 50.1(9) – REPEALED

Retroactive Order – s. 50.1(10)

50.1(10) If an order made under section 7.0.2 of the Emergency Management and Civil Protection Act is made retroactive pursuant to subsection 7.2(1) of that Act,

(a) an employee who does not perform the duties of his or her position because of the declared emergency and the order is deemed to have been on leave beginning on the first day the employee did not perform the duties of his or her position on or after the date to which the order was made retroactive; and

(b) clause 74 (1) (a) applies with necessary modifications in relation to the deemed leave described in clause (a).

Section 7.2(1) of the EMCPA allows for orders made under s. 7.0.2 of the EMCPA to be made retroactive to a certain date. Section 50.1(10) of the ESA provides that on or after the date to which the order was made retroactive, those employees who were not performing the duties of their position because of the declared emergency and because of the EMCPA order, are deemed to have been on leave, and they have anti-reprisal protections from discipline or other penalties.

For example, the Lieutenant Governor in Council declares an emergency under s. 7.0.1 of the EMCPA on May 1, 2016. On June 1, 2016 the Lieutenant Governor in Council makes an order under s. 7.0.2 of the EMCPA that applies to an employee and pursuant to s. 7.2(1) of the EMCPA it was made retroactive to May 15, 2016. The employee had not been performing the duties of his position since May 16, 2016. Because the order was made retroactive to May 15, 2016 and an emergency had been declared on May 1, 2016, s. 50.1(10) would apply and the employee would be deemed to have been on a declared emergency leave as of May 16, 2016.

UNPAID INFECTIOUS DISEASE EMERGENCY LEAVE - ISSUES SPECIFIC TO PRE-MARCH 19, 2020 ABSENCES

Although Infectious Disease Emergency Leave was introduced into the ESA on March 19, 2020, employees' entitlements to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave for COVID-19 for reasons set out in clauses (i)-(vi) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b) are, by virtue of O. Reg. 228/20 (initially O. Reg. 66/20 before it was revoked and replaced by O. Reg. 228/20 on May 29, 2020), retroactive to January 25, 2020.

Entitlement to unpaid infectious disease emergency leave where an employer temporarily reduces or eliminates a non-unionized employee's hours of work for COVID-19 related reasons as prescribed pursuant to clause (vii) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b) is retroactive to March 1, 2020 and applies during the defined COVID-19 period. See O. Reg. 288/20 for a discussion of some issues that arise because of the retroactive application of that deemed leave.

This section addresses some issues that arise because of the retroactive application of this leave.

Scenario: An employee was absent from work on or after January 25, 2020 but before March 19, 2020. The employee was absent for a reason listed in subclauses (i)-(vi) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b). The employer terminated the employee's employment before March 19 because of the absences.

Q. Is the employee entitled to be reinstated?

A. Yes. The retroactive application of the infectious disease emergency leave provisions means that as of March 19, 2020, an employer who terminated the employment of an employee because the employee was absent for one of the reasons listed in subclauses (i)-(vi) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b) between January 25 and March 18, 2020 is required to re-establish the employment relationship on March 19, 2020 (the day that the ESA was amended to provide for infectious disease emergency leave) and is required to reinstate the employee to the employee's former position, or to a comparable position if the former position no longer exists upon conclusion of the employee's leave. The requirement to reinstate does not apply if the employment of the employee is ended solely for reasons unrelated to the absences.

Q. Is the employee entitled to be compensated?

A. As stated in the previous answer, the employer is required to re-establish the employment relationship on March 19, 2020 (the day that the ESA was amended to provide for infectious disease emergency leave) and reinstate the employee at the end of the employee's leave (unless the exception to reinstatement applies). If the employer did not do so, an employment standards officer could order the employer to reinstate the employee at the end of the employee's leave and to pay compensation to the employee for, among other things, lost wages. It is Program policy that damage assessments do not include damages that arose prior to March 19, 2020.

Scenario: An employee was absent from work on or after January 25, 2020 but before March 19, 2020. The employee was absent for a reason listed in subclauses (i)-(vi) of s. 50.1(1.1)(b). During those absences, the employee used up some of the employee's:

- vacation days,
- statutory leaves days (for example, sick leave or family responsibility leave),
- contractual leave days (for example, paid sick days or personal leave days).

Q. Are those days credited back to the employee?

A. The Act does not require the employer to reinstate any vacation, statutory leave or contractual leave credits the employee used for pre-March 19, 2020 absences.

ESA Part XIV Section 50.1.1 - REIMBURSEMENT OF CERTAIN PAYMENTS MADE UNDER SECTION 50.1 – SECTION 50.1.1

Section 50.1.1 was introduced into the ESA by the COVID-19 Putting Workers First Act, 2021 (CPWFA), effective April 29, 2021, at the same time that the CPWFA introduced a time-limited entitlement to paid infectious disease emergency leave into the ESA (see s. 50.1).

Section 50.1.1 establishes that employers may be reimbursed for certain infectious disease emergency leave pay payments made to employees pursuant to s. 50.1 of the ESA.

Section 50.1.1 provides that an eligible employer is entitled to be reimbursed, through the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board, the amount of infectious disease emergency leave pay paid to their employees, up to $200 per employee per day of paid infectious disease emergency leave taken.

An employer is not entitled to be reimbursed for payments made to an employee for paid infectious disease emergency leave under the Employment Standards Act (ESA) if either:

- the employee received WSIB benefits for the same days of leave
- the employer cancelled or rescinded the paid leave offered to their employees as part of an employment contract on, or after, April 19, 2021

In other words, an employer cannot cancel their employee's contractual entitlement to paid leave in order to take advantage of the employer reimbursement.

Reimbursement is only for infectious disease emergency leave pay under the ESA. Employers are not entitled to be reimbursed for vacation pay although employees are entitled to vacation pay for the wages they earn while on the paid leave. Employers are also not entitled to be reimbursed for public holiday pay that may have been paid to employees (see section 50.1 for more information on this).

Eligible employers make their application for reimbursement to the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board (WSIB) within 120 days of the date the employer paid the employee, or by April 30, 2022, whichever is earlier. The reimbursement program is not a WSIB program and is not funded by the WSIB's insurance fund. Eligible employers do not need to be registered with the WSIB in order to receive this reimbursement. Funding to administer the reimbursement program is provided by the Ministry of Labour, Training and Skills Development (MLTSD)

The provisions that establish the system for reimbursement are set out below. Information about the application process, criteria for reimbursement, and other aspects of the reimbursement system are available at https://ontario-covid19-worker-income-protection-benefit.ca/en.

Subsection 50.1.1(18) of the Act provides that an overpayment made by the WSIB may be recovered from the employer by the WSIB or by the Ministry of Labour, Training and Skills Development in accordance with the prescribed process. O. Reg. 637/21, which was made on September 3, 2021, prescribes the process by which an overpayment may be recovered. The text of the Regulation is set out at the end of this section.

Definition

50.1.1 (1) In this section,

"Board" means the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board, continued under subsection 159 (1) of the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, 1997, despite the definition of "Board" in subsection 1 (1) of this Act.

Reimbursement for paid leave

(2) An employer may apply to the Board, in accordance with this section, to be reimbursed for payments made to an employee for paid leave taken under subsection 50.1 (1.2).

Same, maximum

(3) An employer is entitled to be reimbursed for payments made to an employee for paid leave taken under subsection 50.1 (1.2) up to a maximum of $200 per day, per employee.

Same, exclusion

(4) Despite subsection 50.1 (1.9), an employer is not entitled to be reimbursed for payments made to an employee on or after the day the COVID-19 Putting Workers First Act, 2021 receives Royal Assent for a paid leave of absence under an employment contract in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a leave under subsection 50.1 (1.2).

Same, exclusion re change to employment contract

(5) If, under an employment contract that was in effect on April 19, 2021, an employee was entitled to a paid leave of absence in circumstances for which the employee would also be entitled to take a leave under subsection 50.1 (1.2), but due to a change to the employment contract on or after April 19, 2021, the employee is no longer entitled to some or all of the paid leave of absence that the employee was entitled to before the change, the employer is not entitled to be reimbursed for payments made to that employee for a paid leave of absence, whether the leave is taken under subsection 50.1 (1.2) or under the employment contract, to the extent that the employee was entitled to the leave of absence under the employment contract before the change.

Same, exclusion re payments made under the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, 1997

(6) An employer is not entitled to be reimbursed for payments made to an employee for paid leave taken under subsection 50.1 (1.2) if the employee received benefits under the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, 1997 for the days of leave.

Application for reimbursement

(7) An application under this section shall be made by filing the following with the Board:

1. A completed application in the form approved by the Board.

2. An attestation, to be completed by the employer in the form approved by the Board that, i. confirms that the employer made a payment to the employee for paid leave taken under subsection 50.1 (1.2),

ii. specifies the dates on which the leave was taken by the employee,

iii. specifies the date on which the payment was made and the amount of the payment made, and

iv. confirms that, on or after April 19, 2021, the employer was not otherwise required under an employment contract to make the payment to the employee.

3. A record of the payment made to the employee in the form approved by the Board.

4. Information about claims filed with the Board under the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, 1997 in respect of the employee.

5. Any other information required by the Board.

Time limit

(8) An application under this section shall be made within 120 days of the payment in respect of which the application is made.

Same, final date for application

(9) Despite subsection (8), no application under this section shall be made by an employer or accepted by the Board,

(a) after January 25, 2022;

(b) if a later date is prescribed for the purposes of subsection 50.1 (5.2), 120 days after that later date; or

(c) if an additional period is prescribed for the purposes of subsection 50.1 (5.3), 120 days after the last day of that period.

No determination if application incomplete

(10) The Board shall not make a determination regarding an employer's entitlement to reimbursement under this section if the employer's application does not meet the requirements of subsection (7) or is not filed within the time limits set out in subsections (8) and (9).

Determination of entitlement

(11) The Board shall make a determination regarding an employer's entitlement to reimbursement under this section after receiving the employer's application and shall advise the employer of its determination in writing after making its determination.

Same, payment

(12) If the Board determines that an employer is entitled to be reimbursed under this section, the Board shall pay the employer the amount to which the employer is entitled.

No right of reconsideration or appeal

(13) A determination made by the Board regarding an employer's entitlement to reimbursement under this section is not a final decision of the Board for the purposes of the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, 1997 and an employer has no right of reconsideration by, or appeal to, the Board or the Workplace Safety and Insurance Appeals Tribunal in respect of a determination made by the Board under this section.

Hearing not required

(14) The Board is not required to hold a hearing when making a determination or exercising a power under this section.

No complaint

(15) Section 96 does not apply to a determination made by the Board under this section.

Overpayments

(16) If the Board pays an employer an amount in excess of the amount to which the employer is entitled under this section, the amount of the excess is an overpayment and is an amount owing under this Act.

Same

(17) If the Board pays an employer an amount under this section and the employee in respect of whom the employer was paid subsequently receives benefits under the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, 1997 for the days of leave for which the employer was paid, the amount of the payment to the employer is an overpayment and is an amount owing under this Act.

Same

(18) An overpayment made by the Board under this section may be recovered from the employer by the Board or the Ministry in accordance with the prescribed process.

Ministry to make payments to Board

(19) The Ministry shall make payments to the Board to defray the costs of administering this section, including the cost of payments made to employers and the administration costs of the Board.

Same, appropriation

(20) Money required to defray the costs of administering this section shall be paid out of the money appropriated by the Ministry from the Consolidated Revenue Fund for that purpose by the Legislature.

Repayment by Board

(21) On or before the prescribed date, the Board shall pay the Ministry any amounts paid to the Board under subsection (19) that are no longer required for the purpose of administering this section.

Same, payments not part of insurance fund

(22) Payments made to the Board under subsection (19) shall not form a part of the insurance fund that is administered by the Board under the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, 1997 and the Board shall not make any payments from the insurance fund for any purpose under this section.

Contract for services

(23) The Board may enter into a contract or agreement with any person for the purpose of administering this section.

Recordkeeping

(24) The Board shall maintain such records relating to the administration of this section as are required by the Ministry, including records that are necessary to verify applications and payments made under this section, and shall provide those records to the Ministry.

Collection and use of information

(25) The Board may collect and use personal information within the meaning of the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act for the purpose of administering this section.

Same

(26) The Board may use information collected under the authority of this section for the purpose of administering and enforcing the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, 1997.

Same

(27) The Board may use information collected under the authority of the Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, 1997 for the purpose of administering this section.

Disclosure of information

(28) Except as otherwise provided for in this section, the Board shall not disclose any information collected under the authority of this section unless authorized or required by law to do so.

False or misleading information

(29) No person shall provide false or misleading information under this section.

Same, disclosure to Director

(30) If the Board is of the opinion that false or misleading information has been provided by an employer in an application under this section, the Board shall disclose that information to the Director.

Investigation

(31) An employment standards officer or other prescribed person may investigate a possible contravention of this section.

Immunity

(32) No action or other proceeding for damages may be commenced against a member of the board of directors, or an officer or employee of the Board, for an act or omission done or omitted by the person in good faith in the execution or intended execution of any power or duty under this section.

O. Reg. 637/21: SECTION 50.1.1 OVERPAYMENT RECOVERY

Overpayment recovery process

1. (1) For the purposes of subsection 50.1.1 (18) of the Act, the process set out in sections 2 to 5 of this Regulation is prescribed as the process by which an overpayment made by the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board under section 50.1.1 of the Act may be recovered from an employer.

(2) Subsections 91 (1) to (10) and (11) to (13) of the Act apply with respect to inspections to determine whether an overpayment was made by the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board to an employer.

Order to repay overpayment

2. (1) If an employment standards officer finds that an overpayment was made by the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board to an employer, the officer may order the employer to pay the amount of the overpayment to the Minister of Finance.

(2) An order issued under subsection (1) shall also require the employer to pay to the Director in trust an amount for administrative costs equal to the greater of $100 and 10 per cent of the overpayment.

(3) The order shall contain information setting out the nature of the overpayment or be accompanied by that information.

(4) The order shall be served on the employer in accordance with section 95 of the Act.

(5) Every employer against whom an order is issued under this section shall comply with it according to its terms.

Limitation period

3. (1) An employment standards officer shall not issue an order under section 2 more than four years after the date on which the overpayment was made by the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board to the employer.

(2) An employment standards officer shall not amend or rescind an order under section 2 after the last day on which the officer could have issued the order under subsection (1) of this section unless the employer against whom the order was issued consents to the rescission or amendment.

Review

4. (1) An employer against whom an order has been issued under section 2 is entitled to a review of the order by the Board if, within 30 days after the day on which the order is served, the employer,

(a) applies to the Board in writing for a review; and

(b) pays the amount owing under the order to the Director in trust or provides the Director with an irrevocable letter of credit acceptable to the Director in that amount.

(2) The Board may extend the time for applying for a review under this section if it considers it appropriate in the circumstances to do so.

(3) The Board shall hold a hearing for the purposes of the review.

(4) The parties to the review are the employer against whom the order was issued and the Director.

(5) Subsections 116 (8) and (9), 117 (1) and (2), section 118 and subsections 119 (3) to (14) of the Act apply, with necessary modifications, with respect to a proceeding under this section.

(6) If an employer fails to apply for a review of an order issued under section 2 in accordance with subsection (1) of this section, the order becomes final and binding against the employer.

Collections

5. (1) Sections 125 to 127 and subsections 128 (1), (2), (4), (5) and (6) of the Act apply with respect to the collection of amounts owing under an order issued under section 2.

(2) Subject to subsection (3), a collector,

(a) shall pay any amount collected with respect to administrative costs to the Director;

(b) shall pay any amount collected with respect to an order under section 2 to the Minister of Finance; and

(c) may retain any amount collected with respect to the fees and disbursements.

(3) Despite subsection (1), if an amount is owing by an employer under an order issued under section 2 and an amount is also owing by the employer under an order issued under the Act to pay wages, fees or compensation, and the money collected by the collector is less than the full amount owing to all persons, the money shall be apportioned among those to whom it is owing under the order issued under the Act to pay wages, fees or compensation in the proportion each is owed and paid to them in accordance with subsection 128 (4) of the Act before any amount is apportioned in respect of the order issued under section 2.

ESA Part XIV Section 50.2 – Reservist Leave

Reservist Leave – ss. 50.2(1), (2)

50.2(1) An employee is entitled to a leave of absence without pay if the employee is a reservist and will not be performing the duties of his or her position because,

(a) the employee is deployed to a Canadian Forces operation outside Canada;

